"But is the Matthaean λόγος πορνείας a translation of the Hebrew words (or their Aramaic equivalents) which Hebraists believe to mean not only adultery but any immodest behaviour? The early Church, as has been said, uniformly understood the words to signify adultery only among sexual offences; that is to say, they never thought of 'unchastity before marriage' or immodest behaviour short of adultery, as a possible meaning, though it was suggested by more than one early writer that certain other offences, having no connection with the sexual life, might be morally equivalent to 'Porneia' (see D. (v)). We have also seen that one Rabbinical School, that of Shammai, interpreted the Hebrew words in Deut. 24. 1 in the same sense which the Christian Church gave to λόγος πορνείας, that is, adultery only. Let us suppose, as seems very probable, that the question put to our Lord was intended to evoke a declaration in favour of one or other of the opinions, which divided the Rabbis into two sections, the stricter view of the School of Shammai, or the laxer view of the School of Hillel. (It is possible, as Professor Burkitt suggests, that the questioners desired to know in particular whether Jesus would be as uncompromising as John the Baptist in condemning Herod's irregularities.) It was quite in accordance with our Lord's method on other occasions (compare, for instance, his replies to the questions about the tribute-money and marriage in the future state), that He should, instead of a direct answer, lay down a general principle from which the answer might be easily inferred. Such an answer would be the unqualified prohibition of divorce. But the answer, as given by Matthew, containing the exception about 'Porneia,' would not (if λόγος πορνείας is a translation of the ambiguous phase in Deut.) have been an answer at all in Aramaic, though it sounds like an answer in Greek. For both the contending schools based their opinion on the passage of Deuteronomy containing the clause about 'the nakedness of a thing.' The difference between them was in the interpretation of those very words. Therefore, to quote the words without comment would be, in effect, to say nothing.

"If, however, some still think it possible that the 'exception' was made by Christ in language borrowed from the text of Deuteronomy, we shall have to put to them the alternative that either Christ followed the School of Shammai in restricting unduly, and so partially misunderstanding, the words of Deuteronomy, or that He meant to give His sanction to those words in their true sense, which would involve an extension of the right of divorce alien to the principles which the other Evangelists aver that He laid down, and alien to the practice of the primitive Church. The latter is scarcely tenable, since neither school of Rabbis interpreted the word in the way which modern Hebraists advocate.

"Arguments from the fact that the death penalty assigned to adultery in the Old Testament was still legally in force in the time of Christ may be set aside. There seems to be no doubt that this law remained a dead letter; it is probable that there was no serious intention of stoning the adulteress whose case is mentioned in John 8.

"G.

"General Conclusions.

"It seems clear that Christ, in the words so variously report by the Evangelists, intended to inculcate a higher view of the sacredness of marriage than was held by the Rabbis of either school. Divorce had been allowed by Moses 'for the hardness of your hearts'; but 'from the beginning'—that is to say, according to God's intention—marriage is essentially an inviolable contract, terminable only by death. No Christian can contract a marriage with any other intention, or regard it as anything less than a life-long union, to which both parties have pledged themselves before God. This is the principle involved. I do not think that Christ meant to lay down hard and fast rules. He was always more concerned with states of will and feeling (cf. Mt. 5. 28) than with overt acts. If a very hard case had been brought before Him, it would have been in accordance with His general attitude towards social legislation if He had answered, 'Marriage was made for man, and not man for marriage.' The early Church probably interpreted His mind rightly when it laid stress on the chance of repentance and return as the main reason why re-marriage after desertion by an unfaithful partner is generally not permissible to a Christian. I am sure that He would not have sanctioned the notion that either husband or wife is ipso facto released from the vow by unfaithfulness on the part of the other partner."

"The doctrine that marriage is absolutely indissoluble cannot, in my opinion, be proved from the New Testament. St. Paul cannot have held it, or he would not have allowed even mixed marriages to be dissolved. By admitting the Matthaean exception into the canon, the Church accepted an interpretation of Christ's words which is incompatible with the view that marriage is per se indissoluble. And while admitting porneia as a ground of divorce, the Fathers of the Church, as we have seen, were willing to discuss the question whether certain non-sexual offences against the marriage-bond might not be morally equivalent to porneia. The Christian emperors, apparently without much protest from the Church, allowed divorce, with leave to re-marry in certain cases. The Greek Church has always allowed the innocent party to re-marry and has even made other concessions. The Roman Church is strict in theory, but by no means in practice. The Reformed Churches have allowed divorce, with leave to re-marry, for adultery and some other offences. Lastly, in our own country private Bills have (previously to 1857) taken the place of the Papal dispensations, and divorce was within the reach of those who could afford to pay for it.

"It is plain then that those members of the English Church who maintain that since by Christian law marriage is per se indissoluble, no divorce shall be granted under any circumstances, are making a claim which is historically untenable, and which the practice of all Christian Churches in all ages has proved to be unworkable. It is to their credit that they do not propose to soften the rigour of their principle by resorting to the subterfuges which have been so common in the Roman Church. But they do not realise that they are 'laying a yoke on the neck of the disciples which neither our 'fathers nor we are able to bear.'

"The duty of a Christian State, it seems to me, is to legislate with due regard for the imperfections of human nature, while at the same time recognising an imperative obligation to maintain the unique sanctity of the marriage contract, which Christ unquestionably intended to emphasize in the strongest manner. In carrying out this obligation, it is, in my opinion, the duty of the State to punish adultery as an offence against itself, a violation of a contract which the State has guaranteed. Adultery in either sex ought to be a misdemeanour punished by a terms of imprisonment. The infliction of a penalty which all would feel to be a disgrace would have a most beneficial effect on public morality, by stripping this odious offence of the glamour of romance which has unfortunately been allowed to gather round it. The convict's jacket is the proper modern equivalent for the white sheet of public penance. Further, I am convinced that the law which permits the re-marriage of the guilty pair, after divorce proceedings, ought to be altered. In France, I believe, such marriages are forbidden. In this way a great temptation to adultery might be removed. And, I need hardly say, that the law which compels a clergyman to lend his church for such marriages is an injustice to the Church, which ought to be terminated.

"With regard to the innocent party, I think that the rule of the Greek Church should be followed, and that the clergy should be compelled to solemnize, and permitted to contract, such marriages. I say this, though I am myself in favour of the stricter rule, and should always advise an innocent partner not to re-marry during the lifetime of his or her erring mate. I believe that Christ's indulgent maxim, 'He that is able to receive it, let him receive it,' applies to such cases.

"If the law were thus tightened in the interests of Christian morality, I do not see why the State should not assume the power of dispensation in a few other cases besides adultery. The cases which seem to me most to justify such dispensation are brutal cruelty, habitual drunkenness, conviction for felony, and venereal disease. It would still be open to the clergy to dissuade from re-marriage in such cases, and I hope they would do so; but re-marriage should not be forbidden, nor should the Church, while it remains established, be allowed to brand those who have so re-married as evil livers.

"I think that a husband should, as now, be able to divorce his wife for a single act of unfaithfulness, and that a wife should be able to divorce her husband for habitual or frequent unfaithfulness, without cruelty. An isolated lapse on the part of the husband should, in my judgment, be punishable by imprisonment but not by divorce, since the temptation is greater in the case of the man, and the injury less, inasmuch as he does not risk bringing another man's child into the home."

38,679. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I gather from your Paper, which I have read fully, and which you have now read shortly, that your view is that our Lord's teaching simply indicates a general principle, and that subject to exceptions?—General principles and counsels of perfection.

38,680. Would your view be the same had you come to the conclusion that the exception as to adultery in Matthew was part of our Lord's teaching?— I think that if those words are admitted as genuine it throws the whole of our Lord's teaching on the subject into confusion, and it would be then extremely difficult to say what He meant.

38,681. I see you agree with Dr. Sanday that they are no doubt part of the author of St. Matthew's Gospel's words; that they are original in that sense, I mean?—Yes, I hold that view with regard to the passage in the 5th Chapter.

38,682. Yes, it is that I am speaking of really?—Yes.

38,683. Do you agree with the view I put to Dr. Sanday, which I think he agreed with, that there is a good deal of force arising from the fact that the contemporary witness put those words into our Lord's mouth?—Yes, I should say there is force.

38,684. Because it looks as if either he said them or the author, who was a contemporary, thought that he would have said them?—Not quite a contemporary, supposing the Gospel was written in 90.

38,685. Well, within 60 years of our Lord's time. He thought either that He said them or that He would have said them had He thought of it?—I had said that I do not think the words existed in Q; therefore one cannot necessarily put them much before 90 A.D.

38,686. That is why I put it only on St. Matthew. That consideration, though you think it is entitled to weight, is overborne, you think, by the other consideration to which you have referred?—I think it is entitled to great weight as showing the feeling and opinion of the Church about the time the Gospel was written, but I do not think it has much value as going back to our Lord Himself.

38,687. In the very interesting little summary that you give of the history I do not quite follow what you mean by saying that the Private Bills in this country took the place of Papal dispensations?—I meant that the State assumed the right and power of annulling a marriage.

38,688. But Papal dispensations were never granted for divorce, were they?—I suppose not under that name, but practically I suppose they were.

38,689. Dispensations?—Dispensation is not quite the right word. I meant to take such a case as Henry VIII's divorce, and allowing him to re-marry.

38,690. But that kind of cases are not cases of dispensation but cases where the parties took advantage of the fact that there was no dispensation. Take the common case of two cousins marrying without dispensation, and afterwards wanting to get a divorce?—Yes, dispensation was the wrong word.

38,691. You meant the artifice by which annulment was obtained, whatever it was?—Yes.

38,692. The concrete opinion you express, is of very great interest and importance; but may I take it that those are your views as an individual rather than as an expert on Biblical criticism and so on?—Yes.

38,693. I notice you have suggested certain additional grounds for divorce, but you do not indicate any principle on which they are founded. What in your view is the principle which should guide divorce?—I think that no mere misfortune ought to be a ground. I should not, for example, be in favour of granting divorce for insanity.

38,694. That is negative. What in your view is the principle which ought to control the grounds for divorce?—I think guilt inflicting intolerable conditions on the other party.

38,695. Intolerable in what sense?—Intolerable in any sense.

38,696. You mean something which is a breach of the contract; something which renders the performance of the contract impossible?—Yes.

38,697. I do not want to suggest anything to you, but I do not quite follow what you mean by intolerable. Intolerable seems to me to be a relative phrase.

Suppose the parties had ceased to love one another. Would that be a ground for divorce?—No, I should not say so.

38,698. But there would be a clear breach of the contract, would there not?—I suppose there would, but I should not regard it as in accordance with Christian principle to allow divorce for that.

38,699. (Lord Guthrie.) I understand in your view that what renders the continuance of the marriage relations reasonably impossible must involve moral wrong if it is to be a ground for divorce?—I think so.

38,700. And that would exclude insanity?—And that would exclude insanity.

38,701. But it would include adultery?—Yes.

38,703. Habitual drunkenness?—Yes.

38,704. And crime?—Yes.

38,705. You do not mention desertion, Professor. Suppose it be manifestly permanent, and has continued over a considerable period of years without any support whatever to the innocent spouse, and, let us say, leaving on her the support of the children. What do you say to that case?—I think it would not be wrong for the State to allow divorce in such a case, but I should feel that there was some divergence such as may very well exist between Church law and State law in that case; and I think in cases of that kind it would be open to the Church, even while established, to impose a short period of excommunication.

38,706. By way of discipline?—By way of discipline; after which the person may be considered to have purged his contempt.

38,707. The innocent person?—The innocent person. I think that would satisfy most Church feeling.

38,708. Do you apply that to any of the other cases I have mentioned: adultery, cruelty, drunkenness or crime?—Yes.

38,709. You think in all cases a short period of discipline would be required?—I think so.

38,710. Adultery included?—I should myself say adultery included, because I do not think our Lord meant adultery to be a cause for divorce.

38,711. But in your view does divorce in any circumstances involve a measure of sin on the part of the innocent person?—Whether followed by re-marriage or not?

38,712. Yes?—No, I should not say so.

38,713. But if followed by re-marriage?—If followed by re-marriage I should say it would involve some breach of the Church's law which the Church might justifiably claim to consider.

38,714. If it thought fit?—Yes.

38,715. Do you deduce that from anything in the Jewish law at the time of Christ?—As far as I know, the Jewish law at the time of Christ never contemplated separation without leave to re-marry.

38,716. But did it contemplate, in the event of re-marriage, discipline by the Church?—As far as I know, not.

38,717. Do you think that Christ contemplated, if there was re-marriage, the necessity for discipline?—It is very difficult to say whether Christ contemplated any such conditions as afterwards arose in the shape of a large and organised Church. I think one can only judge as best one can from the general principles.

38,718. Is it quite clear that when Christ referred to this subject He was objecting to some law and practice followed by the Jews?—I think it seems most likely that the question was put to Him with a view to getting his opinion as to the views taken by the two schools of Rabbis, or possibly with special reference to Herod's irregularities; or, thirdly, it is possible that those who asked the question had heard that He had already prohibited divorce and wished to get a declaration from Him.

38,719. It is quite clear that He was objecting to something connected with divorce, whatever it was?—Yes.

38,720. What do you think yourself it was that He was protesting against?—I think He was protesting against the lax tone of society at the time, and that He wished to lay down, as a counsel of perfection, and as a rule as far as it could be followed, the absolute prohibition of divorce.

38,721. Were those laws or practices or both that He protested against?—I should say both the Mosaic law and the practice—and interpretation of it.

38,722. You do not think He could have had in view the laws or practices of the Romans who were in possession of the country?—I think that unlikely, because I do not think the Romans interfered with the Jewish legislation on those points.

38,723. So far as contemporary exposition goes, do I understand you to think that the particular action of St. Matthew and the express statement of St. Paul with reference to a Christian husband and a non-Christian wife, both come under that category of contemporaneous or nearly contemporaneous exposition?—Yes.

38,724. Does it come to this; that the case that St. Paul had to deal with was not before Christ and could not be at the time?—No, it could hardly come before Christ.

38,725. And the case we now have to deal with of desertion in the case of Christian husband and Christian wife was not before St. Paul?—No, I think not.

38,726. Does any reason occur to you why the view which St. Paul took with regard to the case of a Christian husband and non-Christian wife should not apply to the case of a Christian husband and a Christian wife?—I think I do see a reason in that pagan marriage is a thing we have no experience of. The conditions do not exist in any Christian country. Cicero wished to divorce his wife in order to marry his ward who was young and wealthy; and that goes beyond even anything that America does.

38,727. But if a Christian man deserts, or a Christian woman deserts; from one point of view is not the argument a fortiori in favour of desertion?—Yes, I think that might be held.

38,728. What do you make of the action of the Christian Fathers; of the views and actions of the Christian Fathers? Are we to ignore them, or what weight are we to give to them?—I think they saw clearly what the tendency of our Lord's teaching was and interpreted it aright; but I think we also have to take into account the peculiar views about marriage which were prevalent at that time. It was a period of race exhaustion and world-weariness; and that race exhaustion was reflected in the opinions about marriage.

38,729. And have we also to take into account that there was naturally in their minds a revolt against the Roman and Jewish remedy with regard to marriage; a tendency to go to extremes on that account?—Yes, I think so.

38,730. Had their views with regard to the Second Coming anything to do with it?—Those views, I think, are very important during the first century; but after the end of the first century I should say the expectation of the end of the world gradually died away and is no longer so important.

38,731. We have heard a great deal about St. Matthew possibly putting in the words "save for fornication" in deference to Jewish sentiment. Is it not possible that he put them in from recollection, either of what Christ said on the particular occasion or in private discussion with Christ?—I rather doubt, myself, whether the editor—the Evangelist, who wrote somewhere about 90—had ever known Christ in the flesh, but I think undoubtedly he had tradition to go upon, besides the two documents Q and the Marcan document; and I ought to have said in my memorandum that I attach great importance to those verses about the eunuchs which follow immediately in Matt. 19, as throwing light on this question. They are peculiar to St. Matthew, and I think they indicate that our Lord was laying down a counsel of perfection rather than a basis for legislation.

38,732. Do I understand you do not associate the disciple Matthew so directly with the Gospel that carries his name as to make him responsible for all the statements in it?—I think the disciple Matthew may very well have been the author of Q, but not of the Gospel as we have it.

38,733. Suppose it be the fact that Christ's general method was not that of legislation but of laying down great general principles; do you see any reason why He should have departed from that rule in the case of divorce and in that case only?—The only reason I can suggest is that the words are very categorical. There are very few definite laws that are so definitely laid down in the Gospels as that.

38,734. Take oaths; "swear not at all"; is not that very categorical and distinct?—I think it is a very parallel case.

38,735. And I suppose you think the Quakers make the same mistake there as the persons who maintain absolute indissolubility make with regard to divorce?—Perhaps. I am not quite sure that the Quakers are wrong; but I do not think it is a matter of great importance.

38,736. Take the other Quaker view—with regard to war. They take a very similar view with regard to Christ's precepts there as those take who believe in the absolute prohibition of divorce?—Yes.

38,737. (Lady Frances Balfour.) You make a distinction between the infidelity of a wife and that of a husband?—Yes.

38,738. You say the temptation is stronger with the men?—Yes.

38,739. The man is a feebler creature and cannot resist it?—No, I think it depends on the physiological constitution of the two sexes.

38,740. Is another reason that the wife may bring another child to her husband?—Yes.

38,741. But if the husband is unfaithful he may bring another child into another family?—Yes, if the other party is a married woman.

38,742. There they would become equal?—Yes.

38,743. (The Archbishop of York.) I think you said in answer to Lord Guthrie that the words of our Lord's injunction about marriage are very specially categorical?—Yes.

38,744. Is there any other similar injunction of our Lord which has been accepted as a definite rule for any section of the Christian Church—at any rate for many centuries—such a one as Lord Guthrie suggested, "Swear not," and the like?—I do not know that there is, but some sections of the Church have admitted the exception.

38,745. But you admit that this has been regarded by the Christian society as a legislative injunction in a sense in which no other injunction of our Lord has been taken?—I think it has been so regarded.

38,746. Then in regard to what you said about St. Paul; though it occurs only in your memorandum I think it is of some importance. You say St. Paul made an exception himself, on his own authority, to the absolute rule; but was St. Paul really making an exception to the rule of Christ which affected presumably primarily the marriage of his own followers. It did not concern two Christians at all, did it?—I think he seems to have been conscious that he was making an exception, or putting an interpretation.

38,747. Would not it be possible to urge that what St. Paul regarded as requiring some justification was rather that the Christian wife and the heathen husband should be encouraged to live together at all?—Yes, I have no doubt he would have strongly disapproved of those marriages; in fact forbade them to be contracted.

38,748. Pardon me; in the passage he gives a reason for rather urging the Christian wife to remain with her husband if he would allow it?—Yes, but I think that refers to cases where one party had been converted after marriage. In other places—in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians—he forbids mixed marriages to be contracted.

38,749. Yes, mixed marriages being made; but what St. Paul was making the exception for was that the Christian wife should remain with the heathen husband if he was willing to stay?—Yes.

38,750. And he was not making any exception to the Christian law as between Christians. It was not an exception to the law of Christian marriage?—No.

38,751. One question more about your memorandum on patristic authority. Do you know of any single instance in which any Christian writer of the first three centuries either approved of re-marriage after divorce in any case, or even quoted St. Matthew as justifying it?—No I do not; but they speak of the thing as being done. Origen apparently implies that even some bishops allow it.

38,752. I do not want to go into that; I could, at some length. I only ask the question?—No, I do not know of any case where it is approved of, and I should not expect to find one.

38,753. Then on the general question which you have given us the benefit of your opinion about, I only want to ask this. You say that the law which compels a clergyman to lend his church for such marriages is "an injustice to the Church which ought to be terminated." What is your view about compelling a clergyman, even if he has very strong objections, to celebrate a marriage in the case even of the innocent party. Supposing he holds himself bound by what you would probably admit to be our Lord's actual words, and feels that very strongly; ought he to be compelled, as now, to celebrate it?—I think it is always expedient not to put a strain on men's consciences; therefore I think it would be as well that it should not be compulsory.

38,754. Apart from the Church itself, do you regard the marriage service as expressing the mind of the Church of England on this matter of marriage?—Yes, with the exception of certain passages about the Patriarchs which might be removed with advantage.

38,755. Would you say that the marriage service of the Church of England does take the strictest view of our Lord's words?—I should say so, yes.

38,756. Then is it desirable that the state should encourage or compel the use of words in a public ceremony which obviously do not admit of any interpretation but one, namely, that there should be no marriage after divorce?—I do not think I feel very strongly about that. I think the law of the State might be expected to be rather laxer than the law of the Church.

38,757. But ought the State to compel a clergyman to use words in a way that means one thing in such a way as implies that they mean another?—I am afraid I have not considered that question.

38,758. Just one thing more. You mention this matter about the discipline of the Church. In your proof you say that re-marriage should not be forbidden; nor should the Church, while it remains established, be allowed to brand those who have re-married under those extended grounds you have mentioned as evil-livers. When you say "be allowed" do you imply that the State should order the clergy to admit persons to communion who are married under the State laws?—I think if the Church were to ordain, for example, that a person who had obtained a divorce for desertion, and had afterwards re-married, should be excluded for life from holy communion, I think that would strain the relations between Church and State too far.

38,759. No doubt it would strain it; but I want to know the meaning of your words "be allowed." Do you mean that the State should order the Church?—I mean if the Church insists on that kind of legislation disestablishment would be the only way out of the difficulty.

38,760. But you would not admit that the State ought to have the power of determining actually what persons the Church shall or shall not admit to holy communion?—No, I should not admit that; but, as I say, if the divergence between Church and State went too far it might make a separation necessary, and make the continuance of the present state of things impossible. That is all I meant.

38,761. (Sir William Anson.) I am not quite clear from your evidence how you think this saving clause in St. Matthew got into the text. It was not in "Q" and it certainly is not in St. Mark?—I should think it was probably put in by St. Matthew himself—at all events in the 5th chapter—to bring his Gospel into accordance with the prevailing Jewish-Christian sentiment; because the whole of St. Matthew's Gospel is strongly pervaded with Jewish-Christian feeling.

38,762. When you say St. Matthew——?—I mean the editor of the Gospel as we have it, not the author of "Q."

38,763. Have you considered the view expressed by Dr. Montefiore, that seeing that adultery was punishable by death, it was such an obvious ground for divorce that it was taken for granted in the earlier text?—Dr. Montefiore is an authority on the Jewish practice and I am not, but my impression is that that law was entirely a dead letter, and that there was no intention of stoning the adulteress who was brought before Christ.

38,764. Therefore you cannot take it for granted that adultery was a ground for divorce. I mean our Lord cannot be held to have passed over the subject on the ground that it was too obvious for introduction?—I do not think He passed it over as too obvious, because we have to consider the surprise of the disciples, and I feel certain from the general tenour of our Lord's teaching that He would not have regarded a single act of unfaithfulness as a sufficient ground for dissolving a marriage.

38,765. (Chairman.) I think you said that the Gospel of Matthew, as we have it, dated from 90?—I think that is the probable date.

38,766. Is there any material on which that date is founded?—No, it is rather conjectural, but I think that is the date which most critical scholars take; there or thereabouts.

38,767. Is it conjectured, then, that it was not his own writing but of some redactor of that time. It is conjectured that it was by someone, not himself, but someone who followed him?—Some Jewish Christian, I think is the usual opinion, who lived about that date and who compiled his Gospel from two sources.

38,768. With regard to "Q" is that conjectural or is there anything that enables that to be traced?—The existence of "Q" is only arrived at by an analysis of the contents of the three Gospels; but that is the general consensus of opinion.

38,769. There must have been some document which is called "Q" now, that they had when they had their own preparations in hand?—Yes; I think it may be regarded as certain.

38,770. Is there any possibility of fixing the date of that?—No, but I think that most scholars are now disposed to date "Q" very early indeed—before the Marcan document; perhaps not many years after our Lord's death.

38,771. But how long after is not certain?—It is impossible to say.

38,772. But before St. Mark?—Yes.

38,773. You said something about adultery not being a ground for divorce. I did not catch what you said as to that?—What I meant was that I do not think it would be in accordance with our Lord's teaching to regard a single act of unfaithfulness as ipso facto dissolving the marriage tie. It would come under the general ground, I think, of forgiveness of injuries.

38,774–5. But one broad question. Do you find from your exhaustive studies of the Scriptures that the State might act on Christian principles and yet permit of divorce being granted on the serious grounds which you have mentioned?—That the State has a right to do that.

38,776. And still be acting in accordance with Christian principles?—Yes, I do think so.

(Chairman) I think that is all. Let me thank you very much, Dr. Inge, for coming; and not only for coming but for preparing such an extremely interesting and learned paper. We shall all value it most highly.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FORTY-FIFTH DAY.

Tuesday, 22nd November 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

His Grace the LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
His Honour JUDGE TINDAL ATKINSON.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).
J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY, Esq. (Assistant Secretary).

Professor JAMES DENNEY called and examined.

38,777. (Chairman.) You are Professor of New Testament Theology in the United Free College of Glasgow?—Yes.

38,778. How long have you been in that capacity?—For 13 years.

38,779. Prior to that I think you were United Free minister for 12 years of the Broughty Ferry Church?—Yes.

38,780. I think your name was supplied to us by Lord Guthrie?—I understand so.

38,781. You have been good enough to prepare a statement on "Divorce in Scripture and in the Law and Practice of the Church"?—Yes.

38,782. I think, if you will allow me to suggest it, it would be convenient if you were to read it?—Shall I just begin at the beginning?

38,783. Yes, please, and we will reserve our questions till after.

"A. 1. The Old Testament has a law of divorce (Deut. xxiv. 1–4). Custom allowed only the man to divorce his wife, not the woman her husband; and the intention of the law is evidently two-fold, (1) to check arbitrary action on the part of the husband; (2) to supply the divorced wife with evidence that she was in a position legally to marry again.

"2. The New Testament is not like the Old, or at least the various Codes of the Old, a statute book as well as a book of devotion, and, properly speaking, it contains no legislation. But there are various words in it bearing on divorce, the import of which has to be considered.

"A. Words of Jesus.—These are found in Matt.

v. 32, xix. 1–9; Mark x. 11–12; Luke xvi. 18; 1 Cor. vii. 10–11. It is one and the same saying of Jesus which is given in all these passages, but with a notable variant in the first Gospel. According to Mark, Luke, and Paul, Jesus rejects divorce without qualification, as a violation of the divine law of marriage; according to Matthew he rejects it except on the ground of the wife's unchastity. It has been common to regard Matthew as giving the words of Jesus in full, and to read them as a statute, sanctioning divorce in one case, excluding it in every other, and over-ruling the unqualified exclusion of it in the other reports; but it can hardly be doubted that this is wrong. The analogy of parallel variants and of the style in which Jesus habitually speaks is all in favour of regarding the unqualified form as that which truly records his words." I mean, by parallel cases, cases like the qualification as to the words about anger: "Whosoever shall be angry with his brother," where some manuscripts insert the words "without cause," or the passage, "Men shall speak evil against you falsely," where "falsely" is undoubtedly an insertion in the same way. "What Jesus does is to assert in the strongest terms and without any qualification, the divine ideal of marriage; it is the permanent union of man and woman, and to dissolve it is adultery. This is what is given as the mind of Christ in Mark, Luke, and Paul; but the first evangelist, who collected the words of Jesus as a new law for the Christian community, and in doing so involuntarily gave them here and there a quasi-statutory touch, which was originally foreign to them, introduces into this saying what (to him and to those for whom he wrote) was a self-evident qualification. It is as if he said: 'The dissolution of marriage is adultery. Yes, except, of course, in the case in which adultery has 'preceded, and the marriage has been dissolved already, ipso facto." This is not a divine statute limiting divorce for Christians to this one case; it is the first reflection of a Christian teacher, and an obvious and natural one, as he brings the absolute word of Jesus into relation to the facts of the world, and begins to construe and apply it as a law.

"Among the Jews, only the husband could divorce his wife, and there is nothing in the words of Jesus about a right of the wife to divorce her husband, either for adultery or for any other reason. The singular saying in Mark x. 12, which has perplexed interpreters, binds woman equally with man to maintain the divine ideal of marriage";—that is the saying that contemplates a woman putting away her husband, and says that a woman putting away her husband and marrying another commits adultery too. The peculiarity about that is that it is found in St. Mark only; and also it seems improbable that it is a saying of Jesus at all, but an extension of his words by the evangelist to the circumstances of the pagan world in which he wrote, and in which the divorce of a husband by his wife was possible enough—"but says nothing about her rights or his if the ideal is not maintained. This also shows that it is a mistake to look for anything statutory about divorce in the words of Jesus."

"B. Words of Paul.—In 1 Cor. vii. Paul discusses a number of questions connected with marriage and the relation of the sexes. Apparently they had been propounded to him in a letter from Corinth. He recalls the words of Jesus in which the divine ideal of marriage has been asserted (vv. 10, 11), and argues his cases in view of them. He does what a modern missionary has to do in many parts of the world, and not without similar hesitation and perplexities. It is casuistry, not legislation. The one case which concerns us is that examined in vv. 12–16. This is the case of a marriage in which one of the parties has become a Christian, while the other remains a heathen. Paul's judgment is, that if the heathen partner is willing to continue the relation the Christian one is not to break it up; but if the heathen one goes off the Christian one is not in bondage. In other words, the Christian husband or wife, who is deserted by the heathen partner, is free to form a new marriage with some other person. This passage is often referred to as if it were a New Testament statute allowing divorce for desertion, but it is clearly nothing of the kind. It is Paul's judgment on a case arising in a particular condition of society"; and, no doubt, there was some particular case of breaking up suggested to him, the especial conditions of which had actually been operating on his mind. "He says expressly it is his own, not the Lord's (v. 12); and many Christians, even if they did not dissent from it, would agree only with misgivings." I should think, in our ignorance of the particular conditions before the Apostle's mind, we should be slow to say he was wrong; but any person who held a strong idea of the indissolubility of marriage, as I certainly should do, would be equally slow to say he was certainly right. We do not know really what he was pronouncing upon. "The New Testament, therefore, while it declares that marriage ought to be permanent, and consequently implies that nothing in legislation should tend to impair its sanctity, gives no express guidance to the legislator for dealing with cases in which the divine ideal has evidently been frustrated. It does not give a divine sanction to divorce, either for adultery or for desertion, or for any other cause. But neither does it preclude divorce as a legislative remedy in any given case. It perplexed Paul, and may perplex the Legislature always, to provide for the variety of cases in which marriage, in point of fact, breaks down; but there are no Scriptural statutes which exempt us from the responsibility of dealing with every case on its merits, or which limit our liberty to deal with every case as the interests of all concerned prescribe—always in the light of the Christian ideal.

"3. The Early Church.—The Church of the first centuries was generally hostile to divorce. Even when it read Matt. v. 32, as it usually did, in the statutory sense, it preferred that the man who put away his wife on the ground of adultery should remain unmarried. Only death (it was argued) really dissolved marriage, and the true rule was not to marry while the former partner lived. But while this view was widespread it was not universal; the very purpose for which divorce was contemplated, from Deut. 24 down, was to put the innocent person in a position to marry again, and remarriage was not forbidden." That appears from the passages collected by Cotelerius in his Commentary on the Apostolic Fathers—I mean the opposition to all marriage after divorce, and the fact that it could not be prohibited. [See the passages collected by Cotelerius on Hermae Past. Mand. iv. (Amsterdam edition ii. p. 88).]

38,784. Is that work to be found in any book that we could have access to?—I do not know anywhere except in Cotelerius' edition of the Apostolic Fathers, but I should say that would be in every large library. "What it is equally important to remember is, that the opposition of the Church to a new marriage after divorce has to be heavily discounted in view of its opposition to second marriage at all. Athenagoras (Suppl. pro Christ. c. 33) speaks of marriage even after the death of one's partner as 'specious adultery,' and Tertullian (De Monog. c. 9) says roundly that it makes no difference to God whether, when a woman marries the second time, her husband is living or dead. This view, that marriage should not be repeated under any circumstances, is not without New Testament promptings (1 Cor. vii. 39, 40)"—where Paul says a woman may marry again, but is happier if she remains as she is; and also in 1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; v. 9; Tit. 1, 6, where we have something in the nature of a statute, that a bishop should be the husband of one wife, corresponding to the statement that an ecclesiastical widow must be the wife of one husband; that is to say, if a bishop is a married man he must not marry again; and that a man who otherwise might be eligible to a bishopric is by that disqualified. There is something of a statutory nature in that, but it is worth remarking, perhaps, that no church in the world has ever treated that and applied it as if it were a statute; I mean, no church actually applies that rule. Some churches do not allow their bishops to marry at all; some allow them to marry as often as they please, or as often as the law of the land where they are allows; but no church allows them to marry once and forbids them to marry twice. "And though it never became law"—that is, that marriage should not be repeated under any circumstances—"it intensified the feeling against marriage after divorce. The whole attitude of the early Church on questions arising within this area is unsound, because it is not determined by any rational or Christian principle, but in the main by a violent reaction against the immorality of the heathen world." Everything determined as a result of reaction needs to be discounted. "There was so much corruption in sexual relations that the very idea of them seemed inseparable from sin, and the less there was of them the better. Celibacy was a higher moral state than marriage. It was praiseworthy that husbands and wives should live as brothers and sisters. If to marry at all was not the best, to marry twice was a grave fault, and to marry after divorce was mere adultery. When this state of mind is considered as a whole, it is too abnormal to furnish any real guidance to the legislator.

"4. The Mediæval Church.—The Greek Church adopted and retains the view that adultery dissolves the marriage relation"—but not alone, of course, because in the Greek Church, in Russia, though the ecclesiastical court has the law in its hands, it grants divorce not only for adultery, but it can grant a divorce for certain crimes, and also for five years' absence—"and that it is lawful for a person who has obtained divorce for adultery to marry again. In the Latin Church the view which came to prevail was that the marriage bond is indissoluble, and divorce impossible; no matter how completely a marriage breaks down, nor from what causes, neither partner can marry during the lifetime of the other. This was not formally defined as the law of the Church till the Council of Trent. At the beginning of the period, Augustine (De Fide et Operibus, c. 19) had doubts as to whether the innocent man who divorced an adulterous wife might not, in consistency with Scripture, marry again. Personally, he thought not; but he also thought the Scripture evidence so obscure that anyone might be pardoned for taking the opposite view. At the very end of the period Cardinal Cajetan, subject always to a determination by the Church which has not yet been given, holds that by the law of Christ a man may put away his wife ob fornicationem carnalem and marry another."

38,785. What date is that?—Cajetan died in 1534, and he was an elderly man at the time. I could not say exactly the date of the Commentary. "An examination of the canons of mediæval councils shows how gradually and with what difficulty the view which ultimately prevailed, and which pronounced divorce a vinculo impossible, was actually carried through." The references I took for that are all taken from Hefele, Conciliengeschichte I., where the councils are examined.

38,786. That shall be quoted in your evidence.

The following is the portion of the proof not read by the witness:—"See Canon IX. of Elvira in Hefele, Conciliengeschichte I. 131F, Canon X. of Arles, A.D. 314, ibid. 179; Canon VIII. of Carthage, A.D. 407, ibid. II. 88; this canon suggests applying for an imperial decree to forbid separated husbands and wives from marrying others; Canon II. of Vennes, A.D. 465, ibid. II., 573; by the statutes of St. Boniface marriage is indissoluble except in causa fornicationis and by mutual consent propter servitium Dei, ibid. III. 549; a synod at Vermeria in 753 A.D. decided that where persons of unequal rank had married (slave and free), one being ignorant of the status of the other, the marriage could be dissolved, and another marriage with a partner of the same rank take its place, ibid. III. 538; Canons IX. and XVI. of the Council of Compiègne (about 756 A.D.) allow a man whose wife has committed adultery with his brother or a man whose wife has taken the veil, to marry again, ibid. III. 555; a man whom his wife has tried to murder, and who has killed in self-defence someone who was helping her, may dismiss her and marry another, ibid. III. 583; Canon XVI. of a Council at Bourges in 1031 rules that he who dismisses his wife for any other cause than adultery may not marry another, ibid. IV. 658F. During the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries 'Verstossung der Frau und Verehelichung mit einer andern ist sehr häufig,' ibid. IV. 497."

A. Then I think the sentence in the middle of page 6 is where I might take it up. "Pope Gregory II., on the ground alleged in 1 Cor. vii. 9, allowed a man who had not the gift of continence, and whose wife had become through illness incapable of rendering her conjugal duty, to leave her and marry another, providing, however, aliment for the first. The Church had, in short, an ideal of marriage, but could not directly translate it into a statute, and did not feel bound to do so. Its policy is indicated in the words of Pope Gregory to Augustine of Canterbury, who had consulted him on questions of this class." I have given the quotation.—[The following is the quotation referred to:—"In hoc enim tempore sancta ecclesia quaedam per fervorem corrigit, quaedam per mansuetudinem tolerat, quaedam per considerationem dissimulat, atque ita portat et dissimulat ut saepe malum quod aversatur portando et dissimulando compescat (Wilkins, Concilia I., 20."]—"Though in the mediæval church, where its ideal prevailed, there was formally no divorce, there was in many cases a practical surrogate for it in the facility with which existing marriages could be declared null ab initio. When the prohibited degrees of consanguinity, affinity, and spiritual relationship were so widely extended, it required a high degree of genealogical knowledge and of legal skill to avoid a breach of the law. What was ordinarily complained of was not that the law made marriage indissoluble, but that there was hardly any assurance possible that a marriage could not and would not be dissolved." Shall I fill up these references?

38,787. We will take it as part of the print, and if there is any other reference you would like to add when you see your evidence in print you can do so. [The following are the references:—"Apol. Aug. "Conf. XXIII., 71; Müller's Symbol. Bücher der "Evang. luth. Kirche 248; Laing's Knox. II., 245."]—Those are contemporary references to the Apology for the Augsburg Confession and Laing's Knox.

38,788. Have you got those written out?—Yes.

37,789. Could we have the full writing inserted?—Yes.

The following are the extracts referred to:—

"From the Apol. Conf. Aug.—Nostri principes, quicquid acciderit consolari se conscientia rectorum consiliorum poterunt, quia etiam siquid sacerdotes in contrahendis conjugiis mali fecissent, tamen illa dissipatio conjugiorum, illæ proscriptiones, illa sævitia, manifeste adversatur voluntati et verbo Dei. Nec delectat nostros principes novitas aut dissidium, sed magis fuit habenda ratio verbi Dei, præsertim in causa non dubia quam aliarum rerum omnium.

"From Knox.—Because that marriage, the blessed ordinance of God, in this cursed Papistry hath partly been contemned, and partly hath been so infirmed that the persons conjoined could never be assured of continuance if the Bishops and Prelates list to dissolve the same, we have thought good to show our judgments how such confusion in times coming may be best avoided."

These are confirmed by Mr. Bryce, who sums up the state of affairs in this sentence: "The rules regarding impediments were so numerous and so intricate that it was easy, given a sufficient motive, whether political or pecuniary, to discover some grounds for declaring nearly any marriage invalid." (Studies in History and Jurisprudence, II., p. 434.). Then—

"5. The Reformed Churches.—At the Reformation the Canon Law was abandoned in Protestant countries, and they were left to face all the matrimonial causes which emerged without its guidance. The Kirchenordnungen of the German States almost all have chapters on marriage and divorce. Those who drew them up seem to have been much impressed with the variety and difficulty of the cases which had to be considered, and often a large discretion is left to the judges. Thus the Wurtemberg ordinance of 1537 reserves the right to purify, to lessen, to increase or to abrogate the Ee [= Ehe, marriage] ordnung in one or more or all of its articles as from time to time in view of circumstances seems good and necessary." Of those ordinances, a hundred and sixty-five are collected in Richter's book, Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des 16 Jahr hunderts. "The Ordonnances ecclèsiastiques de Genève (1541), printed in the same collection, enjoin in a certain case qu on lui (i.e., to a person petitioning for divorce) octroye ce qui raison portera"—give a fair and reasonable decision. "In the Palatinate (1563, ibid. 256) a woman deserted by her husband " is to get 'gebührliches Bescheid' "—a decision answering her requirements. I mention those as an instance of the indefiniteness of the latitude in discretion left to the Court. "In several, when the courts are baffled an absolute discretion seems to be formally vested in the sovereign. The motives to which reference is most frequently made are the necessity of avoiding offence, of preventing further sin and shame, and especially of giving relief to the injured person." For example, when divorce is granted for desertion, by way of avoiding offence the deserting person is very often forbidden to return to the territory of his prince upon pain of death, and things of that kind. "Marriage is never regarded as a contract which can be broken by consent, but as a relation of another kind which can only be impaired or destroyed by the guilty action of one or both the parties to it. But by such guilty action (all the Reformed Churches hold) it can be impaired or destroyed, and this creates the situations with which the courts deal. A man did not apply to the court, according to the earlier ordinances, to dissolve his marriage." In the later ordinances it sometimes does take that form, but it is very much a difference of terminology. "In the earlier ordinances he applied for a Toleramus or Permittimus to marry again on the ground, which he undertook to establish to the court, that by the guilty action of his partner the marriage had been already dissolved.

"The Protestant Churches are at one in holding that, while marriage is not dissoluble by mutual consent, there are cases in which divorce, followed by a new marriage, is lawful. Where they differ is on the proper grounds for divorce.

" (a) There are those which limit these to the so-called scriptural grounds, either adultery only, or adultery and desertion. A typical example is the Westminster Confession of 1647 (c. xxiv. 6). Here adultery and desertion are the only causes sufficient to dissolve the bond of marriage, and desertion is defined as such wilful desertion as can no way be remedied by the Church or civil magistrate. All the Ecclesiastical ordinances of the continental churches surrounded divorce for desertion with precautions against haste and possible abuse. These two grounds are the only two which have been recognised in the Scottish Church. Divorce for adultery was granted without statute from the first"—presumably on the authority of scripture—" desertion was made a ground for divorce by a statute of 1573," the relation of the Church to which is certainly obscure. "Although, if we read scripture as a statute, adultery is a ground for divorce much more unequivocally than desertion, Calvin held that prolonged and heartless desertion is a far clearer case of a marriage being de facto dissolved than adultery, and had no hesitation in granting divorce on that ground.

" (b) There are churches which, while they admit that marriage laws ought to be determined by the Word of God, do not read scripture in this statutory way. They recognise adultery and desertion as grounds of divorce, not because they are specified in scripture, but because in point of fact they fatally impair or annihilate the marriage relation. Whether there are other offences that have the same effect. and under the burden of which the injured person should have the same remedy, is an open question. Most of them think there are." I am not sure that I should say "most"; I did not count them; it is only an impression, but certainly in a great many it is so. " In difficult cases they sometimes fell back on ideas or principles of the Roman law. Zwingli speaks of sins against conjugal duty which are adulterio graviora aut paria," worse than adultery or as bad. To judge from the ordinances the cases most frequently discussed were attempting one's partner's life, insanity, desertion, crime which entailed degrading punishment, leprosy, or any incurable illness of a kind which made conjugal intercourse impossible. A fair specimen of this attitude to the whole question may be seen in the Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum which was largely the work of Cranmer and Peter Martyr, and had the support of a great body of Reformed opinion in England." I mention that, not that it ever had authority in England, but because it is more accessible than the German Kirchen Ordnungen, and in spirit is very like them. "Not only adultery and desertion (with due precautions), but attempted murder and continuous cruelty, are here regarded as grounds for divorce. Incurable disease is not. Separation from bed and board is wholly abolished as at once unscriptural, unreasonable, and immoral.

" While taking the responsibility of dealing with the moral wreckage in which marriage sometimes ends, the Reformed Churches have always asserted the Christian ideal. Their marriage services speak of marriage as life-long union. They teach that it is God's will that it should be permanent and pure. On the subject generally I should be disposed to say:—

"(1) That nothing in the law should tend to disparage the Christian ideal of marriage as the permanent union of husband and wife with a view to family life, a union which is recognised by Society and which is the nursery both of Church and State.

"(2) That the law has to take account of facts by which in certain cases marriage is unquestionably destroyed, and that for dealing with those facts scripture gives us no authoritative guidance. It neither prescribes nor precludes the remedy of divorce, and of a new marriage, in dealing with any or all of them.

"(3) That in the interest of morality, and therefore of the Christian ideal of marriage, it is a mistake to put marriageable people in a situation in which marriage is prohibited. Offences against the law of marriage should perhaps be punished"—"perhaps" is probably too weak—"there is statutory authority enough for this in the Old Testament, and in many of the ecclesiastical ordinances of national Protestant churches; but they should not be punished by sentences of celibacy.

"(4) That it is possible to distinguish between offences against the marriage relation and its duties by which the marriage as a natural and spiritual union is actually destroyed, and conditions or circumstances which in given cases are incidental to it, and which, however painful or trying they may be, are not in kind different from the pains and trials which have to be borne in all human relations." Dr. Johnson says in some place that marriage is not unhappy otherwise than as life is unhappy, and if it is just the unhappiness of life that afflicts marriage, of course there is no ground in that for annulling it.

" The former would be grounds for divorce but not the latter. There might easily be cases (cruelty, for example, or criminality of a degree involving long imprisonment) where it is difficult to draw the line; in such uncertain cases, it is probably better that a few people should be made unhappy than that society should be corrupted on a vital point of morality."

38,790. (The Archbishop of York.) I gather from your evidence that you consider on critical grounds the unqualified words are those that are probably most genuine and authentic?—Yes, that is so.

38,791. With regard to the passage in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, you, I gather, would not agree that there was any justification in that passage taken by itself for treating desertion as a ground for divorce?—No, I do not think St. Paul is legislating about desertion or about any abstract case at all. He has something before his mind, and he gives this decision upon it, which I think is a decision quite open to question.

38,792. He is dealing, is he not, with a corresponding situation such as might arise anywhere even now on the mission field as regards the relation between a Christian spouse and a heathen?—Quite so, and I think the only thing that one could say about it is that probably a person brought up to regard the sanctity of marriage, as most Christians are, would feel that Paul was rather taking a liberty than doing the safest thing in the circumstanees.

38,793. Would you agree that what St. Paul was rather trying to justify in that passage was the continued cohabitation of a Christian with a heathen spouse. That was the main object of his privilegium?—He starts from that point of view; that the sanctity of marriage is not impaired by the fact that one of the persons is heathen and the other Christian; a marriage performed between two heathen people is not to be dissolved when one of them becomes a Christian.

38,794. Then, strictly speaking, of course, that passage of St. Paul is not really applicable to the marriage of Christians except so far as inferences may be drawn?—What I should say about that is that I do not recognise that the marriage of Christians is a distinct thing from marriage simpliciter. I do not think there is any justification in scripture for saying that Christian marriage is different from marriage in general.

38,795. Then do you take the view that Our Lord's words were intended to express His view about all marriage and not the marriage of His disciples?—Yes, I think so, undoubtedly. I do not think the idea of Christian marriage is an idea that has any basis in the New Testament at all. For one thing, when Our Lord spoke there were no Christians in the world to lay down laws for. There was no Christian society and nobody had the imagination of a Christian society for which legislation was required. The persons to whom He spoke were Jews, and the law He laid down was for them, and He does not base it on any idea of His as to marriage, but on the creative order of God. God made them male and female; it is on the first page of Holy Scripture, "For this cause shall a man leave his father "and mother and cleave unto his wife." That is the universal law of marriage, and the idea of Christian marriage as being something different from that seems to me a pure superstition.

38,796. Did He not express that it was His will that marriage should be everywhere restored to that primitive eoneeption?—Everywhere, yes.

38,797. That was the ideal towards which human society ought to move?—Yes, that is so—the indissolubleness of marriage.

38,798. Therefore, any movement in human society, or in the evolution of moral ideals, which made against that ideal would be against His will?—Yes, anything that undermined the sanctity of marriage would be against the will of Christ.

38,799. Then with regard to your remarks about the history of the matter in the Early Church. You lay naturally some emphasis on the view which was commonly held, or which at any rate was held in certain quarters, about second marriages. Would it not be fair to say that that view was largely determined by the Montanist attitude towards life?—Well, the passage I quote from Tertullian, where he says, "It "makes no difference to God whether when a woman "marries the second time her husband is living or "dead." That passage is quoted from a book written after Tertullian became a Montanist; but I do not think that is relevant on this subject, because the only difference between Montanism and the Catholic Church on moral questions was—well, the pot which was always at boiling point in the Catholic Church sometimes boiled over with a splash—which was Montanism. Tertullian was a Montanist, but he was a Christian.

38,800. But, to use your figure, the second marriage was the splash that boiled over?—But the other persons, like Athenagoras, said things just as strong, and so did Tertullian in the two books he wrote to his wife before he became a Montanist.

38,801. But you would not wish to convey that that attitude towards marriage ever received anything like formal recognition by the Catholic Church?—Not exactly; but even a Catholic writer like Hefele says distinctly in his account of these things, that the Church had difficulty in keeping a second marriage, even after the death of the first spouse, legal, so strong was the feeling against it.

38,802. Admitting, then, that there was a very strong feeling, was not that based upon the strong and clear conviction which the Church at that time had, that Our Lord in His words meant to prohibit remarriage after divorce. The argument would be, would it not, if that were so, He had spoken of the matter in that way, and, a fortiori, it would be so with regard to any special marriage?—No, I do not think it has any relation to the matter of divoree at all, because you will notice in the New Testament that there is a beginning of that aseetic tendeney in the passages I have pointed out where the question of divorce does not come up. For instance, the passage in the First Corinthians, seventh chapter, where Paul discusses the question of widows' remarriage, and he says they had better not, where divorce is not in question at all. In the same way in the case of a bishop; a bishop must not be a man who has married twice, and a widow who was to be put on the list of Church widows must not be a woman who had married a second husband, because to have married a second time at all, at that time had something damnifying about it and disqualified the person from representing Christianity before the world.

38,803. What I submit is that that attitude was largely due to the conviction that Our Lord had spoken against remarriage?—Our Lord spoke against divorce, but this has nothing to do with divorce.

38,804. But is it not the fact that Tertullian based his view of second marriage on Our Lord's words with regard to divorce? I think it is so in more than one place?—Tertullian rather treats a second marriage as if it were adultery on the ground that the first marriage is for good and all; that even death makes no difference to it. He states this kind of argument: Are we to be nothing at all after death, as some epicureans, and so on, would teach us, and not as Christ Our Lord teaches us? But I do not think there is any ground for looking at marriage like that in the teaching of Jesus.

38,805. With regard to what you say as to the attitude of the Early Church on this question not being "determined by any rational or Christian principle, "but in the main by a violent reaction against the "immorality of the heathen world." Would you agree that reaction was necessary or, on the whole, salutary?—If I did, it would only be a temporary consideration.

38,806. Would that reaction against the evils of Roman society have been effective unless based on the conviction that our Lord's words represented something more than an ideal which could be set aside if circumstances were hard?—I am afraid I do not quite follow.

38,807. Well, was not the success of the stand which the Church made against the laxity of Roman society due to the conviction that Our Lord had given an absolute law to His Church? Rightly or wrongly, was not that the view?—No, I should not say so if an absolute law means a peremptory statute The reaction against the dissoluteness of Roman society was due to a profound conviction that Christ demanded absolute purity of life, and that that had to be asserted at any cost against all these horrors; but that is a different thing from saying that Jesus laid down a statute.

38,808. I am not saying what our Lord did; but was not that the view almost universally held—at any rate, during the first three centuries—by the Early Church, and was not that common view the explanation of the strictness with which, at any rate with regard to dissolution of marriage, they withstood the laxity of Roman society?—What do I understand you to say is the view?

38,809. It seems very simple. Would the Christian Church have been able to resist the laxity with which marriage was held in Roman society, unless it believed that our Lord had prohibited remarriage after divorce?—I do not see why not. If the church believed in the Christian ideal of the permanence and purity of the marriage relation, quite apart from any conception as to circumstances in which divorce was or was not permissible, I do not see why it should not have resisted it just exactly as it did.

38,810. I only want to know what your opinion is, as it is an important point. Surely the Roman law gave permission for divorce for a great number of causes, including mutual consent. There were cases of great hardship frequently in the Christian community, and would the Church have been able to persist in its rigorist conception of marriage as against the laxer Roman view if it believed that Our Lord's words were only an ideal which would legitimately give way to any circumstances of human hardship or weakness?—Well, it seems to me that that is a hypothetical question which it is really impossible to give an answer to.

38,811. Then I will leave it there. With regard to what you say about the attitude of the Reformed Churches. You say in your proof that "Marriage is never regarded as a contract which can be broken by consent" in the Reformed Churches, "but as a relation of another kind which can only be impaired or destroyed by the guilty action of one or both of the parties to it. But by such guilty action (all the Reformed Churches hold) it can be impaired or destroyed." I would like to ask you two questions about that. When you speak of "all the Reformed Churches" you do not exclude the Church of England from the category of Reformed Churches, do you?—No, I do not think so.

38,812. You would not say that the Church of England had taken that position, would you?—What was in my mind, when I wrote, certainly was the Reformed Churches of the Continent, because I had been speaking immediately before of the Evangelischen Kirchen Ordnungen of the sixteenth century.

38,813. You said that their marriage relationship would be destroyed by the guilty action of one or both of the parties; but later on, on the following page, you say that there were many ordinances of the continental Reformers which justified divorce and remarriage for insanity, leprosy, or other incurable illness of a kind which made conjugal intercourse impossible?—I say these are the cases most frequently discussed.

38,814. Do you know of any instance in which insanity or leprosy or incurable illnesses of that kind were definitely held to be legitimate grounds for divorce in the Reformed community?—I am not prepared to say offhand whether there are or are not. What impressed me more in reading those ordinances was the perplexity of the writers in dealing with these cases than the actual decision of one case and another that they came to. On the whole I know they are against granting divorce for incurable disease.

38,815. That would include insanity, would it not?—In most cases I should say it would, yes; but perhaps I could provide, by consulting the documents again, some more precise information about that.

38,816. Perhaps you might add a note as to that to your evidence?—Yes, I will look into that. I am not positive about that fact.*

38,817. Then there is the point that has been before us a good deal with regard to the practice in Scotland. Did the Scottish Church ever expressly or formally base its acquiescence in regarding desertion as a legitimate ground for divorce on scriptural grounds?—Yes, the Westminster Confession in 1647 justifies divorce both for adultery and desertion on scriptural grounds.

38,818. One more question as to what you say with regard to your own opinion. "It is possible to distinguish between offences against the marriage relation and its duties by which the marriage as a natural and spiritual union is actually destroyed." I should like to ask whether the word "and" there is strict or whether yon would be prepared to use the word "or"?—I was thinking of marriage in all its aspects.

38,819. Would you go so far as to say, if circumstances arose that destroyed what you call the spiritual union in marriage, they would form a legitimate ground for divorce; or would you keep it to causes which affected the natural side?—I would keep them both together. Marriage is a spiritual union, and if that meant that people had difficulties in their temper, and so on, I would not grant a divorce for that.

38,820. (Lady Frances Balfour.) You twice say, in your print, that amongst the Jews only the husband could divorce his wife, and that the wife had no right, under any conditions, to divorce her husband. We had a witness yesterday who said that not for infidelity, but for disease and other things, a wife had a right under the Jewish law to divorce her husband?—Well, what I have given in this paper is only as to what scripture contains about divorce, and there is nothing to that effect in scripture. It may be the case that in the actual administration of Jewish law that is so.

38,821. That the actual practice of the Jews went a little further than their law?—I really do not know about that; it may be so. In scripture nothing is contemplated, except that the man is the head of the family; and certainly the man had the right to turn his wife to the door, but the wife had no corresponding right—or had the power, anyhow.

38,822. Then, on the point of desertion admitted by the Reformed Churches. Of course they felt that they were not going against scripture in permitting it for desertion?—As a rule, they thought they had ground in scripture for it.

38,823. On the ground that the contract was broken?—Well, that is mixing up two things. If you say they had scripture authority, the scripture authority must be taken by itself. If you say, on the other hand, that the contract was broken, that is not scripture authority, but authority in the nature of the case.

38,824. But does not scripture—underlying scripture—recognise the civil or the natural contract?—If you go to underlying scripture you have left the ground of scriptnre altogether. They must have said, Scripture is our authority, and that recognises divorce for desertion, and on the ground of scripture we recognise it too.

38,825. I think you said that Christ was laying down grounds under the conditions in which the Jews were then living when He spoke about divorce?—Yes, and He said that the only law of marriage is that marriage is indissoluble.

38,826. Recognising the Jewish contract or the Jewish form of law?—No, I should say it is a little confusing to introduce any particular law as that within which the words of Jesus were spoken. Jesus never speaks of any law except the law of God, and if you say that by the law of Christ marriage is indissoluble, it seems to me the only thing we can have in mind is this: The law of God is a moral law, and it can only be stated as a requirement. It cannot be stated as a datum. What God requires of all married people is that they should live in the marriage relationship purely and permanently. The divine requirement is a requirement of indissolubleness. Just because it is a moral requirement it may not be fulfilled; the laws of God may be violated and the marriage that ought to be indissoluble may be dissolved; it may be dissolved by adultery or by desertion or any other such matter, and the situations in which it is found to be dissolved are those for which the law has to take legal order the best way it can, and irrespective of whether it is Roman law or Jewish law or English law.

38,827. Under the moral law if one partner deserts the other that moral law cannot be fulfilled?—No, the law has been broken.

* A further examination of the documents shows that there is no consensus in them as to any grounds of divorce, except adultery and prolonged and malicious desertion.

38,828. Well, I use the word contract, but I think we are meaning the same thing. The conditions under which it was undertaken are broken, and therefore it is no use legislating for a condition which is gone?—Yes.

38,829. You cannot say it is indissoluble if it has not been fulfilled?—You cannot say it is indissoluble if it has been dissolved; but I do not understand how anyone can speak of indissolubleness as if it were a datum—something in the nature of the case instead of a requirement—something that is to be realised in the conduct of the people.

38,830. Then the Archbishop was drawing your attention to the natural and spiritual union. You cannot have a spiritual union without the conditions of the natural union being fulfilled?—No, I should say not. The whole thing is one.

38,831. (Lord Guthrie.) Professor, you say that anything which undermines the sanctity of marriage would be against the will of Christ. Do you think that divorce under the conditions which you have described does tend to undermine the sanctity of marriage?—No, I do not think so.

38,832. Do you think that to preserve the formal bond when the real bond has in fact broken down for such a cause we will say as adultery, tends to assist in preserving the sanctity of marriage?—I do not think so, although I quite agree with what one finds in a great many Church laws, that even in a case of so grave an offence against the law of marriage as that, room should be left for repentance, and for the possibility of reconciliation. I do not think there should be hasty divorce, but I do not think to maintain an imaginary vinculum when everything else has passed away is doing any real service.

38,833. Is it not the fact that those who think divorce a necessary remedy in certain cases are just as strong in their views of the sanctity of marriage and formal indissolubility of marriage as those who take the opposite—what I may call for shortness the Roman Catholic view?—I should think that is so. For my own part I frankly admit I have a great deal of sympathy with even Tertullian.

38,834. And have you the sympathy with Tertullian against re-marrying on the ground which was stated by a very eminent person, that he believed in the resurrection from the dead?—I do not know whether I could state all the grounds on which I think it or not, but I should say that that was part of the reason certainly.

38,835. In Scotland it is the practice, is it not, in the marriage service in the Presbyterian Church to use the words, "What God has joined together let no man put asunder"?—Yes, I have constantly used those words in marrying people.

38,836. Do you see any inconsistency in the use of those words by persons who believe that marriage is not absolutely indissoluble?—Not absolutely indissoluble? Do you mean do I see anything inconsistent in the use of those words in the case of a person who afterwards justifies divorce if the marriage has broken down?

38,837. Precisely?—No, I do not see anything inconsistent.

38,838. It has been suggested that no one who holds your views can consistently, or even intelligently, use those words with reference to marriage. Do you agree with that?—Not at all. As I said, I have married many people in my time, and I always say, "What God hath joined together let not man put asunder," which means that no human authority has any right to dissolve that tie. But that does not affect the fact that the persons themselves who have formed that tie, by a violation of God's law, break it themselves, and create a new situation with which the law has to deal in the ways that the law thinks fit.

38,839. Is it right to assume that certain conditions shall be fulfilled, fidelity amongst them?—Oh, yes.

38,840. And if that condition is not fulfilled and the marriage has, as you say, been broken, do you see any inconsistency in a remedy being provided such as you have indicated?—Not in the least.

38,841. In Scotland, are you aware, whether owing to our having had divorce for adultery or desertion for 350 years, there has been any prejudicial result in the way of affecting people's ideals and practice with regard to marriage?—I do not think so. As far as I have been in contact with people at all, I think people generally have the utmost possible reverence for the sanctity of the marriage relation.

38,842. Take the ordinary case where divorce results; you do not find it except in aggravated circumstances?—I do not think so. In the 12 years I was a minister I was only in contact with two cases of the kind, and they were both extremely aggravated cases; and in one of them divorce was sought and in the other it was not.

38,843. You have not found any tendency for light causes to what is called rush for the divorce court?—Never.

38,844. Have you found cases where, in the interests of the children, it would, perhaps, have been the duty of the wife to go and she would not?—I do not know. As I said, I have not had much experience at all, because the people that get into the divorce court are not the people who come to church.

38,845. But you have found both women and men enduring hard conditions where they might have had a remedy if they chose?—I think practically everybody endures a great deal before they think of such a remedy as divorce.

38,846. And, as far as you are aware, Professor, speaking only as an outsider, do you know any condition in England so different from Scotland that should produce in England a different result from what we find in Scotland?—I really do not know. I never have lived in England much.

38,847. No, I mean as far as you know?—I should think not as far as I have met and spoken with English people.

38,848. With regard to what you said that in Scotland the relation of the Church to divorce for desertion was obscure, you are referring, are you not, to the time of 1573 when the Act of Parliament was passed authorising divorce for desertion?—Yes, I mean between 1560 and the passing of the Act. There certainly seems to have been some want of understanding between the Church and the State at the time; but the situation created by the passing of the Act was certainly accepted by the Church after.

38,849. Yes, from 1560 to 1647 as far as Church law is concerned there was only the recognition of divorce for adultery in the terms of John Knox's views?—So I understand.

38,850. In short, the law of the State authorised divorce for desertion, but the law of the Church did not expressly do so?—I think so.

38,851. Notwithstanding that the Church accepted the law of the State and did not disable people who availed themselves of it?—So I understand, but I am not acquainted with the details.

38,852. After 87 years' experience of the working of the State law, it is the fact that the Church deliberately in 1647 put into its statutes divorce for desertion?—Yes, that is so.

38,853. You see it has been suggested that it was the influence of the Earl of Argyle in 1573 which brought about divorce for desertion. Could that have any effect in 1647?—I think that is impossible though it may be the fact that a person so great as the Earl of Argyle had influence in getting a change made in the law of 1573; but when in 1647 it was adopted as "In nothing contrary to the discipline and doctrine of this Church," I do not think it would have affected that.

38,854. And that confession was adjusted in London, of course?—Yes, I had that in view when I said the Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum represented a considerable body of English opinion, because out of the hundred members of the Westminster Confession only seven were Scotch and no less than 13 were heads of English Colleges.

38,855. You said that divorce for adultery was introduced in Scotland without any statute. What is your explanation of that?—I have no doubt they read the passage in St. Matthew as a statute, and thought they had the authority of the Word of God for acting directly in that way.

38,856. And if it be the fact that in 1560 there was a statute passed abolishing the Pope's jurisdiction, do you think it followed that they were free then to take their own view of what scripture meant?—Undoubtedly they would feel so and believe so.

38,857. Can there be any doubt, looking to the methods and views and practice of our forefathers in Scotland, that they must have thought that both divorce for adultery, in 1560, and divorce for desertion in 1647, were in accordance with scripture in the sense at least of being consistent with it?—Undoubtedly they thought so, because they put forward scripture in defence of both.

38,858. Now on page 7 of your proof you say, "The Protestant Churches are at one in holding that "while marriage is not dissoluble by mutual consent, "there are cases in which divorce, followed by a new "marriage, is lawful." You had in your mind, you said, primarily the Continental Churches?—Yes, I was thinking of them in the main.

38,859. Do you exclude the Church of England from that statement? Well, perhaps I ought to say I was not thinking about the Church of England when I made the statement at all.

38,860. Now you have told us about the Reformatio Legum; do you know the name of any English Reformer who did not take the view that marriage was dissoluble for adultery?—No, I did not make it part of my business to investigate the views of individuals so much as the documents.

38,861. You have referred to Cranmer. Do you know the name of any English Reformer who did not take that view that marriage was dissoluble for adultery?—I really do not know; but I do not claim to have any particular knowledge in that field.

38,862. It has been said, Professor, that the view taken in England by the English Reformers is traceable to continental influence, especially the influence of Peter Martyr and Martin Bucer?—I suppose that is quite credible in the sense that the Reformation in England generally was subsequent to the Reformation on the Continent, and influence across the sea told on this side.

38,863. Do you think it is any the worse for that?—No, I do not think so. I think Scotland has always been a little less insular than England.

38,864. Take another question. Suppose the English Reformation, so far as based on the great doctrine of justification by faith, was traceable to Luther; is it any the worse for that?—No, and ultimately it is traceable to St. Paul.

38,865. Do you think in short that the fact that continental influence may be discerned in both cases makes any difference as long as the English Reformers accepted the view that marriage was not indissoluble?—I do not see so at all. It does not seem to me to be of any interest where the idea came from.

38,866. Except historically?—Except historical interest.

38,867. As far as you know with regard to the Church of England, do you know anything in the Articles or Prayer Book of the Church of England which makes marriage in your sense indissoluble?—I should say that everything in the Articles or in the Prayer Book makes marriage indissoluble in my sense.

38,868. Yes, precisely—in your sense. Do you see anything that makes it indissoluble in the Roman Catholic sense?—I do not think so.

38,869. We have had quoted to us the words, "What "God hath joined together let no man put asunder." We have also had quoted to us that a man and wife take each other for better or for worse. Do you think that interferes with the view you have mentioned?—No, I think that quite agrees with the idea of the indissolubleness of marriage in the moral sense; but it does not prevent marriage being dissolved by the moral conduct of the people who have entered into it. It is no good quarrelling with facts.

38,870. Do you think the Article that speaks of marriage not being a sacrament points to marriage being absolutely indissoluble?—Probably not, but frankly I have never been able to see what people mean by speaking of marriage as a sacrament.

38,871. The Roman Catholic Church so considers it and bases their view on indissolubility partly on that ground?—Yes, but the indissolubleness of marriage based on Christ's teaching is not based on anything at all but the order and nature of creation.

38,872. The universal law?—Yes.

38,873. Can you in your own mind see any reasonable sense in which marriage is a sacrament. How do you understand it?—I do not understand it at all. I do not know what anybody means when he says marriage is a sacrament, or that even Christian marriage is a sacrament, if that is what is meant; and I do not believe that in Roman Catholic theology there is any coherent or consistent idea of what the sacrament of marriage is.

38,874. I suppose it is intelligible in the sense that it involves an oath, and in that sense it makes God a party to the contract?—Yes, that is intelligible; but that applies to every contract.

38,875. Exactly; if that is so, does that result in this, that when essential conditions entering into the relation have been broken the fact of an oath having been taken prevents the relation coming to an end?—I do not see it. I think the whole notion of a sacrament cannot have even approximate meaning in one's mind. If you take marriage out of the world of ethics and reason and try and imagine it having its being in some other world altogether, then I understand; but if it is a rational or moral relation, then it is what God requires—indissoluble—because it is a rational and moral relation, and people have no right to break it; but when wicked people have put asunder what God has joined, it brings it to an end.

38,876. I suppose in your life appointment if the Church thought you had adopted views that were quite inconsistent with your profession you would have to go?—Yes, and I hope I should.

38,877. It is an ad vitam aut culpam arrangement?—Yes; I do not think anything else is either rational or moral.

38,878. You referred to other causes beyond adultery being in the category of open questions. Is it your view that, looking to the whole material, scriptural and historical—taking the whole question of divorce—we have causes that may be justified within the region, that ought to be treated as open questions?—By open questions I mean questions on which men's minds were not made up on any definite principle. They were questions full of difficulties; there is nothing of which these ecclesiastical ordinances are more full than the recognition of the extreme difficulty and variety of the cases with which the judges had to deal. Every case was different, and they were in continual despair about getting rules and statutes which they could apply to such offences with any sense that they were doing justice.

38,879. Of course, if you thought that Christ had laid down an inflexible law of absolute indissolubility you would feel bound to follow it?—Yes, I presume I would, only my whole conception of what Christ is would be totally changed if I could imagine Him laying down statutes which were to be administered in a civil State.

38,880. On any subject?—On any subject.

38,881. Can you see any reason why if, as is universally admitted, He did not usually lay down statutes He should have made one exception in this case of marriage and divorce?—I do not see it.

38,882. You see it is said here that you have definiteness that is not to be found in the other cases. Do you agree with that as contrasted with "Swear not at all," for instance?—No, I think Christ treats the Seventh Commandment just as he treats the others "It was said to them of old time, thou shalt not "commit adultery; but I say unto you that every "one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath "committed adultery with her already in his heart." Nobody would make a statute of that, and one has no more right to make a statute of "To send away your "wife is to break the Seventh Commandment." Of course, it is, unless in the case, as the Evangelist implies, the Seventh Commandment has been broken already.

38,883. Then your view would dissent from the Quakers when they say, "Swear not at all," is to be taken absolutely?—Quite.

38,884. Would you also dissent from the absoluteness of the Capital Punishment Abolition Society, who think "Thou shalt not kill" is absolute?—Quite.

38,885. Can you suggest any cause for divorce which in your view would not be in accordance with Christian principle?—I should think there are endless causes of divorce which would not be in accordance with Christian principle—people who had friction with one another just over their domestic arrangements, or their finances, or the management of their children, or people who have grown tired of one another. I do not think anything really respects the sanctity of marriage which grants divorce for a cause less than a cause that hurts the very life of marriage.

38,886. Would you exclude entirely divorce at the will of one of the parties?—The mere caprice of one of the parties?

38,887. Yes?—Oh yes.

38,888. You think that in every case there must be a serious cause bringing the marriage relation reasonably to an end?—Yes, that is what I meant to indicate.

38,889. And that that must be ascertained by a competent Court?—Yes. By the way that is one of the points on which in all these ecclesiastical ordinances stress is laid—that people are not to divorce themselves, and that, however grave their ground for applying for liberty to marry again is, it must be proved before a Court, and even if a man's wife has committed adultery and runs away and lives with somebody else, if he marries before he gets the permission of the Court he is himself guilty of adultery, and is punished as an adulterer. Precaution is always taken against self divorce.

38,890. It would involve proof before a competent Court with notice to the accused party and opportunity to defend of course?—Yes, and that is especially provided for in cases of divorce for desertion—that the deserting party is always to be summoned and every kind of effort made to bring him to reason.

38,891. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You realise, Dr. Denney, I gather that the question of the dissolubility of marriage is a very difficult one?—I did not catch.

38,892. You realise, do you not—I gather that from the whole of your evidence—that the question of whether divorce ought or ought not to be allowed is a very difficult one?—A very difficult one, yes. I mean it is difficult to determine in what cases it ought or ought not to be allowed.

38,893. Now, Lord Guthrie has examined you with regard to the sacramental view of marriage, and you have said that you do not understand it?—I do not.

38,894. And I think Lord Guthrie said he did not understand it; therefore, that perhaps does not render it easy for you to discuss it on that basis?—Well, I would say impossible.

38,895. But you realise, do you not, that there is a very large body of opinion now, and always has been, which without regarding marriage as a sacrament still regards it as bound by our Lord's words, using His words in a statutory sense, you recognise, do you not, that there is a very large body of opinion which regards the subject from that point of view?—That treats the words of Jesus as statutory?

38,896. Yes?—Oh yes, I know there is.

38,897. And that is altogether independent of any notion of whether marriage is a sacrament or not?—Yes, I quite admit that.

38,898. So I suggest that for clearness we can in this discussion put out the Roman Catholic's view of marriage as a sacrament and discuss it as you have discussed it, on the basis of what is the real significance of Our Lord's words?—Yes, I think that is quite practicable.

38,899. And I suppose there is another consideration; as to what is really for the public good in the matter?—Yes, I think the family is the ethical unit and is always the one thing to be considered.

38,900. And I suppose from the point of view of Christian men we are entitled, are we not, to look upon Our Lord's teaching as indicating to us what is for the public good?—No doubt.

38,901. Therefore, if Our Lord's words ought rightly to be interpreted as prohibiting divorce, or only allowing it in the one case of adultery, that ought to have weight with us, ought it not, on the ground of promoting the public good?—Yes, but the two suppositions in the question, first, that Our Lord does prohibit divorce; secondly, that He prohibits it for every cause but one, are both ambiguous and need to be discussed.

38,902. Oh, I quite realise that you do not take either of those views of Our Lord's words. I only put that as a supposition?—I have no doubt that obedience to Our Lord's words in the sense that He used them is altogether for the good of society.

38,903. Now, coming back to Our Lord's words, I am not going to discuss them with you—I am not competent to do so—but when you say that the words of Our Lord recorded in St. Matthew and the words recorded in St. Mark and St. Luke represent one and the same saying of Jesus you do that no doubt being aware that many competent critics do not hold that view, but think they refer to separate sayings of Our Lord?—I know that is so, but I have not a shred of doubt in my own mind that the mind of Christ on this subject was one and that it was the same saying that is represented in those passages.

38,904. I follow that is your view. Dr. Sanday was here yesterday, and with a great deal of caution and moderation he indicated to us that in his view they were probably two sayings. You would agree that it is a point of view which must be taken account of?—Then may I ask which are the two sayings?

38,905. I beg your pardon?—You say that there are two sayings by Jesus. May I ask which two sayings you mean?

38,906. I am not competent to express any view myself, but I think the view Dr. Sanday put to us was that the passage in St. Matthew, which indicates an exception, might be a different word of Our Lord's pronounced under different circumstances.

(Chairman.) May I say with deference I doubt if that is right.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) It certainly is right.

(Chairman.) And I have asked the Archbishop.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I am very sorry your Lordship should think it necessary to interrupt me.

(Chairman.) Well, is it necessary to discuss what He said; is it not better to get what this witness wishes to say?

38,907. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) As the Chairman desires it, I propose to read exactly what Dr. Sanday did say. Of course, you understand this is part of a long memorandum. It is on page 9. "We are now confronted directly with the necessity of deciding (so far as it is possible for us to decide) upon the probabilities as to what Our Lord really said and meant. Now, I am well aware that this is often treated as a sharp alternative. Did Our Lord speak in the terms attributed to Him by St. Mark, St. Luke, and St. Paul? Or did He speak substantially in the sense of the two passages from the Gospel of St. Matthew?" That is really an answer to your question, "We are invited to make an absolute choice between these propositions. I may be wrong; I have been charged before this with a tendency to combine things that are really incompatible. I am certainly tempted to incur this risk on the present occasion. I ask myself whether it is not possible that Our Lord might in certain circumstances and under certain conditions lay down a principle of general application, and in other circumstances and under conditions state that principle with a certain amount of restriction. I should myself be inclined to answer this question in the affirmative. The difference seems to me to be between a positive rule and a moral ideal. To me it appears to be quite possible and not really inconsistent, on the one hand to state a principle in broad and general terms, and, on the other hand, when it became a question of translating

" that principle into a definite concrete rule to import " into it a certain amount of limitation " ? — Well, what I should say in answer to that, and in dissenting, as I feel bound to do with great respect——

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I hope you do not think I misrepresented Dr. Sanday's view.

(Chairman.) I still think he did not suggest that there were two sayings but two different records.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) It is extremely difficult to discuss a matter of that kind while examining a witness.

(Chairman.) But you put it as if that was distinctly Dr. Sanday's view.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) May I remind your Lordship that when I examined Dr. Sanday I asked him if that was or was not the meaning of that passage, and he told me quite definitely that it was.

(Witness.) Then may I indicate what my mind is about that particular point? Dr. Sanday says that Our Lord may at one time have expressed Himself with absolute generality—have stated a moral ideal—and on another occasion He may have given a positive rule that contained a qualification. Now the thing to notice is this. If you take the very same occasion (because the same occasion is certainly recorded in the two Gospels)—the occasion on which the people came to Jesus and asked Him the question about the legitimacy of divorce (which is recorded in the x. Mark and the same incident in the xix. Matthew)—in the x. Mark Jesus answers without any qualification; in the xix. Matthew He answers the very same question on the very same occasion with a qualification. It is not Our Lord speaking on two different occasions and saying different things; but He is speaking on the same occasion, answering the same question, and the one Evangelist records the unqualified answer and the other records it with a qualification.

38,908. As I say, I am not in the least degree competent to discuss the matter with you; but the only point I want to bring your attention to is what I think you will admit, that it is possible to take two different views, and that your very direct and categorical statement that these two passages refer to one and the same occasion is open to a difference of view?—With all respect on this particular point I do not.

38,909. I do not know whether it is necessary, but my friend, Judge Tindal Atkinson, shows me a statement further on in Dr. Sanday's proof, "It may be " well to remind ourselves that there are two distinct " questions: (1) Does the use by Our Lord of unquali- " fied language on one occasion absolutely preclude " the possibility that He should have used qualified " language upon another?"—Well, what I have been pointing out is that the two occasions are unequivocally the same.

38,910. I quite follow that that is your view?—Excuse me, I do not put that forward as my view. I should like to know whether anybody could possibly dissent from the view that the x. Mark and the xix. Matthew are accounts of the same incident in the life of Jesus when he was put the same question by the same people and gave the same answer, and gave the same scriptural ground for the answer; and in one case it is recorded with the qualification and in the other without the qualification.

(The Archbishop of York.) I think what Sir Lewis has in his mind is that the difference in the occasions between St. Matthew xix. 9 and St. Mark x. and the words of Our Lord in St. Matthew v. 32, which is part of the Sermon on the Mount.

(Witness.) Then I say that the words in St. Matthew v. are like the words in St. Matthew xix. St. Matthew on each occasion gives the words with the qualification. St. Luke on the only occasion he gives the words gives them without qualification. St. Mark has no qualified statement and St. Matthew has no unqualified statement.

38,911. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Your view is that it is symptomatic of the general treatment by the two Evangelists of their narratives. One puts things in a qualified way and the other in an unqualified way. Is not that it?—Well, that is what has happened on this particular occasion. As I say in my proof, the first Evangelist collected the words of Jesus—a great mass—and collected them first for catechetical and disciplinary use in the Church, and he involuntarily gives them a little turn that a lawyer must give to words when he is going to bring them down to practical application.

38,912. Likewise then you say that to take Our Lord's words as statutory can hardly be doubted to be wrong. It is on the first page. There again, although you have put that quite poistively, do not you realise that there are a great many people for whom you would have great respect who do very seriously doubt whether Our Lord's words ought not to be taken in a statutory sense?—Yes, I know there are people who think so, of course.

38,913. So that perhaps in writing more deliberately you would not put that quite in that form—that it can hardly be doubted that that is wrong?—No, I should never want to put it less strongly than I have put it. I am quite sure that to read Matthew as giving the words of Jesus in full and to read them in a statutory sense sanctioning divorce in one case, excluding it in the other, and overruling the unqualified exclusion of it in the other reports—I am quite certain that is wrong. It is a mistake.

38,914. Although you realise that there are other people whose judgments are worth consideration who think otherwise?—Yes, I am not going to dispute that, but it does not affect my judgment.

38,915. Now, if I may ask you about one or two matters that are historical. You say on the top of page 5 of my copy that the indissolubility of marriage, in the Church view as to that, was not formerly defined as the law of the Church till the Council of Trent?—Yes.

38,916. I quite follow that statement, but you would admit, would you not, that long, long before the Council of Trent it was settled Church law which the Church administered that marriage was indissoluble?—Oh, yes, practically that was so.

38,917. Not only practically; it was a matter of established Canon law?—Well, I should say the quotation I give from Cardinal Cajetan, who died in 1534 after the Reformation was well under weigh, but before the Council of Trent, proves that it is not so.

38,917*a*. Must not we separate in all these things the academic view of particular authorities and the law which they and other people at that time were equally bound to obey—the law of the Church—I mean?—Yes, I have no doubt that Cardinal Cajetan, who was one of the strongest opponents of the Reformation, acted under the conviction that marriage was indissoluble in the Roman Catholic sense, and yet he says here, " I am of opinion, therefore, by this law of Christ " that it is lawful for a Christian to dismiss his wife " for the adultery (fornicatio carnalis) of his wife and " to be able to take another wife; salva semper ecclesiæ " definitione, which heretofore has not appeared," and there is no decision of the Church on the subject.

38,918. By which he meant not that a man could do it properly then, but that the law ought to be such that he could do it. Was not that his view?—That is not what he says anyhow.

38,919. Would you dissent from the view stated by Pollock and Maitland in their history of English law—of course this had to do with England—and the editors say on this question, in talking about a Jewish marriage, " This, however, was a rare exception to a very general " rule, and for the rest the only divorce known to the " Church was that of a mensa et thoro, which, while it " discharged the husband and wife from the duty of " living together, left them husband and wife "?—That is practically the universal custom.

38,920. Would you say custom or law?—I do not know what is the difference, not being a lawyer, sufficiently.

38,921. Well, I do not want to go into what seem to you minute distinctions. To me it seems very different. Now you mentioned several Councils there—you have omitted it in reading it, for shortness—the Canons of which were more or less loose in the view of divorce, and were loose in the sense of marriage being indissoluble. You would not say, would you, that those Councils you have referred to are typical of the views taken by the Councils during the Conciliar period?—I think they are typical of the Councils held in Western Europe in the centuries mentioned.

38,922. But are they typical of the views of Councils——?—These Canons are the only means we have of knowing the views of the Councils.

38,923. But you mentioned all, as far as I know, where the loose view is taken?—I did not choose them on that principle at all. I read through all the Canons of the Councils in the six volumes of Hefele's work with regard to marriage, and I say that the Church had an ideal in its mind——

38,924. Yes, I follow that, Professor; but let me refer you for one moment to the three Councils you have mentioned of Verberies and Compiègne and Bourges. Were those all Frankish Councils?—Yes.

38,925. And are not they referred to constantly in books on these subjects as Councils that took an exceptional view, which was overruled by subsequent Councils such as the Council of Rouen?—I do not know what you mean by calling it an exceptional view They took the only view that it was possible for them to take in the state of society with which they had to deal. They did their best with thoroughly refractory materials.

38,926. But is it not a fact that the decisions that those Councils came to on this point differed absolutely from the later Councils such as the Council of Rouen?—Yes, that is to say, at a later period, the Church was able to enforce its ideal more completely.

38,927. I suppose the particular Councils you have mentioned were not Ecumenical Councils?—No, they were all local Councils.

38,928. Provincial Councils?—Yes.

38,929. It would be like comparing the recent decision of Convocation on Prayer Book Reform with a resolution of a Ruri-decanal Conference?—I am afraid I do not know. They do not suggest anything to my mind.

38,930. You know so much, Professor, that I thought you would know what a Ruri-decanal Conference was. Now, you mentioned the letter of Pope Gregory the Second to Boniface. Is it quite right to refer to that as a normal incident in Church history? Was it not a most startling and, to this day, inexplicable phenomenon—that letter?—Yes, just as startling and inexplicable as Luther giving permission for the marriage of Philip Landgrave Hesse with Margaret de Sala, his first wife being alive, and I do not give it as being normal but as an illustration of the extremely difficult things that actually emerged, and that cannot be decided on abstract principles, and which people have to take the responsibility of deciding even though they make mistakes.

38,931. Gratian, in compiling the Decretum, altogether repudiates that letter of Gregory?—Yes.

38,932. Now, in the next paragraph you refer—if I may say so, very naturally—to the impediments that were made use of under Canon law before the Reformation for putting an end to marriage. Have your researches enabled you to say whether, in fact, marriages were very often put an end to in that way. Let me explain what I mean. I mean was there a body of litigation of that kind, comparable, for instance, to the number of divorces in England now-a-days in a year?—I do not know about that—in that form. The statement I made about that is based on the statement in the Apology to the Augsburg Confession.

38,933. I am not quarrelling with your statement a bit, but I want to know whether you are aware that there were really a great many marriages dissolved—whether it was a widespread thing in practice. If I may trespass once more upon your patience, the reason I ask that is because I have had recently to look into that a great deal myself, and I cannot find in England any trace that there was a very large number of those cases?—Well, it is not possible for me to express any opinion about it at all from the point of view of the person who has investigated legal registers to see what traces the cases have left behind them; but there are the strongest possible statements made by people who lived under that system to the effect that the condition of things made it impossible for them to say whether anybody was married or not.

38,934. Those were statements made by people who had already got into trouble about their marriage and wanted to get out of it?—I do not think that can be said with regard to the Apology for the Augsburg Confession, or the one I have quoted from Mr. Bryce.

38,935. You have been asked already, and I did not quite gather your answer; but you do definitely exclude England from the Reformed countries, where divorce was allowed, I suppose. I mean this is not a matter of opinion but a matter of fact, I should have thought?—I know that as far as laws of divorce are concerned, England stands in a different position from the continental Reformed countries and from Scotland too.

38,936. Then you speak of the Reformatio Legum, and you say that it had a large amount of public support: "Had the support of a great body of Reformed opinion in England." You have told us that is partly founded on the number of English delegates who helped to form the Westminster Confession. Is there any other ground for that view?—Nothing beyond the fact that it is connected with the name of men like Cranmer and certainly represented a great body of reformed opinion at that time.

38,937. Yes, it is connected with Cranmer and connected with Peter Martyr?—Yes.

38,938. Who, of course, was not an Englishman. Is it connected with anybody else that you know of?—It is connected also with Archbishop Parker, but the amount of Parker's connection with it seems to be quite disputable.

38,939. How is it connected with Archbishop Parker? I quite remember that he was one of the Commission as a young man, but we do not know what part he took, or if he took any part then. At some time he seems to have revised Crammer's draft, and in later years to have allowed the publication of the Reformatio. But his relation to the whole affair is obscure, is it not?—I am not in a position to say that he took any part in publishing it. I know his name is often connected with it; on what foundation I do not know.

38,940. That statement is not founded on a particular knowledge of the point?—No.

38,941. With regard to Archbishop Cranmer, his views varied a good deal, did they not, on this question?—You mean the question of divorce?

38,942. You have mentioned him in connection with the Reformatio Legum?—Yes.

38,943. May I remind you of what I have no doubt you know already, of what he wrote in 1540—that was some years after the Act under which the Reformatio was first initiated—to Ossiander; it is in the Parker Society book. It is a long letter. I am reading from a translation, but he said this in the course of it: "What can possibly be alleged in your "excuse when you allow a man after a divorce, while "both man and woman are living, to contract a fresh "marriage"?—Well, I suppose a man who lives through a Reformation does change his mind on a lot of things.

38,944. That is your only answer to that. You are quoting Cranmer as a great representative of reformed opinion, and I suggest to you he is not a very good type because he varied so much?—Well, I should think it would be difficult to quote any man who lived through the Reformation age who did not change his mind about many things.

38,945. But if you are at liberty to quote the Reformatio as showing that it had the support of Reformed opinion, I suppose I am at liberty to quote the letter to Ossiander as showing what the Reformed opinion was then. I suggest that neither of us can quote him, and that Cranmer was not typical?—Well, I should think that even in his inconsistency Cranmer was probably typical.

38,946. Has your experience taken you very much amongst the poor?—Not a great deal.

38,947. You were asked your opinion upon what the effect of widening the law of divorce would be on society. But what one wonders is what effect it would have upon the very poor, who, of course, look at all these questions in a very simple way—I mean they cannot go into very fine distinctions. Do not you think the mere fact that divorce could be obtained for a great many more reasons than formerly would make them look upon marriage as a less necessarily permanent state?—Well, there are two things I should say to that. First, I do not know that anybody contemplates making divorce possible for a great many various reasons; and the second would be, that I really have not had any such contact with cases in which people were divorced at all, or were contemplating divorce, as enables me to say anything on the basis of experience about that.

38,948. Then I will not pursue it, but I take it your general view is that though marriage is indissoluble as an ideal, if the marriage has broken down, then that fact ought to be recognised by divorce with power to re-marry?—That fact I should say is a fact the law may be bound to take cognisance of and to deal with in any way that seems satisfactory or efficient. I do not say always by divorce, but I do not say divorce is precluded, either.

38,949. Now you have told us you have very often married people in Scotland. Do you have a service for it or is it left to the discretion of the clergyman?—Well, formally it is left to the discretion of the clergyman, but practically all ministers in Scotland do use the same form of service. I mean there is a book of service issued for all sorts of Church functions, the use of which is optional, but in effect everybody uses it.

38,950. Have you anything corresponding to the vow which is adminstered under the English Service; first to the husband and then to the wife?—Yes.

38,951. Do you at all remember the form of it?—Yes, I have married people scores of times, and I always say to them, "Do you, A.B., take this woman whom you now hold by the hand to be your lawful wedded wife, and do you promise before God and these witnesses to be a loving and faithful husband to her till God shall separate you by death"; and I say something corresponding to that to the woman.

38,952. So that a very real prominent part of that vow is that they are to love one another?—Certainly.

38,953. Now supposing the marriage breaks down by their ceasing to love one another altogether; they are both satisfied of that, and their neighbours are and everybody is, and they want a divorce; ought not they to have it?—I should say a marriage could not break down in respect of their ceasing to love one another without breaking down in ways that are capable of proof. I would never grant a divorce to people who could only say their affection had cooled.

38,954. Why not, if you are satisfied of the fact?—But I would not be satisfied of the fact except by things of another kind than the cooling of affection.

38,955. Is that a right way of dealing with the question. Surely it is conceivable you might be satisfied that a man and his wife had ceased to love one another irrespective of their own admission—without proof of adultery or of desertion or madness or penal servitude—I am just giving the grounds which are proposed, you know?—Well, I should not contemplate it certainly, and I do not think anybody in the world could contemplate divorce for such a reason.

38,956. I thought you would say that, but I want to know why. The marriage has broken down, and therefore it seems to come under the principle which you have laid down?—The marriage has broken down in one particular, and perhaps every marriage breaks down in one particular; but it has not broken down fatally so as to cease to be. There is no reason why people whose affection for one another has quite died away should not live in the same house and care for the same family and regulate the life of a family in common.

38,957. But has it not broken down when the main condition of the vow that was put to them when they were married is broken?—The main condition?

38,958. A loving husband you told me?—Yes, a loving and faithful husband. But when you say love has ceased to be, you interpret love as if it were only an emotion. If a man promises to be a loving husband to his wife, it is not only his emotion that he promised, but a whole set of complex duties, and as long as he is living with her and providing for her, and the family is being brought up in accordance with the laws of society, the marriage has not broken down.

38,959. But, suppose he is not living in those conditions. Suppose he is living in such a condition that he and his wife sit at the same table, but do not speak to one another, but he does not strike her, and he gives to her money for the household and so on, but the condition is an unloving condition, is it not broken down?—It has broken down very seriously, but not for the purposes of society irremediably, and the interest of society is a thing that always has to be taken into consideration.

38,960. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Do I understand you to be of opinion, Professor, that the guilty parties should be allowed to remarry after divorce. I rather gather from your proof that you think they ought to be at liberty to remarry?—That is a question that, in point of fact, all churches almost have evaded an opinion about. Certainly, the general rule was to forbid the guilty person remarrying. Very often the guilty person was sentenced to some severe punishment, but in practice—not so much in the Church, as the law passed out of the hands of the Church in all foreign countries—in the State owing to the difficulty of distributing the guilt between the parties, and the undesirability of having people living in relations identical with marriage, except that the law did not recognise them—because of that it has become common to allow the guilty to remarry too.

38,961. But what is your opinion on the subject?—My opinion is that you can do no nothing happy—in either case. It is bad that it should be and bad that it should not be, but which is worse perhaps depends on circumstances. I do not think I have any very strong opinion about it.

38,962. Supposing that the scriptures forbade divorce without any qualification or exception, is there anything in the scriptures which justifies judicial separation?—I do not think so. I think judicial separation is an entirely artificial idea which does not belong to the world with which scripture deals at all.

38,963. Then taking the words of St. Paul, are they construed without qualification—"that the wife depart not from her husband"?—I should say again in I. Corinthians vii. 10–11 St. Paul has the law of Christ before him that marriage is indissoluble, and probably has some case in which people have separated in Corinth, and he says separations are not things to be encouraged, and let people take time and have a chance to be reconciled.

38,964. I take it that the words mean to desert or leave her husband so far as the wife is concerned, because she would not be entitled to marry again; and that the words that the husband leave not his wife refer to the husband divorcing his wife and not putting her away, If the first words are construed unconditionally—that is, that the wife depart not from her husband—would that lead to the condition of things that if the husband was living in adultery, the wife would be compelled to condone that adultery by not leaving the husband—if you construe it strictly?—No, I certainly should not read the passage so. I do not think there is anything in it further than this. Jesus says that marriage ought to be indissoluble, and therefore people ought not to leave one another. If they do leave on impulse, hasty or bitter—well, let them be reconciled.

38,965. You do not mean that St. Paul would say a wife was compelled to live with a husband although he is living in adultery?—Oh, certainly not.

38,966. Nor that the husband should not put away his wife when she is living in adultery?—No, I do not think those were the situations contemplated in St. Paul's words at all.

38,967. (Chairman.) May I just ask one or two questions for information, Dr. Denney. You referred to the Westminster Confession of Faith. I have had a memorandum supplied me upon that, and I want to ask you whether it is correct, and whether the names that are in it are, in your recollection, also correct.

There is a chapter in the Westminster Confession of Faith headed "Marriage and Divorce," and I think it is the fifth or sixth article that provides for the case of adultery and desertion being permissible grounds of divorce. I have them copied here?—I should think that is right, but I do not remember. Yes, chapter xxiv., section 6.

38,968. Section 6 is the first?—Yes.

38,969. I see section 5 is also on the same subject?—Yes.

38,970. It deals with adultery?—Yes, but section 6 is, I suppose, adultery and desertion.

38,971. I just want to ask you about that. Was that adopted by the Church of Scotland in 1647?—Yes.

38,972. And ratified by Act of Parliament in Scotland in 1690?—Yes, at the Revolution Settlement.

38,973. You said it was originally formulated in England at a meeting at Westminster?—Yes, that is true.

38,974. And you said there were a number of English divines upon it?—There were seven Commissioners from Scotland, and all the rest, of which there were over a hundred, were from England.

38,975. Fourteen were Doctors of Divinity; are those all English or partly Scotch?—I really could not answer off-hand. Any edition of the Confession contains a list of the members at the beginning with their titles.

38,976. My note is that the Confession "included "Arrowsmith and Tuckney, Professors of Divinity at "Cambridge; Dr. Hoyle, Professor of Divinity at "Oxford; and such scholars as Twisse, Lightfoot, "Coleman, Calamy, Godwin, and Gataker among the "English clerical members; and Gillespie and Ruther-"ford among the Scotch. During the period of the "sittings John Selden was one of the English lay "members"?—Yes, one of the leading and most impracticable members.

38,977. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Impracticable?—That is what the Presbyterians say.

38,978. (Chairman.) Is that substantially correct?—I think so.

38,979. Then I want to ask you one other matter. You were asked about some of the Councils which apparently came to different conclusions. I think you said that was so?—Yes.

38,980. Was it the Decretum of Gratium at about 1100 and something—I forget the exact date—which largely influenced the unanimity at that time or at a later time?—I really do not know. I agree with the gentleman who put the questions that the ideal in the mind of the Church was always the idea of indissolubleness in this sense, that the Church was working towards it; but it had to do a great many compromising things in the course of human history, and consented to do them.

38,981. Would it be right to say at the time of Gratian it comes more into uniformity throughout?—Yes.

38,982. Or by the time of his Decretum?—By that time, anyhow.

38,983. Then you used the expression "formally defined in the Council of Trent"?—Yes.

38,984. That means the actual formal definition?—Yes.

38,985. Then one other matter. You refer in paragraph 4 of the ninth page of your paper to the destruction of the natural and spiritual union?—Yes.

38,986. Will you just explain to me what in your view is the spiritual union if death terminates marriage and remarriage is allowed with some other person. I have a difficulty in conceiving myself the spirituality of it?—When I said spiritual, I was thinking of a man and woman as being spiritual beings whose union is naturally a communion of thoughts and emotions and sympathies and so on.

38,987. Nothing that adhered after death?—No, I was not thinking of it in that sense—natural and spiritual in the sense that a man is a natural and spiritual being at the same time.

38,988. Then you were asked about treating the precepts or sayings in the Gospels in the nature of law as distinct from an indication of what should be moral conduct. Have you noticed that there is no reference in any way to the interests of children in any of the sayings. Would that or not affect in your view the question of whether what has been laid down was something moral as distinct from something of a legislative character?—I should say that the words of Jesus which make indissolubleness a moral law of marriage are the greatest possible security for the interests of the children, though the children are not specially mentioned.

38,989. But you have already said, I think, that it does not amouut to legislation?—No, I do not think there is a single word in the sayings of Jesus that you could lift and put into the statute book, and they are not statutes in this sense—that they can be enforced by sanctions, or the violation of them be punished with penalties. There is nothing in them but an appeal to the moral nature of man.

(Chairman.) I should like to thank you, Professor Denney, for your very valuable evidence and for the statement you have presented, and also for the trouble you have taken in preparing it.

Professor JAMES POUNDER WHITNEY called and examined.

38,990. (Chairman.) You are Professor of Ecclesiastical History at King's College, London?—Yes.

38,991. How long have you held the office?—Eighteen months.

38,992. And before that?—Before that I lived at Cambridge for three years, working there; and for five years I was Principal of Bishop's College, Lennoxville, in Canada; and before that I had been in two or three different parishes in England; and for five years I was Lecturer in History at the Victoria University in Manchester.

38,993. You have been good enough to prepare a memorandum on the Continental Reformers and Divorce arising out of the New Testament passages?—Yes.

38,994. Might I say that a good deal of it is quotation from a number of the authors whom you refer to, and that, if you think it will be sufficient, I should like to treat the paper as in, and the print to be before us as part of your evidence; and I will therefore content myself with asking you to take the first part, and read that as showing the general lines on which you are dealing with this subject. Afterwards we can leave the rest to be printed?—That would be at the end of page 283.

38,995. Yes; I do not know that it will be necessary to go as far as that even. But the first part is your own?—Yes, my Lord.

"Many Continental Reformers wrote on marriage and divorce and matters arising out of them. So far as their treatment was founded upon the New Testament they were greatly influenced by Erasmus—in his annotations upon the New Testament (St. Matt. xix. and 1 Corinth. vii.). Erasmus also treated the matter in his controversy with Lee, afterwards Archbishop of York, and in his Responsio ad Phimostomus. But their treatment was also largely affected by the course of events. In the outburst of individualism, and the reaction against existing Church authority, these writers gave undue prominence to points of the controversy with Rome: these received naturally more attention than was proportionally their share. Thus Zwingli's attention to clerical marriage draws him away from other aspects of marriage. Attacks upon the estimation of marriage as a sacrament were very likely to lower its estimation, and incidentally these writings show that as time went on it was necessary to lay greater stress upon the sanctity of marriage. Individual differences may also be noticed in the attitude taken by individual writers towards the existing regulation of marriage and the Canon law. Some, like Melanchthon, Peter Martyr, and Beza treat of these at length, and attach importance to their illustrations. Roman law is also often discussed.

"The magnitude of the revolution attempted by the Continental Reformers should not be overlooked. Existing marriage laws were overturned: the share of the State and of the Church in the new system was not only important theoretically but practically: the difficulty of determining these respective shares increased disorder. Lutherans and Calvinists took different views here, and, as usual, the Calvinist system was practically superior. The importance of the Zürich legislation in illustrating the change is great. This special legislation was not held very effective.

"Another point of interest is the stress laid upon Old Testament examples. Reforming theologians, no less than Cardinal Cajetan,* were drawn into discussions upon the legality of polygamy for Christians, or its occasional possibility by dispensation or otherwise."

That is the same scholar you have been discussing this morning.

38,996. Yes, Professor Denney referred to him?—Yes.

"The bigamy carried out by Philip of Hesse and suggested for Henry VIII throws light upon the morals of the day. Beza finds it necessary to reject the loose views of Bernardino Ochino, and that this was not a mere literary question the well-known practices of the Anabaptists show us. There were among writers all gradations from strictness to laxity: public opinion would thus find it difficult to form itself upon the teachings of reforming theologians. Upon their accepted principles of Biblical interpretation it was difficult to dismiss at once polygamy as impossible for Christians. Bucer, for instance, considers all parts of the Bible as equally authoritative.

"It is necessary for completeness to say something upon the moral background of these writers. In the opinion of those most competent to form an opinion, the sixteenth century was a time of moral decline. Times of revolution are rarely favourable to morals, and evidence from all sides, not least from the treatises here referred to, shows the sixteenth century to be no exception. It was also an age of great economic change: the old ecclesiastical courts, which had so long dealt with moral offences, were getting out of gear, losing authority, or being abolished. Accepted standards were criticised, and morality, so far as it was founded upon practice and custom, began to appear uncertain. This was the general social and political background of theological discussion. The sixteenth century was a time of low practical morality.

"As regards New Testament interpretation, the views of Erasmus, as noted before, were mostly followed. Christ was held to have restricted the licence of the Jews, by assigning only one cause for divorce, namely, adultery: this exception was made because adultery was diametrically opposed to the nature of marriage. There was, however, a divergency of opinions as to whether the mention of this one cause excluded others, or whether it was not typical, and so might be held to cover other causes such as desertion and crimes. The different views of marriage, as on the one hand a sacrament, and, at any rate, having some sacramental force, or, on the other hand, a mere contract even if raised above other contracts by its holiness, underlay these discussions. The treatment by Luther, Peter Martyr, and Beza illustrate this. In most cases divorce was held to allow remarriage: opinions varied as to the weight given to the merely physical objects of marriage. On the extension to be given to divorce there was also a difference in details.

"The relations between the State and the Church in regard to principles and jurisdiction were largely discussed. The Lutherans, as usual, conceded much to the State. Hence a difference between the Christian ideal and the practice enforced by the State might exist, although it was a difference Christians must view with disfavour. But the tendency to regard the teaching of Christ as an ideal, to which it was difficult, in such evil days, to approach, led to an "economy." In the view of later Lutheran commentators the regulations of the Church cannot reach the ideal: as the majority of its members are in the position of the Old Testament people regarding morality and marriage the Church must tend towards Old Testament practice. As the application of New Testament teaching is likely to do harm to unconverted and unregenerate people the Church may permit divorce and remarriage, thus admitting for the bulk of its members a modification of our Lord's teaching. Hence although more conservative theologians kept to the older views, preferring separation without remarriage, there was no clear line of principle drawn. Divorce with liberty of remarriage gradually superseded separation, a process illustrated by the history of German law. But this process was thus related to theological thought. The old view of the Church was that of a body intended to teach and enforce the Christian ideal. The Lutherans held that the Church was to teach and exhort, but the practical enforcement of morals, and the fixing of the standard, lay with the State, and the decision of the State had validity. The Calvinists, however, considered that the State must take its ideal of morals from the Church. This was the line of division between the two bodies of reformers. Among the commentators the exception of adultery as a cause for divorce was held to be merely typical: desertion—one of the other causes admitted—was capable of wide extension. Liberty of divorce, it has been said, was a product of the Reformation.

"The views of the Continental Reformers have great historic interest, apart from their merits or demerits. The course of marriage legislation in Germany, and the extension of divorce in the United States, have been plausibly ascribed to their influence. Further, the height of continental influence upon the English Reformation is marked by the production of the Reformatio Legum, which in its proposed legislation upon marriage and divorce resembled the continental schemes. On the other hand the very definite position taken by the Church of England was marked by its rejection of the Reformatio Legum, and the enactment of its canons: the recent legislation of the Church of England in Canada further illustrates this cleavage between the English Church and the Continental Reformers."

38,997. What is that?—That is a canon passed at a synod in Quebec in 1905, which definitely laid down that even the re-marriage of the innocent party was invalid.

38,998. Admitting of no divorce?—Admitting of no re-marriage after divorce.

38,999. Admitting divorce, but no re-marriage?—Well, it did not admit the divorce, but the marriage of any divorced person was refused by the Church of England in Canada.

39,000. Have you got that in any form of resolution?—I asked a friend to send me the canon; but I could get it and forward it.

39,001. If you would I should be glad?—Yes.*

39,002. But that is not statutory?—No, that is the Church of England. I am speaking of the cleavage between the English Church and the Continental Reformers.

39,003. But there are others in Canada?—Oh, yes, I am speaking of the Church of England in Canada.

"It may be noted that the system set up under Zwingli's influence at Zürich laid down death as a punishment for adultery. There was a fair general agreement among the Reformers as to this, and much greater stringency was demanded from the State in its infliction."

39,004. From there is there not a statement in detail from each reformer which we might take as put in and not read at the moment?—Oh, yes, from there onwards. That is just a summary I have tried to make of the various views.

* See Pastor, "Geschichte der Päpiste" IV. 2, p. 509, note 1.

* The following is the canon in question:—

Canon 5 of the General Synod of the Church of England in Canada, passed Session iv., 1905. "No clergyman within the jurisdiction of the Church of England in Canada shall solemnize a marriage between persons either of whom shall have been divorced from one who is living at the time."

39,005. And the rest shows what each one is considered by you to have said?—Yes.

39,006. I think if we may take the whole of the rest of this proof as in, and have it printed as part of your evidence, we need not have it read, I do not know whether you have any summary of what each of these reformers to whom you have referred has permitted with regard to each of the different grounds of divorce?—I think the summaries that I have given——

39,007. It is not summarised anywhere, is it?—Do you mean summarised in any other place than here?

39,008. I mean, you have given the whole views, practically, of each of these authors whom you have referred to?—Oh, yes, but it is in a very summary form, because some of them are given at very much greater length.

39,009. I know; but is there any possibility of having a small summary saying what each reformer holds?—Yes, condense these still further.

39,010. For instance, if I might suggest what I mean, you begin with Luther in one part, and Zwingli and so on. I think it would be an immense convenience if you would say Luther permitted divorce on this ground and Calvin on that?—Yes, I could do it quite easily from that.

39,011. If you would not mind, when the print comes for you to revise, putting at the end of it, "Result is, the following allow divorce on this ground and the following on this and the other"?—Yes.*

39,012. I think I can then save troubling you any further with detailed questions, unless there is anything you would desire to add to the paper?—I should like to add, if I might, my view of the passages in St. Matthew. I can do it very shortly. I quite agree with what has been already said about the different occasions. There are two occasions in St. Matthew, in the fifth chapter, thirty-first and thirty-second verses—the Sermon on the Mount—and in the nineteenth chapter, verse three, in which our Lord dealt with the question. Then in the tenth chapter of St. Mark, and also in the sixteenth of St. Luke, the eighteenth verse, we have two statements from our Lord. I take it there is very little difference of opinion that the nineteenth chapter of St. Matthew and the tenth chapter of St. Mark agree; or, at least, they are the same occasion, and the sixteenth of St. Luke is very much the same in nature with the passage in the Sermon on the Mount, The difference lies in the two occasions in St. Matthew making our Lord lay down a general rule with the important qualification of "except for adultery," or "save only for adultery" (there is a slight difference in the wording); whereas in St. Luke and St. Mark the passage is given generally and emphatically, meaning this, that marriage is indissoluble. It seems to me that one difference which has not been sufficiently noticed is that in the two passages in St. Matthew our Lord is dealing with different questions. Most critics—partly on textual grounds and partly on other grounds—are of opinion that the qualification in St. Matthew is part of the editing. That, I suppose, would be very largely held with regard to the nineteenth chapter, but it is a little bit more difficult with regard to the fifth chapter. In the Sermon on the Mount, however, our Lord is dealing with questions of individual responsibility. In dealing with the Sixth Commandment, He speaks of killing—murder. There, for instance, anger is the cause; and then He goes on to consider what I should consider more indirect responsibility, the removing causes of offence, and, as I take it, in quite an analogous way—dealing with the question of marriage and adultery, our Lord laid down, first of all, for the man that there might be a case of actual adultery, and, secondly, that a man sinned just as much if he indulged in lustful thoughts; and then, in the third place, our Lord went on to consider another case in which a man was also responsible. A man was responsible if by the act of divorcing his wife he put her in a position in which she was almost bound to commit adultery, or adultery by a remarriage. The question presented itself to our Lord then as one of the responsibility of the man, and in pronouncing on that general responsibility, as I take it, He pulled Himself up, as it were, before condemning the man, because if the man put away his wife for adultery it is clear that he could not be held responsible for her afterwards falling into causes of adultery or evil living. The real cause and real responsibility then lay not with the man but with the nature of the woman.

39,013. Directions to his conduct rather than——?—Yes, and that therefore it is quite possible that our Lord was dealing with the question in that way in St. Matthew; not laying down the qualification as anything that was to affect the ideal of marriage, but merely taking the question of divorce as, if I may say so, a casual illustration of the facts of individual conduct; and that therefore the exception was always found rather difficult to interpret, because people would approach the 5th chapter of St. Matthew with the impression that our Lord was laying down a general rule and such exception as He allowed; that He was dealing with divorce as the important matter, whereas really our Lord was dealing with the question of the responsibility of the man. In other words, the exception is to the responsibility of the man, not to the indissolubility of marriage.

39,014. His own moral conduct?—Yes. It always seems to me that is the real explanation of the insertion of the qualification, and that from that 5th chapter of St. Matthew it was afterwards, as most critics would assume, carried into the 19th chapter.

39,015. Is there anything further you would like to add?—Nothing that I would like to add, my Lord.

39,016. You heard Professor Denney's evidence?—Yes.

39,017. Do you in substance agree with him that the teaching of that is of a moral law and not anything which is a matter——?—No, I should differ very markedly from him him there. Taking the conception of the Church throughout the greater part of its history, I should take it our Lord was certainly laying down a general principle which is absolutely binding upon Christians.

39,018. Without any modifications?—Yes, without any modifications.

39,019. And then the State would be obliged to act upon that?—Well, of course that involves questions of the relations of the State and the Church, and also the different theory of the two; but I should take it, speaking for myself, that there was no doubt that any Christian was bound to act on that, and that it was bound to be the regulation of the Christian Church, that because it was the principle laid down by our Lord: and therefore every Christian, who would naturally wish the law of the land to be in uniformity with the ideal of Christ, would endeavour to make them uniform.

39,020. (Mr. Brierley.) I should like to ask you one question about the Canon which you say has been passed by the Church of England in Canada. Is that a Canon which prohibits the remarriage of divorced persons in church, or does it lay down any more general rule as to the remarriage being prohibited under any circumstances?—It prohibits their marriage by any minister of the Church of England.

39,021. It prohibits any marriage in the Church?—Well, a large number in Canada take place not in church but in private houses.

39,022. But it prohibits the marriage by a minister of the Church?—Yes.

39,023. In Canada divorces are not numerous, but of course they do occur; sometimes by Act of Parliament in a large part of Canada, and in some few provinces they are granted by the courts. Supposing divorced persons do remarry civilly, does the Church go on in the Canon to state what is their position then. Are they notorious evil-livers who are excommunicated by the fact of the remarriage?—I suppose that would be a matter for the decision of the individual bishop. The Canon only deals with the question of marriage.

39,024. Then the Canon does not deal with the position of divorced persons who remarry but only prohibits any minister to marry them?—The Canon lays down that the law of the Church of England is that those marriages are illegal.

* See summaries at end of this witness's evidence.

39,025. Then does the Church of England in Canada differ from the resolution of the Lambeth Conference?—No, the question of admitting them to Communion would be a distinct question. The Church of England, as I take it, is still bound by the Canon Law under which all remarriage of divorced persons is illegal, and in further interpretation of that law there had been a difficulty, because of course Canon Law assumes the whole medieval state of things; the question of its interpretation came up, and the Church of England in Canada, after two or three debates, passed a Canon prohibiting remarriage of divorced persons, whether guilty or innocent, by a minister of the Church.

39,026. But it did not go on to state what it would hold to be the position of the divorced persons if they chose to remarry without calling on a minister of the Church of England in Canada to marry them?—No, but they would not be called upon.

39,027. Surely if two persons who had been divorced married before the Registrar (or what is equivalent to the Registrar in Canada), the Church would then be bound to consider what their position was; whether they were living in sin or whether they were living as married persons?—Yes, but I mean the Canon regulating the marriage would not deal with that; that would be a further matter.

39,028. There is no Canon dealing with that?—No. I speak from recollection, I have not a copy of the Canon, but I think that is the case.

39,029. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Do I understand you that our Saviour, according to the Gospel of St. Matthew, allowed divorce in the case of adultery, but did not allow marriage on the part of the woman?—No, I am afraid——

39,030. I mean I should like to understand?—No. our Lord was dealing with the question of a man putting away his wife. On the surface of the statement in St. Matthew there is an exception in which He allows a man to put away his wife, and that is adultery; and I was speaking of the way that exception presented itself to our Lord.

39,031. Then what is the effect of allowing divorce on the part of the husband on the ground of the adultery of his wife; did that entitle the wife to remarry when she was divorced?—Are you asking me for my own opinion or for the practice?

39,032. I am asking what the scriptural interpretation is. Do you understand that our Saviour intended that it should be a divorce for all purposes, so as to enable the husband to marry again and to enable the guilty woman to marry again?—That, of course, is a question on which some of the Reformers whose opinions I have summarised, differed.

39,033. What is your interpretation of the scripture?—My own interpretation of our Lord's saying would be to take the words in the utmost strictness, forbidding a remarriage of any kind.

39,034. Both on the part of the divorced men and the divorced women?—Yes.

39,035. Neither of them can remarry?—No.

39,036. That is the interpretation you put on St. Matthew's Gospel?—Yes, that is one interpretation.

39,037. Would that be a justification for separation?—Yes; and it would be a separation as distinct from a divorce with liberty to remarry.

39,038. Now if you take St. Paul—the 1st Corinthians—do you agree those words must be taken with some qualification, when he says "the wife depart "not from the husband and the husband leave not his "wife"? Must they be read with some qualification?—Well, of course St. Paul is dealing there with the exceptional case of a believing husband with an unbelieving wife.

39,039. Those follow afterwards; but the 10th and 11th verses, "But unto the married I charge you, yet "not I, but the Lord, that the wife depart not from "the husband and that the husband leave not his "wife"?—Yes, there he lays down, as is generally supposed, the same principle as our Lord does.

39,040. He cannot lay down there the principle that under no circumstances shall the woman leave the husband, can he? I mean that would leave it a compulsory condonation of adultery if she could not leave him. Take a case where the husband is committing open adultery and the wife is living with him; if you read those words strictly she could not leave him even in that case. He could not have meant that, could he?—No, he meant it as a general rule, I suppose. Then, if there were exceptional cases, the wife might depart; but her remarriage would be a different thing.

39,041. Therefore you must in St. Paul's case put in the qualification; namely, when she has just cause she may depart?—Of course St. Paul was speaking in his usual way and dealing with questions without very much exception or qualification.

39,042. But he must have had in his mind some qualification. I mean the case I gave you, where a husband living in adultery and living with his wife, the wife departs from the husband on the ground of his adultery, St. Paul could not have meant she was obliged to come back while the husband continued in that state of adultery. You could not suppose that, could you?—Well, I should hesitate to say that St. Paul might not have done it. It is a difficult verse to interpret, but I should not like, myself, to lay down any rule about it.

39,043. Just the same, the husband, he says, should not put away his wife if she is living in open adultery. Is that to be literally construed?—I should be prepared to take it so. The Christian Church has always laid such extreme stress on the duty of forgiveness. That was the root of a good deal of medieval legislation.

39,044. Then what was the justification for judicial separation, If you interpret St. Paul so strictly as that, what is the justification for judicial separation which the Church allows?—I am afraid I do not see where the difficulty comes in.

39,045. If the husband cannot put away his wife and if the wife cannot leave the husband literally according to these words, a judicial separation does separate them, and that would not be justified, according to your view of St. Paul's words?—Because in a judicial separation there would always be the possibility of foregiveness and a restoration of former relations.

(Judge Tindal Atkinson.) One party has compelled the other to live separate, and the party who has the decree is the only one who can decide the coming together again.

39,046. (Lord Guthrie.) Do I understand, in your view in no case conceivable ought there to be the spouse having the right to divorce, involving remarriage?—Yes, that is my view.

39,047. The case, for instance, of a husband who leaves his wife and children, lives with another woman openly and has children by her, contributes nothing to his wife's support or his children's support. Your view is that Christ meant that in that case the formal bond should remain, and the man must live in celibacy for the rest of the woman's life and be deprived of any head of the house (his wife) to look after his establishment?—Of course there would be the individual hardship, but on the other hand there is the importance of laying down rules for the benefit of society, and under those circumstances I should say (especially with the words of our Lord in mind, which I take to be of perfectly general obligation)—it would be better that the individual should be sacrified to the interests of the community.

39,048. However numerous these individuals may be. You think that is consistent with the teaching of a Man who was not only the Son of God but the Son of Man?—I see no inconsistency.

39,049. Do you know any church which has ever since Christ's time refused to separate people finally and allow remarriage?—Oh, yes; that was the case with the medieval Church.

39,050. Was it?—Yes.

39,051. Are you not aware that in the medieval Church the position of matters was this, that through subterfuges they had practically the power of getting rid of wives just as the Protestant Church has had since the Reformation?—There I should differ entirely. I know the statement is very often made; but apart from taking a general statement such as one of the Commissioners referred to this morning in his cross-examination of Professor Denney, I think there are very few cases of the supposed subterfuges; that is to say, that the medieval system worked with very much fewer such cases than is supposed. I know of very few cases.

39,052. You propose to allow none, Professor?—Yes. Cases of nullity of marriage are, of course, quite distinct.

39,053. Now, do you propose, Professor, to allow under our system the indirect cases that the Roman Catholic Church did allow, and to introduce the causes of third and fourth cousins, spiritual relationships, sponsorship, and so on?—No. I should say those causes, especially the spiritual relationship, were, of course, mistaken; but I was speaking about the number of cases in which there was some subterfuge in practice—I am speaking of the cases in which there are these alleged subterfuges found in the medieval Church. My own experience would be that those cases are very few, and I should then, I think, agree with the opinion of the late Professor Maitland. (Eng. Hist. Review, x. 760 f.)

39,054. Then do you propose to introduce a system which no age, no church, and no race has ever had? Is not that so?—It seems to me, if I might say so, you are confusing the case of nullity of marriage and dissolution of marriage.

39,055. No, Professor. Tell me any age or any church which has adopted your system of neither having open divorce for adultery, let us say, or having indirect methods few or many (it does not matter) by which people could get rid of their husbands or wives?—If I might say so, I think you are really assuming that in the indirect methods there were invalid methods; that through some supposed plea of nullity there was a way of evading the law. That is a description of medieval practice that I should differ from.

39,056. No, you have only differed to this extent, that instead of many cases there were few. You propose to admit none under your system?—I am proposing to go back to the state of the middle ages, or what, in my eyes, would be the ideal state, the state of medieval law, with the exception that spiritual relationships were not considered a case of nullity of marriage.

39,057. And with the exception also that cousinships shall not be considered reasons for nullity of marriage?—Yes.

39,058. And with the exception also that pre-contracts shall not be considered a reason for nullity of marriage; and with the exception also that prior intercourse between relations of the spouses shall not be considered a cause for nullity of marriage. You do not allow any of these?—No.

39,059. Does not the fact that the practice of the medieval Church to which you have just referred was as it was, show that in the necessities of human nature, divorce is an absolute necessity, however unfortunate and however much to be regretted?—No, I should not say so.

39,060. At the Reformation (you have very usefully given us a prospectus of the opinions) was there any difference or opinion amongst the Reformers—British or Continental—on the question of dissolubility?—I should not be prepared offhand to refer to any individual English Reformer.

39,061. Or Continental. Can you name to me a single Reformer—English, Scotch, or Continental—who held your views, that marriage in no circumstances whatever can be dissolved so as to allow of remarriage?—I should take it certainly that that was the view that the Church of England by its consensus——

39,062. Never mind that. Name to me a single Reformer in the Church of England who held your views, if you can?—Well, that is rather large. I would undertake to find some.

39,063. Have you gone into it? I have gone into it and know of none?—I have not gone into it in the case of the English Reformers. I was only asked to deal with the case of the Continental Reformers.

39,064. Well, I know of none, and I do not at the moment remember any English Reformers who held your views on indissolubility. Because we want information, you know?—Yes.

39,065. If you can find any, and send it to the Secretary, it will be a great favour?—I shall be glad to undertake it. [See second note at the end of the evidence of this witness.] The mere fact that the whole body of Convocation rejected the view that marriage was dissoluble——

39,066. When?—When they passed their Canons.

39,067. When?—When the Canons were passed in 1603.

39,068. I am talking of the Reformation. That is a hundred years after the Reformation?—I take the Reformation in England and the Continent to be a series of changes that finally issued in definite settlement, and after sundry ups and downs, in England, the final settlement was the product of the reign of Elizabeth and of James I. I should hesitate to speak of the Reformation as a final movement being confined to the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI.

39,069. Perhaps you would say if you can find anybody in Henry VIII.'s reign, Edward VI.'s, Mary's, or Elizabeth's?—Yes, I shall be glad to do so.

39,070. Then on the Continent; do you happen to remember any French, German or Scandinavian Reformer that held your views?—No.

39,071. Either Lutheran or Calvinistic? — No. There were differences of opinion amongst them, but on the general principles they were in line.

39,072. That marriage, in certain circumstances in regard to which they differ, was dissoluble?—Yes, certain circumstances such as adultery, which they based on our Lord's words, and desertion.

39,073. Now you say in your very valuable and interesting paper, with regard to the Church of England, on page 10, if you will kindly turn to it, near the bottom, about 20 lines up: "Bucer's views greatly "influenced and interested Milton, who reprinted (in "epitome) Bucer's treatise. Milton's views represented "those of the Lutherans, which lingered on in "England, outside those views taken by the Church of "England." Now you would read that as saying that the Church of England was unanimous in maintaining absolute indissolubility. Do you mean that?—I mean that while the Church of England by its legislation of 1603 was committed to that view, there were some writers (especially at the time of the Civil War) who took the very opposite view such as Milton.

39,074. But you say, "outside those views taken by the Church of England." You do not mean that in the Church of England the opinion was unanimous?—Oh, I beg your pardon. No. I mean there were bodies of opinion in England distinct——

39,075. Inside as well as outside the Church of England?—Well, there might be individual sympathisers inside.

39,076. Do not you know that many of the greatest names in the Church of England have held views diametrically opposed to yours?—Yes. I have known some few, but I did not mean it was an absolute impossibility to find some sympathisers with, say, Milton, in the Church of England.

39,077. I am talking of the Church of England. You put it that there were sympathisers to be found outside the Church of England. You do not mean that the Church of Englaud was solid for absolute indissolubility?—No. I am speaking there of the constitutional views of the Church—the views laid down by the Canons.

39,078. Which you interpret as laying dowu the law of absolute indissolubility preventing remarriage?—Yes.

39,079. You are aware that exactly the opposite view has been taken by extremely learned men in the Church of England?—Yes.

39,080. King Charles the First's Chaplain and many others?—Yes; but I should take the views that are expressed in the majority of the ecclesiastical legal text-books and the views that are expressed by Professor Maitland. (Phillimore's Eccles. Law, 640 f., Pollock and Maitland; Hist. of Eng. Law, II., 364–5, 390–3; Camb. Mod. Hist. II., 589).

39,081. Now I would suggest to you, against your views, and in favour of dissolubility for adultery, there was Joseph Hall, Jeremy Taylor, John Cosin, and Archdean Baillie, and Gilbert Burnet. What names would you put against these comparable for eminence in the Church of England. I am aware of only one name, that of Lancelot Andrewes?—With regard to that we ought to bear in mind, when once the Church of England had taken up its position it was much more natural that people who wished to have the position changed should write on the point than those who wished to maintain the existing state of things. That is how you have expressions of individual opinion. I have not gone into the whole question of England.

39,082. You do not at the moment remember any names comparable to those, with the exception of Lancelot Andrewes, who maintain your view?—No, I am not prepared to say now, but I have no doubt there are some. It is only that I am not prepared on the question.

39,083. It would be a convenience if you would kindly furnish us with the words of the Canadian Canon?—Yes.

39,084. You said that the Church of England was bound by Canon Law to find that all remarriage of divorced persons was illegal. Where do you find that. What do you base that statement on?—At the Reformation there was a Commission of 32 appointed by Act of Parliament to re-draft the Canon Law and prepare a scheme; and that until they presented their scheme to be approved, such parts of the Canon Law as were not in opposition to the law of the land should be valid; and that scheme never has been presented.

39,085. That is what you refer to?—Yes.

39,086. (Chairman.) Just one or two questions, Professor. Would you advocate the repeal of the Act of 1857?—Personally I should be glad to see its repeal, because I consider it would conduce to the cause of morality.

39,087. But would you do so on the ground that it was unscriptural?—My main ground would be that I should take it, I was bound by a very definite statement of our Lord's.

39,088. Do you mean on the Christian teaching?—Yes.

39,089. Then would your view be consistent—that that was the general position, if one finds a great number of bishops in 1857 voting in favour of the Bill?—I do not know that that would affect my opinion.

39,090. It would affect this; that I rather gathered your view was that the Anglican position was always in favour of indissolubility?—I am speaking of the Anglican view as laid down in the Canons, and the prevalent view.

39,091. Then what is not the prevalent view was supported by certainly a number of bishops in the House of Lords in 1857, which enabled the Act to be passed which declared marriage dissoluble—certainly on one ground?—Yes.

39,092. That would not show your views to be in accordance with all opinion?—Not with the view of the bishops of the time.

39,093. Now is your view in accordance with the Resolution passed at the two Conferences held in 1888 and 1898 at Lambeth?—You mean referring to the remarriage of the innocent party?

39,094. Yes, which permits that. Those are Pan-Anglican Conferences?—They permit it in direct reference to the Communion of the married parties.

39,095. They, as I understand, recognise divorce on the ground of adultery, and the right of the innocent party to remarry. I think that is correct, is it not, Lord Guthrie?

39,096. (Lord Guthrie.) It comes to that?—Well, I should take it rather that the view was that there were grounds for supposing an exception in the case of adultery laid down; and that while that was the case it was difficult, for instance, to refuse Communion to people who had been remarried.

39,097. All I meant was that that would not be consistent with your construction of the New Testament teaching?—It is a little difficult to express it. because the difference would come in not so much with regard to the Church undertaking the marriage, for instance, of such persons, as the Church admitting them to Communion afterwards; and I think the Lambeth Resolution dealt with the second question.

39,098. (Mr. Brierley.) They dealt with marriage too, if I remember right. Apparently they passed a Resolution by 87 to 84 to the effect that it was undesirable that such marriages should take place in Church; but they were unanimous, I think, that the Clergymen should not refuse the Communion to persons who had been remarried under civil sanction. That was my impression.

39,099. (Chairman.) One other matter; because we have had all these facts before really. Which are the words in the teaching of Christ which you regard as prohibiting divorce altogether?—The passages put in this unqualified form in the xth chapter of St. Mark, verses 2 to 11, and St. Luke, xvi. 18.

39,100. That is the way you construe them?—Yes.

39,101. One other point which Lord Guthrie was asking you about; the kinds of nullity that preceded the present position in England. Do you know that the various grounds of consanguinity, and so on, which are not now recognised were all put an end to by an Act in Henry VIII.'s time?—Yes.

39,102. But up to that time they existed?—Yes.

39,103. And in that way did afford a means, to the extent to which they went, of getting out of a marriage which was not satisfactory?—Yes.

39,104. Now you are going to send us, if you can, a copy of the "Canon of Synod" in Canada?—Yes. I am sorry I could not answer your questions more definitely, but it is impossible to prepare matters over such a large field. [See footnote to Q. 39,001.]

39,105. And also a short note at the end of your evidence giving what each of these Reformers has permitted?—Yes.

(Chairman.) May I be allowed to thank you very much, on behalf of the Commissioners, for your evidence, and for the great trouble you have taken in collecting these valuable extracts.

(Witness.) If I may say so, it was dull but very interesting.

The following is the remainder of the witness's proof:—

I. The schemes of individual reformers may now be noticed in more detail.

Starting from the denial of marriage being a sacrament, Zwingli interpreted the text "Let no man put asunder," &c. to mean that marriage was to be highly regarded for every man, and not lightly condemned for some as by the Papists. Nor was it meant that adultery was the only cause of divorce, but that all equivalent or as serious causes, such as treachery, parricide, &c. should be allowed.

The marriage law of Zürich (1525) was, as Bullinger tells us, drafted under Zwingli's influence. The Reformation at Zürich took the special form of a repudiation by the city of the authority of its bishop; the Bishop of Constance, and the jurisdiction previously held by him was now handed over to a new board of four lay and two clerical members. Later (1525–6) legislation against concubinage and adultery followed: the penalties were excommunication, the loss of civic vote, of a place in guilds. Cases of desertion, and those not dealt with by the laws, were to be dealt with according to their nature by the magistrates.

The Great Council could re-admit offenders to civil status. The first offence was punished by three days' imprisonment on bread and water: a second offence by three times this punishment: the third offence by banishment: on return, one year's exclusion from office: but evil life after return was punished by drowning.

In case of marriage which from nature or other reasons proved unsuitable ("zu ehlichen werken"), the couple were to live together for a year at least so that the intercessions of their friends might bring about a better understanding. If the state of things was the same at the end of a year they might separate and remarry. It should be noted that this covers not only impotence but also what would now be called "incompatibility."

The institution of Stillstände or Ehegaumer to guard marriage and morals in each parish followed, but the control proved irritating and not altogether effective.

It is interesting to notice the beginning of marriage registers (cf. with England) at this time.

These regulations due to Zwingli's influence remained for a long time in force at Zürich, and through Zürich had much influence in Switzerland.

Little need be said of Zwingli's exegesis: it follows the usual lines, but as is always the case with him, his interpretation is very broad, e.g., extending the case of adultery as an exception to include others also.

II. Luther's idea of marriage has caused much discussion: in some passages he seems to regard it as existing merely for physical reasons: elsewhere, as in treating cases of prolonged sickness his view is on a higher plane. Here, as elsewhere, his language is unbalanced and variable. A question of much importance is his view of the State and its powers over marriage and divorce. It was the duty of the State to exercise control over the unregenerate: the converted were able to regulate themselves by the law of God. In its sphere the State was sacred; naturally a different tone is used when Luther is speaking of the unregenerate, and of those who possess Christian liberty: it is the former whom the State must coerce, and for whom it must have rigid laws. For those laws the State is responsible. Luther did not feel himself called upon to lay down precise lines for State legislation, as Zwingli did in legislating for a city-republic, or as Calvin did in legislating for a theocratic-republic. From these considerations the vagueness in effect and seeming contradictions of much of Luther's language can be explained.

In practice Luther allowed almost free divorce. The treatment of an adulterer as dead through his adultery (being liable to stoning under the Old Testament) should be noted. The suggestion of emigration to another State with easier laws, for an adulterer who could not amend himself is characteristic of Germany with its many States.

Luther's writings would justify the drawing of a parallel between the marriage vow and the vow of celibacy, which was not only treated as undesirable, but as breakable with impunity. The frequent sermons against regarding marriage as a sacrament would also seem to have lowered its status in public esteem. The treatment of polygamy has already been noticed. Language such as that in the Greater Catechism could not fail of a bad effect.

Luther's writings also reveal a bad state of existing morals: as a remedy it was suggested that the pastors should preach more vigorously against sin, while the pastors in their turn called upon the State for more vigorous laws, and a better execution of laws.

The maintenance of the Consistories should be noticed: at the same time the power of the State was brought into frequent use.

For minor causes of strife to married Christians (as distinct from the unregenerate), Luther prescribed separation kept in chastity. [The tendency in later Lutheranism has been, as seen in German law, for complete divorce to be allowed in all these cases.]

III. The views of Melanchthon, as a more considerable theologian than Luther, and as the leader in the formulation of the documents of Confession, are very important.

Christ, he said, rebuked the levity of the Jews (and Gentiles) in giving divorce and in dealing with marriage. Passing on to consider divorce separately, the quarrels of married life arose from original sin, and were material for penitence. Thus we are led to rules. The first rule is that married couples should remember God's will, by which marriage is indissoluble, so that persons who, like adulterers and deserters, give cause for divorce, sin grievously. The laxity of Mosaic divorces was reproved by Christ; who recalled marriage to its first institution. Hence the married state demands much patience and prayer.

The second rule is: adulterers and deserters sin: after such a breach of the marriage bond, the question arises whether the innocent party can contract a second marriage? The Pope says no. Melanchthon shortly alleges the text which says, in his view, that between an innocent party and an adulterer a divorce can be made. If liberty of remarriage is not conceded to the innocent party, it would be nominal, not real, divorce [a distinction Melanchthon draws elsewhere]. It would be needless to except adultery if the innocent person received no more liberty then than in other cases, such as those of angry or sick spouses. He alleges that the custom of the Ancient Church allowed such remarriages.

The third rule is this. As Christ expressly excepts adultery, so St. Paul excepts desertion. In such cases the innocent person is not under bondage, that is, in Melanchthon's interpretation, is allowed remarriage.

A "deserter" or "desertrix" is a person who without just cause leaves a spouse and is absent a long time without just cause, from malice as often happens. In such cases adultery is often involved also.

In these two cases the Lutheran Consistories allowed remarriage. Then there arises the question of punishment for the adulterous or deserting person.

Although the innocent person is freed by the act itself, such cases are to go before the judges, as no one is judge for himself. The pastors are to point out to their flocks the evils arising from marriages made without such preceding judgments, as the causes are often found insufficient. Hence it is good there should be judges in the Consistories, and it was to be wished they were helped more by the sovereign power.

The Papists almost utterly neglect such judgments, just as they have corrupted many other good ordinances, and their (i.e., Lutheran) own civil powers are even more negligent. But God's help is to be sought, and his gift of a salutary regimen.

It is sometimes asked whether separation can take place on account of a permanent disease. Speaking in a sermon, Melanchthon left most of such points to the Consistories, and only discussed things of popular use.

The case of impotence he dismisses as making marriage null. Diseases such as leprosy, morbus gallicus, &c. are not sufficient causes. They merely make demand upon additional fidelity and patience. Admonitions to this ideal of married life were needed in times when many were impatient instead of being driven to God.

As to the punishment of offenders against marriage, the Church has only one penalty in its power, excommunication, yet for this impious men do not care. But in the Old Testament law the civil magistrates were called upon to inflict death. If they were negligent, whole races suffered. So now. Preachers should warn them oftener; they can do no more. Hence Melanchthon exhorts magistrates and rulers to greater severity, in view of the anger of God.

These same points reappear in the Visitation Articles, Examination of Ordinances, and elsewhere. Specially to be noticed are: the obviously insufficient control of marriage cases, as indicated by Melanchthon's reiterated exhortations against taking the law into one's own hands and not waiting for judgment before action. Difficulties naturally arose now as later upon the question of desertion, and the general view of marriage obligations was clearly low. The basing of the legislation about desertion on St. Paul's words really needed more argument than was given to it. Lutheran and Calvinist views contrast here.

Melanchthon's standpoint differs curiously from that of Calvin: the former is anxious to emphasise their agreement with canon law and ecclesiastical precedent: the latter lays down what he is convinced is the will of God. Much of the difference in the systems is due to the greater influence of politics and society upon Lutheranism, and the Lutheran attitude towards the civil power.

Melanchthon's attitude of an apologist for Lutheranism accounts for much of his language. He is clearer and more consistent than Luther, but the points noted in Luther as regards the State are to be noted in Melanchthon also. He laments the inefficiency of the State, but can only pray for amendment. This is the Lutheran attitude. Unless this is borne in mind the language of the Loci Communes (e.g.) is not intelligible.

In Melanchthon's Loci Communes, Pt. II., Appendix (De Coniugio). the same questions are treated—and in the section (De Divortio) the same conclusions are reached. Briefly, the need for legal decisions. and attempts at reconciliation before recourse to courts, the necessity of punishment for adultery by the civil arm, and desertion and its definition, with the time needed for desertion to be held definite. are all treated of. Here, as elsewhere, he considers cruelty (saevitia), attempts at poison or destruction of life, as causes of divorce: here the civil power should intervene: his language seems to imply that the civil power should take steps which the ecclesiastical courts (Consistories) acting under the law of Christ could not take: those who reject this opinion "non recte intelligunt discrimen legis et evangelii." Infectious diseases, which are incurable, he decides not to be fit causes of divorce. In the Loci Communes even more than elsewhere—where Melanchthon writes as a law-giver.

IV. The Loci Communes of Peter Martyr, which were translated into English, and were often reprinted, had probably much influence in England. He, as a refugee under the Interim, not only visited England but lived with Cranmer, and was one of the 32 commissioners for redrafting the Canon Law (1551). The Reformatio Legum, although its precise history is a little obscure, was connected with this commission, and the influence of Peter Martyr was probably great in its formation. His views are therefore specially significant for England.

Starting with a learned but lengthy discussion of the punishment of adultery, with reference to the history of ancient people, Jews and Germans, he comes (§ 27) to the mitigation of the punishment of death, the Bishops taking the punishment to themselves to save death. The well-known question of the treatment of adultery by the ancient Church, especially in the time of Cyprian, is then discussed. It is interesting to notice that he holds the shame of women who sin to be greater, although the sin is actually greater for men because of their relative stronger character. The putting away of wives was, he points out, a law of men, but it was to David and not to Bathsheba that Nathan was sent, because David was the greater sinner. He then passes on to consider reconciliation—against which some civil laws were described. If an adulteress showed signs of penitence the Church should intercede for her: otherwise the Church should not, lest it support sin by doing so.

Christ recalls us to the primitive institution of marriage. The relaxations made for the hardhcartedness of the Jews do not hold for us. If there are found people as hardhearted as Jews (or worse), they, as aliens from Christ, are handed over to the commonwealth to be dealt with. They have to do with civil laws. Christ's words lay down no exception to the indissolubility of marriage except adultery. St. Paul further adds the case of a spouse not bound to an infidel who rejects him or her.

In speaking of adultery as an exception, did Christ mean it exclusively or did he include other sins of equal gravity? Custom and methods of interpretation of the New Testament (as illustrated by Erasmus) favour the latter view. Adultery is named because it strikes at the very root of marriage. But for himself, Peter Martyr dislikes divorce for causes not expressly mentioned by Scripture. And in these cases nothing should be done, nothing is to be done without the approval of the magistrates. Marriage has contact on so many sides with civil laws. But the laws should conform to the laws of God.

If a man cannot live with his wife he has two remedies. He may live apart and chastely, considering himself called to this life by God. If he cannot do this let him go to a State where a second marriage is allowed. (The differing laws of German States should be remembered here.)

Christ, he considers, allowed remarriage after a divorce. Patristic precedents are here discussed. But as regards the equality of women and men, Peter Martyr sided with St. Augustine and St. Jerome against St. Ambrose. He would give women equal rights with men if divorce be limited to cases of adultery, but not if extended, owing to the greater inconstancy of women.

He discusses three causes alleged why remarriage after divorce should not be allowed:—(1) the husband might feign a cause; (2) it is foolish of a man, unhappy in a first marriage, to try fortune again; (3) marriage is a sacrament. These allegations he holds to have been refuted by Erasmus. As to (1): the magistrates can check pretended causes and can lay on heavy punishments: and (3) if marriage is a sacrament many other things must be held so too. He goes on to argue that where real causes for divorce occur, it is God not man who dissolves marriage. [But the moral aspects of this statement he does not consider sufficiently.]

As to the discrepancy between the Evangelists in the words ascribed to our Saviour, he holds that Sts. Mark and Luke did not know the full sentence of our Lord, which St. Matthew did.

Commonwealths appoint to themselves a scope so as to incur least evil, e.g., allowing harlots to live in a certain part of a city, whereas God forbids such a course. Such things are not according to Christianity but are to be seen in commonwealths. Leave for divorce seems to him better than forcing them to live together. Yet a "bill" should be given because we ponder more deeply things we write.

Our Redeemer hath appointed decrees for his people, but he does not condemn the old commonwealth of the Hebrews.

He quotes St. Augustine's exhortation to forbearance and patience in married life. Consorts must live together unless there is no hope of salvation in the living together. There is always a hope of an Atheist becoming a Christian. But if marriage cannot be kept up without contumely to Christ the Christian may depart. Before departing all means should be tried. He feels strongly that "idolatry" does not break marriage. This is not to say that idolatry is a less grievous sin than adultery, but that adultery strikes more against marriage.

It is not well that the punishment of death for adultery should be intermitted.

It will be noticed that Peter Martyr takes a mediating position between Lutherans and Calvinists. His political theories are those of the former: his moral and theological affinities rather those of the latter. There are traces, I think, of his paying deference to the views of Luther and his followers when his own inclinations are rather the other way, as in allowing exile as a remedy for a man unable to live chastely in separation. Here as in other matters he was not a theologian of strength or independence.

V. We now pass to the Calvinists. Calvin's views were affected by his strong opinions of the power of Divine Grace, and also by his theocratic theory of society. And while the Lutherans did not consider the Christian ideal possible even for the Christian community as a whole, Calvin held that "the faithful" were called to a stricter life, and that the ideal could be worked out among them: it could even be enforced upon outsiders.

His views may be summarised as follows. While all contracts were to be kept in good faith, marriage surpasses them in sanctity and demands more reverence The practices among the Jews were merely permitted, not approved of, by God: many things were not punished by the law of Moses which God does not approve of. For police punishment is inflicted with regard to human interests not for offences against God. Open and serious offences against God, magistrates should, of course, punish, but "oblique offences where there is not open contempt of God," the magistrates do not punish. But God reserves his right to punish in such cases. In the case of the Jews God did not care to exercise his rigours against them. But such accommodations of the magistracy law do not alter the Divine law.

If a man puts away his wife except for adultery, and marries again, he is an adulterer and he makes his wife an adulteress. He is such because he has broken his marriage; in separating from his wife he is false to the faith he has given. In divorce (Old Testament) a man could put his wife away for any cause, but only by giving a bill of divorcement so that she should not be defamed. This was a matter of civil law ("police"). Is such divorce permissible to-day? See our Lord's decision. It is not so for us to-day. If we assumed it was we should equally have to assume the legality of polygamy. We know God's will better than did the Jews, and are governed by His Holy Spirit.

Christ went back to the first institution of marriage, with which divorce conflicts. The bond between man and wife is pronounced by God to be closer than between father and son, and one party to the relation can as little sever it in the one case as in the other.

The saying "they too shall be of one flesh" condemns polygamy no less than licence in repudiation of wives. A magistracy which gives a man the liberty of repudiation abuses its power. But between the politic and external order and the "spiritual regimen" there is much difference.

The exception of adultery was, added by Christ because by adultery a wife, tearing herself as a rotten limb from her husband, frees him. Those who assign other causes for divorce are to be condemned as wishing to be wiser than the "celestial magistrate." Elephantiasis, e.g. Here, just as he would counsel a husband not to approach a wife so afflicted, so he would not permit him the liberty of divorce. If anyone says there is a need of a remedy for anyone who cannot live in chastity, he replies that is no remedy which is sought outside the word of God. The gift of continency will never be lacking to those who entrust themselves to God's guidance.

St. Paul's exception (1 Cor. vii.) is not really repugnant to the mind of Christ, because he is only speaking of the case where a woman can keep to her spouse solely by denying God; and a quarrel with man is to be preferred to alienation from God.

If death were the punishment of adultery, Christ's exception seems superfluous. But it was for this reason Christ freed the husband from the vinculum of marriage. So to-day the perverse indulgence of the magistracy makes it necessary for men to have the remedy of divorce since adultery goes unpunished.

Note that in marriage husband and wife are on an equality since the husband is not lord of his own body. The adultery of a husband therefore gives a wife liberty. Remarriage in these cases is not adultery for Christ was only speaking (as was St. Paul) of frivolous and petty causes of divorce, not of adultery.

It will be seen how Calvin's views are based on God's original institution and Christ's words: for the Christian, who was not to be misled into taking civil laws as the ideal, there was thus a clear course marked out. In a community governed on Christian principles the contradiction between Divine and civil law would disappear. There divorce—except for adultery, where Christ was held to have laid down the law of exception—would not exist. And adultery would be punished by death.

It may be noticed that Calvin's scheme is more consistent and clearly expressed than that of other Reformers. Also, and this again is characteristic, he argues entirely from Scripture and God's will as seen by reason: precedents, such as those discussed so much by Peter Martyr, Melanchthon, and Beza, of imperial or canon law have no interest for him. Here, as everywhere, he legislates, as it were, afresh and without hesitation. His interest in the conflict of laws is to be noticed; the divergency between his political theories and those of the Lutherans, and also his firmer and more reasonable treatment of the Old Testament examples, are also noteworthy: his treatment is that of a strong theologian.

VI. Theodore Beza, on his Tractationes Theologicae (Vol. II.), treats at length of Polygamy and Divorce, including all questions of prohibited degrees, &c. As respresenting Geneva, his treatise is specially useful. Cases of disease which are impediments to marriage he takes to indicate the will of God in the matter. He would not have marriage dissolved because one partner was or had become an infidel. If the infidel deserts the believing brother or sister is free: cases are to be taken upon their merits. In the part of the treatise upon divorce the question as to the nature of desertion is more fully dealt with.

Incurable disease affecting matrimony is to be dealt with cautiously, but this is more properly a case of impediment.

After a severe denunciation of those who teach that valid marriage is dissoluble by mutual consent and so forth, he passes on to consider if for any cause a valid marriage can be dissolved, and, if so, for what causes.

Death he holds destroys the bond. Adultery and desertion are held by the word of God to be causes for divorce. He then considers argument to the contrary. To the assertion that he who marries a divorced woman commits adultery he replies that the exception unless for adultery is to be carried on to the second part of the sentence, and implies that he who marries a woman divorced for any reason save adultery does commit adultery, but that a divorce for adultery may be followed by remarriage.

To the argument that divorce is against the command "Whom God has joined," &c. he says he does not concede to the magistrates the right to make new laws of divorce, but that God and not man is the author of divorce for adultery. To the objection that such divorce goes against Rom. 7, 2, he replies that the Apostle is speaking of marriage simply and not of divorce. Other Biblical arguments he answers in the same way. To the objection that remarriage ought to be limited to the innocent party, as otherwise it is a reward for the guilty, Beza replies that it is to be wished that magistrates did their duty (i.e., punished adultery), but that only upon great cause do they (i.e., at Geneva) allow remarriage to the guilty. The precedents of the early Church are discussed at length.

Adultery he considers to break the bond of marriage: the innocent person may remarry, which it is yet praiseworthy not to do without the leave of the Church and of the pious magistracy. As to the guilty "party" he should be punished: his repentance should be ascertained, and not rashly or quickly should his remarriage be allowed. Celibacy in penitence should be suggested to him, but if he cannot carry this out he may be allowed to remarry.

The right of private judgment of an offending wife by the husband is discussed: Beza upholds public decision. In discussing the rightfulness of retaining an adulterous wife he replies to the arguments of Bucer ("a man of pious memory, but from whom in "this controversy he was forced to differ in many "points") who absolutely denied this right. Beza wishes laws to be enforced against adultery, but that a Christian should be allowed the exercise of forgiveness.

He would not allow a guilty party to accuse a guilty partner: the Church and the magistracy should enforce a reconciliation. He also considers that a charge of adultery once condoned cannot be brought up again. He then discusses at length the canonical punishment for adultery.

He then passes to a discussion of desertion as breaking the bond of marriage, founded upon 1 Cor. vii. A deserter he holds to be one whom cohabitation (to be interpreted in a larger than merely physical sense) displeases. "Bondage" (servituti) he interprets of conjugal obligation.

But does this go against the words of Christ excepting adultery only? There is a question whether the Apostle was not speaking as inspired by Christ. Allowing this Beza discriminates the cases dealt with by Christ and by St. Paul. Christ was speaking of marriage between a "faithful" couple (i.e., Jews): St. Paul speaks of an "unequal" marriage. He did not add anything to the law of Christ, because he was dealing with a different case. Beza dismisses the interpretation of "servitude" which made it mean the obligation to follow the deserting unbeliever: it must mean, in his view, the whole conjugal obligation.

He holds that as there is no obligation a new marriage is open. This is discussed at length. Some of the arguments are like those alleged against re-marriage after adultery, and these he passes over. He considers the possibility of the deserter changing his mind, and then by a new marriage having taken place finding his chance of restoration gone. Like arguments would bring untold complications into human decisions, and it is no argument to say we are limiting the forgiveness of God. What of the objection that St. Paul was here speaking solely for himself and not as binding us? This he thinks verges on blasphemy. St. Paul means that in the first case he was interpreting Christ's own words: here he was speaking upon a question which Christ had not been asked about.

Beza's contention is: Christ laid down adultery as a cause of divorce: St. Paul laid down no new cause: to the Corinthians asking if a divorce could be made for heathenism ("infidelity" in religion), he said "No," but added that if a heathen consort deserted his or her spouse the believing partner was not under bondage. This is the question of what is to be done after a divorce illegally made by a heathen spouse (i.e., made by private action). The Apostle's decision was that the deserted believer was not to consider himself as bound, and if the case should be taken before a magistrate, there is no place for divorce, but the deserter is to be dealt with by force. The Apostle does not lay down a right of breaking the bond of marriage on account of "unbelief," but only says the believer is not bound. The whole blame of desertion lies with the deserter, and meanwhile the interests of the innocent party are to be guarded (consulendum). I take his meaning to be that in the last case, force failing to coerce the deserter, re-marriage is open to the believer.

A believing consort cannot desert an unbeliever. The nature of unbelief is illustrated by the demand on the part of a husband for the believing wife to consent "ad audienda abominanda missae sacra."

Beza goes on to show that desertion of a believer from a believer is no ground for divorce, and the magistrate is to enforce conjugal duty: the innocent person is to hold a call to celibacy received, and seek strength from God. But matrimony is not dissolved. The process at Geneva in the case of a deserter who has left the territory is that the deserting party is recalled to the territory by letters and messenger: if the summons of the Church is not obeyed by an appearance, then after a fortnight's lapse in an assembly of the Church and before the magistrate the marriage is pronounced void by desertion. He who defies the Church is so far an unbeliever, and can be treated as such, and the case is to be treated as described before.

For other causes divorce is not allowed: adultery and desertion standing alone. He denies the right of anyone to add to these causes. The following discussions turn largely upon Biblical and Imperial precedents. Finally he concludes that divorce is to be regulated by the rule of God's Word, of which magistrates ought to be guardians, and not transgressors.

As to the judges of divorce. The burden of deciding the meaning of God's Word belongs to the Church: hence controversies as to marriage, reconciliation, and divorce belong to the Church (i.e., the Presbyters). But the magistrates are concerned so far as civil laws are concerned.

It may be noted that Beza places men and women upon an equality in these matters.

Beza's complete system may be taken as descending from Calvin's in its political theory and logical basis. Its divergency from Lutheran systems will be noted. The argument is complete and consistent.

VII. In Bucer's treatment of divorce, marriage is regarded mainly as a matter of civil law concerning the State rather than the Church. The jurisdiction of it had been wrongly seized by the Antichrist of Rome. The law of Moses must be seriously weighed to see what God's meaning as expressed in it was. Officers of the Church should be appointed to watch over marriages: they should warn and then cite offenders. His arguments are expressed with much bitterness against the Catholic usage of forbidding remarriage—and it may be noted how he refers to the Roman Law, and the Imperial legislation again and again.

In discussing our Saviour's words he contends it was impossible he should brand as adultery anything allowed by God in the Old Testament. What God allowed the Jews he could not but allow to his own people now. For God changeth not. Nor had our Saviour come to make civil laws. And it is wrong to suppose our Saviour allowed divorce for adultery only—for see the language of St. Paul in 1 Cor. vii.—and note the Old Testament. The whole Bible must be taken together. And every Christian is bound to obey the laws of his own commonwealth if they are not against those of God. In this connection there is given a most disingenuous piece of reasoning: the question asked by the Pharisees was in meaning—can a man really married be divorced? Now this cannot cover the case of a man where for any cause the marriage is broken (these causes are considered elsewhere), for he is not really married, so that his case is not covered by Christ's words. Our Lord's words only refer to one essentially (so to speak) married (this means, in a state of valid marriage). And, finally, seeing that God cannot be willing for anyone to live in danger, and that he has ordered a bill of divorcement in Old Testament cases, it is impossible a man who follows this precedent now should be held to commit adultery.

A wide extension of divorce is based upon Malachi ii., 15, 16, where a man is ordered to put away a wife he hates. Where there is not perpetual union the marriage is already broken, and in such cases second marriage can follow. As for adultery, a man ought not, for private reasons, to retain an adulterous spouse, owing to the injury wrought to the State. So, too, a wife is at liberty to leave an adulterous husband. The punishment for adultery is death.

The causes of divorce under the Imperial law are enumerated—including witchcraft, lodging forth without a reason, frequenting theatres — and these are approved.

Where marriage is made ineffective by malevolence, or inbred weakness of mind, or impotence of body, it does not hold good. Cohabitation is demanded, and if by mutual consent the parties disjoin this or one leaves against the will of the other, then marriage is broken.

The duties of marriage are (1) to live together: (2) to love to the height of dearness in the Lord and in the communion of true religion: (3) the husband to be the head and the wife a helpmate: (4) the marriage duty. Those who do not do these or will not do them dissolve matrimony and are not man and wife.

The causes enumerated by civil law as breaking marriage are really right: divorce by mutual consent is allowed. Anyone, further, who really disregards the ends of marriage is an "infidel," and his wife may leave him.

In all cases of divorce remarriage is allowed.

Bucer's views greatly influenced and interested Milton, who reprinted (in epitome) Bucer's treatise. Milton's views represented those of the Lutherans, which lingered on in England outside those views taken by the Church of England, and they had considerable influence in the American colonies.

The great stress laid upon Old Testament example should be noted: its force for Bucer is as great as is that of the New. It is odd to notice in this connection the strange accusation of Judaism against him which was not founded upon this cause.

[Milton's condensed translation of Bucer's treatment of divorce—"The judgement of Martin Bucer "concerning divorce: written to Edward the Sixth, in "his second Book of the Kingdom of Christ: and "Englished"—makes it needless to give quotations.]

IX. Marriage Law (Zürich) of May 1525.

Zwingli: Opera; Vol. II., Pt. II., 356 (in modern German in I. C. Moriköfer, Ulrich Zwingli, I. 261, as given here).

Um Argwohn, Hinterrede und Betrug zu vermeiden, so wollen wir, das jede Ehe, die rechtlich eingegangen ist, öffentlich in der Kirche bezeugt und mit der Fürbitte der Gemeinde zusammgegeben werde. Auch soll ein jeder Pfarrer solche Personen alle einschreiben und aufzeichen, um Keiner dem Andern seinen Unterthanen einziehen ohne seinen offenkundigen Willen.

Was eine Ehe scheiden möge: Es geziemt dem Gatten, der keine Ursache dazu gegeben hat, das Andere, so am offenen Ehbruch ergriffen wird, von sich zu stossen, zu verlassen und eine andere Ehe einzugeben. Offener Ehbruch ist derjenige, welcher vor dem Ehegericht mit genugsamer Kundschaft erwiesen oder durch offene That so bar und verdächtigt ist, dass die That auf keine Weise geläugnet werden mag. Um dem Ehbruch nicht Glimpf zu thun und damit Niemand Veranlassung suche, durch Ehbruch zu einer neuen Ehe zu gelangen, wird noth sein, dass man auf den Ehbruch auch eine harte Strafe setze. Daher werden die Pfarrer solch Uebertreten mit der christlichen Gemeinde bannen und ausschliessen; aber die leibliche Strafe, und die Entschiedung über das Gut steht der Obrigkeit zu. Damit sich aber Niemand um dieser Ursache willen vor der Ehe scheue und in Hurerei verfalle, sollen solche ebenfalls gebannt werden. So nun die Ehe eingesetzt ist, Unkeuschheit zu vermeiden, und aber oft solche erfunden werden, die von Natur oder andern Gebrechen zu Ehlichen Werken ungeschickt oder unvermögend sind, sollen sie nichtsdesweniger ein Jahr freundlich bei einander wohnen, ob es um sie besser würde durch ihre und anderer biedern Leute Fürbitte. Wird es nicht besser in der Zeit, so soll man sie von einander scheiden und anderswo sich vermählen lassen. Grössere Sache denn Ehbruch, als so Einen das Leben verwirkt, nicht sicher vor einander wären, bei Wuth, Verrücktheit, frecher Hurerei oder Eines das Andere unerlaubt verliesse, lange abwesend wäre, aussatzig und dergleichen däruber man wegen Ungleichheit der Sachlagen kein bestimmtes Gesetz machen kann, mögen die Richter prüfen, und handeln, wie sie Gott und die Gestalt der Sache lahnen wird. Diese Satzungen sollen alle Pfarrer fleissig und zum öftern Male den Ihrigen verkündigen und sie warnen. Datum zu Zürich, d. 10 Mai 1525.

Commentary on St. Matthew.

X. Quicunque repudiaverit suam uxorem.—Iudaei ob levem causam uxores a se repudiabant, affectibus suis in hoc nimium indulgentes. Metam ergo ponit Christus, ne-quid nimis. Cohibet affectus, et modum quendum ponit, quem transgredi nefas sit. Stuprum autem aut adulterium diserte pouit, non ut caeteras causas divortii excludat aut hanc solam praescribat, sed ut unam ex multis definiat. Hic enim mos est scripturae sanctae, ut uno exemplo contenta universa eiusdem generis exempla comprehendat. Non ergo adulterium duntaxat causa est divortii, sed praecipua fere. Quae enim vel aequant vel superant adulteris, ut sunt proditiones, venficia, parricidia, etc., cur excluderet dominus? Quod vero unico exemplo scripture caetera intelligat, ut reliqua taceam, ex cap. 19 Deuter. manifestum faciam, ubi una involuntarii homicidii causa duntaxat ponitur, propter quam tutus sit in asylis homicida, nempe si ferrum de manubrio lapsum comitem temere interfecerit. Quid si lapide aut latere e tecto delapso prateriens praeter voluntatem eius qui tectum reficit laedatur et intereat? quid si ligno aut alia re? Num illi duntaxat asylum a domino constituitur, qui ferro præter mentem trucidat. Minime, redimoy ponitur causa, eaque exempli vice, ex quibus caeterae facile colleguntur, etc.

From Commentary on St. Matt.

XI. Quod deus coniunxit homo non separet. Ego sensum genuinum talem esse puto. Nemo temere congugium damnet, nemo divinam ordinationem, ut Papistae fecerunt et aliae gentes, quae coniugium damnarunt. Deinde etiam nemo temere separet eos qui matrimonio iuncti sunt. De repudio loquuturi, primum de antinomia quaedam praemittemus, etc. [. . . an opposition of laws which good judges soften .]

Verba igitur Christi (quod deus coniunxit homo non separet) sic arida sunt ut videantur coniuges nulla ex causa separari posse. Deinde unam fornicationem excipit, ut videantur nulla alia causa admittenda esse. Hinc inter Christianos receptissimum est, ubi semel coiit matrimonium, nulla pacto posse dirimi, nisi alterius morte. Sed uolumus Iudaico more sic literae inhaerere superstitiose, ut leges alias negligamus quae eodem spiritu dictante proditae sunt. Dominus enim temerarium repudium Iudaeorum hic damnat, non omne repudium. Neque unam duntaxat causum excipit, tametsi unius tantum meminerit. Hic enim mos est Hebraeorum, ut sub inferiori similia et graviora omnia intelligunt et exprimant. Minimam ergo causam adulterium seu fornicationem assignat, quasi terminum ponens infra quem nemo uxorem repudiare debeat. (Examples of this Heb. Mos. follow.)

Qui impotentes sunt natura rite separantur, et nubendi facultas uxoribus datur, idque optimo et divino iure, tametsi hoc nusquam claris verbis sit expressum. Dicit enim Paulus: Qui continere non potest nubat, et melius est nubere quam uri. Quod si quae viro nupserat natura impotenti, quis non videt iam causam adesse divortii? quum matrimonio in hoc sit a Deo institutum, ut utrique remedium carni habeat praesens. Porro in impari coniugio Paulus divortium admittat, si alter alterum ob fidei professionem dimiserit.

Qui repudiatam duxerit, adulter est. Eam, scilicet, quae ex levi causa repudiata est, sine iure, sententiaque iudicis. Nam si repudiata est propter fornicationem seu ob aliam causam graviorem, potest talis fortasse recipi in gratiam si resipiscat et admitti ad aliud connubium.

Luther.

XII. Von dem ehelichen Leben oder Ehestande (Den II. Theil).

Aufs andere wollen wir sehen, welche Personen man scheiden möge.

36. Drey Ursachen weiss ich, die Mann und Weib scheiden. Die erste, die jetzt und droben gesagt ist, wenn Mann oder Weib untüchtig zur Ehe ist, der Gliedmass oder Natur halben, wie das seyn mag: davon ist genug gesagt [referring to 34 where he says:

"Wenn Mann oder Weib untüchtig zur Ehe ist. Das ist die einige redleche Ursache unter diesen achzehn die ehe zu verreisen: wiewol sie dennoch mit viel Gesetzen verfasset ist, ehe man es zewege bringen kann bey den Tyrannen."]

37. Die andere ist, der Ehebruch. Von dieser haben die Päbste geschwiegen, darum müssen wir Christum hören, Matt. 19, 4, sq. da ihn die Iüden fragten, ob ein Mann sein Weib lassen möchte aus allerley Ursach?—Antwortete er: Habt ihr nicht gelesen, dass, der den Menschen vom Anfang schuf, der machte sie ein Mann und Weib, und sprach: Darum wird ein Mann lassen Vater und Mutter, und au seinem Weibe hangen, und werden zwey Ein Fleisch seyn? Das nun GOTT zusammen füget, das soll niemand scheiden, etc. Hie siehest du, dass um Ehebruchs willen Christus Mann und Weib scheidet, dass, welches unschuldig ist, mag sich verändern. Dern damit, dass er spricht, es sey ein Ehebruch, wer eine andere nimmt, und lässet die erste (es sey denn um Hurerey willen) gibt er gnugsam zu verleben, dass der nicht Ehebruch thut, der eine andere nimmt, und die erste lässet um Hurerey willen.

38. [He expounds case of Jews, giving a letter of divorce.] Darum gilt solch Gesetz bey den Christen nicht, welche sollen im geistlichen Regiment leben. Wo aber etliche unchristlich leben mit ihren Weibern, wäre es noch gut, dass man solch Gesetz sie liesse brauchen, so fern, dass man sie fur keine Christen hielte, das sie doch sonst nicht sind.

40. Aber offentlich sich scheiden, also, dass sich eins verändern mag, das muss durch weltliche Erkundung und Gewalt zu gehen, dass der Ehebruch offenbar sei vor jedermann: oder, wo die Gewalt nicht dazu thun will, mit Wissen der Gemeinde sich scheide: dass abermal nicht ein jeglicher ihm Ursach nehme zu scheiden, wie er will.

41. Fragest du denn, wo soll das andere bleiben wenn es vielleicht, auch nicht kann Keuschheit halten? Antwort: Darum hat Gott im Gesetz geboten, die Ehebrecher zu steinigen, dass sie diese Frage nicht dürften. Also soll auch noch das weltliche Schwerdt mit Obrigkeit die Ehebrecher tödten. Denn wer seine Ehe bricht, der hat sich schon selbst geschieden, und ist für einen todten Menschen geachtet. Darum mag sich das andere verändern, als wäre ihm sein Gemahl gestorben, wo er das Recht halten, und ihm nicht Gnaden erzeigen will. Wo aber die Obrigkeit saümig und lässig ist, und nicht tödtet, mag sich der Ehebrecher in ein ander fern Land machen, und daselbst freyen, wo er sich nicht halten kann. Aber es wäre besser, todt, todt mit ihm, um böses Exempels willen, zu meiden.

42. [Objection may be made to this as leading bad men to give themselves free course, but it is better they should go away than that whoredom should occur in the community.]

43. [Where the magistracy does not inflict death, and a spouse retains his spouse, punishment should be given, privately, before the Church or by law.]

44. [If a couple are unable "die eheliche Pflicht zahlen" the husband is to warn the wife three times, bring her before the officials (Gemeinde) and put her away.] "Willt du nicht, so will eine andere: will "Frau nicht, so komme die Magd."

45. (Founded on 1 Cor. vii.)

48. In case of a sick spouse, she is not to be put away: it is possible to contain: it is a way to holiness.

M. Luther.

De Divortio.

XIII. Et in summa, eo licentiae ac et libertatis rem deduxerant, ut citra omnem metum et conscientiam cum matrimonio contrahendo et divortio faciendo agebant, ut volebant. . . .

Caeterum quemadmodum apud nos in re coniugali et faciendo divortio agendum sit dixi, Iurisperitis commendandum esse et magistratui subjiciendum. Cum matrimonium res prorsus sit externa et mundana, sicut uxor, liberi, domus, agri, praedia et eius generis alia ad magistratus officium pertinentia, utpote quod rationi omnino subiaceat Genes. i. quare neque nos latius euagabimur quam ut videamus, quae apud Iudaeos hac in re fuerit licentia, et quomodo vivendum sit his qui Christiani perhiberi volunt. Nam qui Christiani non sunt, nihil ad nos pertinent, quippe qui non sunt Evangelio, sed vi et supplicio regendi, ut officium nostrum purum conseruemus, nec plus agamus, quam nobis commissum est.

Quocirca Christum quoque Matt. xix. interrogabant, num liceret homini divortium facere cum uxore sua, qualibet ex causa: Quibus saevere ac duriter respondet, illorum leuitatem accusans, non secus atque hic concludens, quod et qui uxorem repudiat et qui repudiatam duxerit (nisi propter stuprum) uterque adulterium committat et facit illam quoque adulterium committere, si alteri nupserit (nam alioqui moechari non posset, si sine viri conuersatione permaneret.) Quibus verbis non tantum ipsorum hac in re leuitatem reprehendit, sed docet etiam, diuortium prorsus non faciendum esse, aut si factum fuerit, utraque pars in coelibatu permaneat, concludens diuortium semper adulterii causam esse.

Stat ergo sententia, quod iis, qui Christiani esse volunt, diuortium faciendum non sit, sed unicuique sua uxor retinenda est, qua cum bona et mala, acerba et dulcia aequo animo ferre cogitur et pati, quamvis morosa fuerit et difficilis atque defectibus obnoxia. Aut si repudiaverit, vt in coelibatu perseveret. Nec valet aut licitum est, ex matrimonio libertatem facere, quasi in nostro arbitratu situm esset, cum illo hoc aut alio pacto agere, mutare et remutare, sicut animo nostro collibuisset. Sed ita res se habet, sicut Christus dixit: Quod Deus coniunxit, homo non separet.

Caeterum si quaesieris, an prorsus nulla causa sit, quae permittat viro cum uxore facere diuortium. Respondeo, Christus hoc capite et iterum Matt. xix. hanc indicat, quae adulterium dicitur, tractam e lege Mosaica, adulterium capitis supplicio puniente. Cum ergo sola mors matrimonium scindat et segreget et alterum partem a iugo liberet constat iam adulterum quoque repudiatum esse, non per homines sed ab ipso Deo, et non tantum a sua coniuge sed etiam ab hac vita segregatum et exterminatum. Nam adulterii flagitio se ipse ab vxore sua segregavit et matrimonium discidit, quod ipsi scindendum non erat, quo scelere mortem commeruit, et iam coram Deo mortuus est, quanquam a iudice non occidatur. Itaque Deo hic diuortium faciente, altera pars liberatur, ut non amplius compari cogatur esse obnoxia, seruare velit, nec ne eam quae lapsa est, nisi lubenti animo facere voluerit.

Proinde talis diuortii neque autores sumus, neque dissuasores, sed magistratui omnem eius rei causam cognoscendam commendamus, non grauate permittentes quicquid faciendum statuierint. Attamen Christiane viuere volentibus autor essem, multo satius esse, utramque partem moneri et provocari, ut simul manerent, et pars innoxia crimini et culpae obnoxiae (si modo deijcere se velit et resipiscere) placandum se exhiberet et illi Christianae charitatis ductu ignosceret, nisi vitae esset usque adeo deploratae, ut nulla spes foret unquam resipiscendi et vitae in melius commutandae. Aut si is, qui adulteriis famosus esset, et iam denuo in gratiam receptus tali beneficio abuti velit, nec eo minus suae consuetudini aperte et libere satisfacere, ista impunitate et facilitate ignoscendi fretus, quasi ipsi parcendum esset et venia concedenda. Hic ego quoque suaserim, tali nullam delecti gratiam esse faciendam sed potius autor esse velim, ut tam perditi nebulones fustuario et virgis publicitus emendarentur, aut talis adultera sacco insuta in gurgitem mergeretur etc.

Super hanc causam adulterii adhuc una est, quae sit, quoties altera persona coniugum alteram dimiserit, sicut quando altera ab altera ex mera animi libidine cursitat. Veluti si Ethnica apud Christianum habitaret, aut quemadmodum hoc aetatis saepe accidit, ubi altera persona adhaerescit Euangelio, altera infensa est (de quibus Paulus 1 Corinth. vii. scribit) num hic quoque locus relinquendus sit diuortio. Hic diutius Paulus concludit, alteram partem manere volentem, alteri seruandam esse, quanquem in fide discordes sunt, fides tamen matrimonium discindere non debet. Sin altera pars prorsus manere nolit tum missam facito, neque ideo captus aut coactus es, ut illam cursu insequaris.

Ubi autem quispiam liguritor et perditus nepos citra uxoris suae consensum et scientiam clanculum abierit et fuga se subduxerit, domo, uxore, liberis, et familia desertis et animum unum atque alterum, aut quandiu tandem animo libitum fuerit, peregre manserit (sicut hac tempestate saepenumero accidit) et postquam libidinatus fuerit, omni etiam per luxuriam abunde devorata substantia, iterum se ad domum velit recipere, et dominium se vendicare, ita ut deserta uxor ipsius aduentum expectare cogeretur, quoad illi licuisset, et iam reducem denuo ad se recipere, eiusmodo inquam nebulo, non tantum e propriis bonis praecipitandus et exterminandus est, sed etiam exilio mulctandus et altera pars (si vocatus et iam multo tempore expectatus venire supersederet) libere pronuncianda. Talis enim quovis gentili et infideli longe est deterior, et minus ferendus, quamque simplex aliquis fornicator, qui quanquam semel lapsus sit, tamen se emendare potest et pristinam fidem suae coniugi exhibere.

Hic autem pro ridiculo et delectamento habet matrimonium, nec tanti uxorem et liberos suos aestimat, ut cum illis sicut patrem decet, legittimo thoro habitare et manere dignaretur, sed ut reuersus certum, receptum habeat, quoties et quando animo libuerit, redire voluerit. Verum enimuero haec scripturae est sententia, qui uxorem et liberos habere voluerit, illi domi cum suis manendum est, et communis fortuna, sive secunde sive adverse flaverit, toleranda, quamdiu apud superos egerit, aut si hoc recusaverit, tum fustibus adigendus et emendandus est, ut faciat, aut in totum ab uxore aedibus et re familiari segregetur et excludatur.

Caeterum his causis deficientibus, alii defectus et casus connubium impedire non debent, sed neque divortio dissipare, ut sunt ira, iurgium, contentio, rei familiaris negligentia et id genus sexcenta. Sin autem divortio separati fuerint (inquit Paulus) tum utraque pars in coelibatu permaneat.

XIV. Melanchthon.

Dictum est:

Qui dimiserit uxorem suam, det ei libellum repudii. Ego autem dico vobis, etc.

Has levitates taxat Christus, quia valde displicent Deo confusiones libidinum.

Ideo volo ordine de hac materia dicere. Primum, de castitate. Secundo, de coniugio. Tertio, de diuortio. Quarto, de officio Magistratus, in puniendis adulteriis, et aliis libidinibus.

De Divortiis.

Quando igitur incidunt domesticae calamitates qualescunque, cogitemus de peccato originis, et de aliis peccatis, quae nos addimus, et has coniugales miserias sciamus poenas esse peccatorum. Ideo agamus poenitentiam, et oremus Deum, ut nos regat, et simus ipsi vigilantes contra diabolum, ne rixae crescant, quia diabolus, sumtaoccasione, ex parvis scintillis magna incendia exuscitat.

Set igitur haec prima regula

Hanc esse mentem Evangelii certissimum est. Quanquam enim Moises permisit divortia, ita ut liceret viro dimittere uxorem, etiam quae non peccaverat, tamen hunc morem Christus improbat, et expresse prohibet talia Mosaica divortia, et retrahit coniugium ad primam institutionem. Erunt duo in carnem unam.

Ut autem coniuges possint manere simul, discamus etiam opus esse patientia mutua, et precatione ad Deum contra diabolum.

Secunda regula.

(d) Certum est, quod peccant adulter et adultera, item quod peccant desertor et desertrix. Postquam autem per tales dilaceratum est foedus coniugii, quaestio est, An liceat personae innocenti, rursus cum alia coniugium contrahere?

Hic Papa dicit, quod non sit concedendum aliud coniugium personae innocenti. Non volo autem longam disputationem hoc loco recitare, satis clarus est hic textus, qui dicit posse divortium fieri inter tales, personam innocentem, et adulteram vel adulterum.

Iam si innocenti personae non concederetur aliud coniugium, id esset Nomine divortium, non Re.

Quid opus fuisset excipere casum adulterii, si voluisset eodem modo obligatam personam innocentem, sicut in aliis casibus vult esse obligatam, videlicet, si uxor sit iracundior, aut sit aegrota?

Et olim in Ecclesia hunc morem fuisse, ut concederentur talia divortia personis innocentibus, aliqua antiqua dicta et exempla ostendunt.

Ieronymus narrat, Romae fuisse nobilem matronam Fabiolam, quae maritum habuit adulterum, et turpissime viventem.

Haec tandem alteri viro nupsit. Etsi autem Ieronymus disputat de hoc facto, tamen historia ostendit, fuisse hunc morem adhuc usitatum. Et leguntur alia exempla.

Tertia regula.

Est autem desertor vel desertrix persona, quae sine iusta causa discedit a coniuge, et diu abest sine iusta causa, ex malicia, ut saepe fit. Tales sunt etiam plerunque adulteri et adulterae.

In his duobus casibus servatur etiam in nostris consistoriis hoc, ut concedatur innocenti personae aliud coniugium.

Sed postea quaerendum est de poena personae, quae peccavit vel adulterio vel desertione. De hac poena dicam proxime.

De iudiciis et poenis.

(f) Nuper dictum est, in quibus casibus possit concedi personae innocenti coniugium. Et clare et expresse dixi, quod nullus homo possit iuste distrahere coniugium. Sed adulter et desertor distrahunt contra voluntatem Dei, et horribiliter peccant. Persona innocens non distrahit, sed est libera, postquam iam per adulterium alterius facta est distractio, vel per desertionem alterius.

Sed hic sciendum est, quod oportet tales causas afferri ad Iudicem ad hoc ordinatum. Nemo est sibi ipsi iudex adversus alterum. Sed si vis condemnari personam nocentem, et te pronunciari liberum, oportet hoc fieri per ordinarium iudicem.

Nec prius licet personae innocenti contrahere aliud coniugium, quam fiat cognitio per iudicem ordinarium. Hoc etiam diligenter et saepe debebant Pastores in suis concionibus populo dicere, quia saepe accidit, ut contrahant tales personae sine iudicio, et postea inveniuntur causae insufficientes separationis, et multa mala sequuntur. Ideo recte factum est, quod potestas in his Ecclesiis singulares Iudices et Consistoria pro his causis ordinavit, ut sciant homines, ubi quaerendi sint harum rerum iudices, et optandum esset, hos iudices magis etiam iuvari a potestate superiori, et ab iis, qui gerunt gladium.

Papistae talia iudicia fere omnino negligunt, sicut alias multas bonas ordinationes valde corruperunt.

Et propter istorum negligentiam, nostrae potestates etiam sunt negligentiores. Sed oremus Deum, ut ipse nos iuvet, et det nobis salutaria regimina.

Quaestio de aegrotis.

(g) Hic etiam quaestio movetur de aegrotis, an propter morbum perpetuum facienda sit separatio?

Responsio.

Non volo de omnibus quaestionibus huius materiae in concione loqui, sed relinquo haec negocia Consistoriis pro magna parte. Tantum pauca dicam, utilia praesenti populo.

Ac primum hoc dico, quando aliqua persona natura non est idonea ad coniugium, ut, so ein Man gantz keine manliche krafft zu einer Frawen hat, talis coniunctio non est coniugium. Et iudex scit se debere pronunciare, quod non sit coniugium, et debet potestatem concedere personae valenti, ut aliud coniugium contrahat. Et de hac materia satis sit iam dictum, caetera commendo Consistoriis.

Sed si sunt alii morbi, ut lepra, morbus gallicus, vel alii similes morbi, in viro vel in muliere, hic dico, quod tales morbi nequaquam separent coniuges et quod nequaquam sint sufficientes causae diuortii.

Dicit aliquis: Hoc grave est, quod cogor retinere aegrotum coniugem. Quanquam est grave, tamen iustissimum est. Id sic probo.

Summa amicicia est bene facere amico in necessitate et in miseria.

Inter maritum et uxorem est summa amicicia tantisper, donec non divelluntur per scelus aliquod. Tantisper enim de eis verum est. Erunt duo in carnem unam.

Ergo propter morbum nullo modo dissolvatur coniugium, sed in morbo ostendatur fiidelitas erga aegrotam personam.

Quanta haec iniuria esset, si haberes honestam coniugem, et ex ea filios et filias, et illa inciperet aegrotare, si tunc velles eam abiicere.

Sic estis copulati, ut laeta et tristia simul toleretis, et alter alteri auxilium ferat. Sicut parentes non debent abiicere filios et filias, cum aegrotant, sic maritus uxorem non debet abiicere aegrotantem, nec mulier discedere a viro aegrotante. Deus ideo instituit societatem coniugum, item parentum et filiorum et filiarum, ut infirmi et aegroti habeant auxilium, sicut mater infantulum curat, non abiicit.

Haec satis sit etiam de hoc casu dixisse, et necessaria est haec admonitio pro multis, quia multi fiunt impatientes, et aliqui deserunt aegrotantes coniuges. Tales impatientes sciant voluntatem Dei esse, quod debeant petere consolationem a Deo, et Deo obedire in tali afflictione, et debeant manere apud aegrotantes, et nequaquam ab eis discedere.

De poenis adulterorum.

(h) Restat ultima pars de poenis, de qua etiam breviter dicam.

In Ecclesia est tantum una poena, scilicet Excommunicatio, adversus omnia delicta, quae sunt manifesta, vel in iudiciis ostensa. Etsi autem haec poena valde magna est, scilicet esse eiectum ex Ecclesia Dei, et non habere remissionem peccatorum, sicut dictum est: Quorum retinueritis peccata, retinentur eis, tamen homines impii non curant hanc poenam.

Sed mandatum Dei est, ut magistratus, qui gerit gladium, severe puniat adulteros poenis corporalibus, sicut in lege Dei scriptum est, Deut. 22: Si dormierit vir cum vxore alterius, uterque morietur, adulter et adultera, et auferes malum de Israël.

Et alia multa ibidem de poenis adulterii et scortationis dicuntur. Et quia magistratus non punit, Deus postea punit utrosque, scilicet, adulteros et magistratus. Imo punit propter hanc negligentiam totas gentes, sicut in exemplo Beniamin apparet.

Nobiles adolescentes, compresserant Levitae coniugem, et eam interfecerant, maritus dissecuit cadaver, et misit partes ad omnes tribus Israel, et questus est de hoc scelere.

Israël sitae convenerunt, et iusserunt ut sontes mitterentur ipsis, ut iusta poena eos afficerent, sed quia erant hominum nobilium filii, nemo voluit eos dedere ad poenam. Ideo postea secutum est magnum bellum, et fere tota tribus Beniamin interfecta est. Ita non debemus dubitare, quin Deus puniat et adulteros et magistratus, et totas gentes, propter magistratuum negligentiam. Haec nos concionatores monere debemus, plura facere non possumus. Sed dico vobis: O Consules et Magistratus: Timete iram Dei, et considerate poenas publicas. Scitis ipsi vestram in puniendo negligentiam, ideo emendate vos, et sitis seueriores.

Haec de hoc loco Matthaei, de adulteriis et de divortiis dicta sufficiant.

XV. [In prohibited degrees Moses' list to be kept to.]

Item, non licet ei personae, quae discessit ab adultero, contrahere matrimonium cum alia, nisi divortium coram Ecclesia, id est, his, qui praesunt, factum sit.

Quid, si mulier aegrotet morbo gallico, seu lepra, liceat aliam ducere? Responsio: Non licet, nec morbum esse caussam rescindendi matrimonii, nec senecta caussa est dividendi. Igitur Pastores in his casibus iudicandis cauti sint.

Vom Ehestand.

[The Pastors to denounce, and magistrates to punish sins against marriage.]

Rechte gesetze vom Ehestand sind allezeit allein in der wahrhafftigen Kirchen gewesen, da der Ehestand durch besondere Gottes gab recht erhalten ist.

De coniugio.

[Prohibited degrees kept: and all fit persons allowed to marry.]

De divortiis firmissime tenetur Regula, peccare eos, qui vel adulterio, vel desertione initium faciunt distractionis. Et adulteri ac adulterae et desertores et desertrices condemnantur voce docentium in Ecclesiis et iudicum in Consistoriis, et a magistratibus severe puniuntur. Sed personae innocenti, cum re cognita, pronunciatur esse libera, non prohibetur coniugium, ut Deum invocare et pie vivere possit. Cum enim expresse dominus liberet personam innocentem Matt. 19 cum altera polluta est adulterio, intelligenda est liberatio non tantum nomine, sed re, Et Paulus eodem modo loquitur in casu desertionis. Haec nostra consuetudo et cum veteri Ecclesia congruit. Ceterae leges in Consistoriis nostris congruunt cum Jure canonico.

De Divortio.

Sanxit igitur statim initio, ne dissolverentur coniugia, inquiens: erunt duo in carnem unam, id est, inseparabiliter iuncti; nam in hanc sententiam Dominus ipse hoc dictum citat Matth. 19; et huic praecepto primi patres, Adam, Seth et alii sine ulla dubitatione obtemperaverunt, et hanc doctrinam aliis tradiderunt.

Sed postea laxata veteri disciplina divortia etiam recepta sunt, et cum iam ante Moysen usitata essent, permissa sunt et voce legis Mosaicae, sed tamen initio metae circumdatae fuerunt, ne privata levitate fierent, sed in iudiciis prius cognoscebantur causae.

Sanxit etiam lex singulari consilio, ne rursus duceretur dimissa, quae postea alteri nupta fuit; detestatur enim Deus confusiones libidinum.

Apud veteres Atticos etiam consuetudo fuit, ut in iudiciis causae divortii cognoscerentur; sed postea apud Iudaeos et gentes secuta est maior levitas et licentia, et privato arbitrio facta sunt divortia; sive causae graves essent, sive leves, sive nullae; sunt et reductae, quae antea dimissae fuerant, ut Cato petenti Hortensio cesserat Martiam, et post mortem Hortensii rursus eam sibi adiunxit. Talis Levitas occasionem quaestioni praebuit Matth. 19: prohibet igitur Dominus divortia in eo loco, excepto uno casu, videlicet adulterio, in quo casu persona suo scelere dissolvit coniugium, et e medio tollenda erat; nec dissolutionis causa est persona innocens; ideo vox Filii Dei liberat innocentem personam; extat et alter casus 1 Cor. 7 de desertore vel desertrice.

Auditis igitur partibus, et confirmata accusatione, si accusator honeste vixit, et petit ferri sententiam, pronuntietur hoc modo: cum persona, quae deliquit, suo scelere dissolverit coniugium, iudex auctoritate Evangelii personam innocentem pronuntiat esse liberam, et expresse inquit, concedi ei, ut pro sua conscientia pie contrahat aliud coniugium.

Pontificii Canones faciunt divortium nomine, non re, id est, non premittunt, ut persona innocens contrahrat aliud coniugium; sed cum Evangelium in illis casibus concedat divortium, intelligatur id non de inani vocabulo, sed de tali liberatione, quae sit re ipsa divortium, videlicet, in quo non retineatur ligata persona innocens: et fuisse hanc consuetudinem in ecclesia veteri, annotatum est ab Origine in Matthaeum; item ab Eusebio in Ecclesiastica historia, qui pag. 88 recitat historiam ex Justino Martyre, qui scribit, mulierem piam fecisse divortium cum marito polluto flagitiosis libidinibus, et publice accepisse libellum repudii, ut vocabant, id est, tabulas testificantes de divortio; et Hieronymus recitat Fabiolae nobilis matronae romanae historiam, quae propter mariti scelera fecit divortium, et nupsit alteri. Haec exempla meminisse utile est ad confirmandum morem iudiciorum in nostris ecclesiis.

Sin autem persona quae deliquit, non venit in iudicium, sed aut contumaciter abest, aut inveniri non potest, cum accusator confirmata accusatione testes adducit, qui affirmant eius famam integram esse, et petit se liberari, pronunciet iudex, eum liberum esse, ut ante dictum est.

Sed quid fiet de persona condemnata?

An concedendum est ei, si adest, ut in iisdem locis vivat?

Respondeo: magistratus politicus adulteria punire debet: ideo persona condemnata, si non punitur durius, pellenda est ex iis locis, ubi vivit persona innocens: cui altera, videlicit condemnata, velut mortua existimanda est; et haec severitas ad politicum magistratum pertinet.

Quis sit desertor.

Etsi autem aliqui restringunt hoc dictum ad casum de religione, tamen vere accommodatur in genere ad quamcunque iniustam desertionem, cum non sit ratio dissimilitudinis; et consentaneum est, desertores impatientes freni coniugalis deinde non abstinere ab aliis mulieribus; sed cum variae sint causae migrationum, definiendus est desertor; nec concedendum est desertae personae coniugium sine iudicum cognitione.

Est igitur desertor, qui discedit a coniuge, aut diutius abest, nulla honesta causa coactus, sed vel levitate, vel iniusta impatientia freni coniugalis, vel aliis non necessariis causis impulsus vagatur.

Et multi adeo sunt ἀστοργοι, qui agitantur a diabolis ut etiam sobolem negligant: talis desertor propter perfidiam et ἀστοργιαν supplicio publico puniendus erat; ideo iustum est opem ferre personae innocenti, quae deserta est; accedat autem, ut dixi, cognitio iudicum; vocetur ergo in iudicium, et cum non veniet, audiantur testimonia de personae innocentis integritate et pronuncietur libera, etc.

Non est autem desertor, qui abest officii causa, ut legatus, aut miles delectus auctoritate legitima ad militandum, aut si voluntate coniugis maritus abest in mercatu, aut alio honesto negotio.

Nec captivitas dissolvit coniugia, nec deportatio, ut lex Alexandri Severi in Codice de repudiis inquit: matrimonium deportatione, vel aquae et ignis interdictione non solvitur, si casus, in quem maritus incidit, non mutat uxoris affectum, id est, si non est tale scelus, quo alioqui coniugium dissolveretur.

De milite autem narrat constitutio Justiniani in Authenticis: olim, si toto quadriennio nihil significasset uxori inquirenti miles de sua voluntate, concessum fuisse mulieri aliud coniugium. Hanc brevitatem temporis reprehendit Justinianus inquiens: militi tristius esse uxorem domi amittere militiae causa, quam capi ab hostibus: ideo sancit longius tempus, et requirit diligentem inquisitionem de voluntate viri. Loquitur autem lex de militia legitima, non de levibus hominibus, qui non virtutis et militiae causa domo absunt, sed ut liberius vagari possint, militum titulum assumunt. Hoc discrimen etiam iudex considerabit.

De tempore, post quod alia coniugia concedi possunt.

Si divortium factum est propter adulterium, innocenti personae non praescribitur tempus, postquam res iudicata est.

Sed in quaestione desertionis annos considerari necesse est, ut intelligatur personam vere desertam esse, non levitati aut perfidiæ praetexere umbram desertionis.

Lex in Codice concedit sponsae post biennium alteri nubere, si ea non assentiente sponsus, qui tamen non est extra provinciam, tam diu differt publicum ritum coniugii.

Alia lex de sponso peregrinante loquitur, de quo concedit sponsae post triennium alteri nubere, videlicet nisi ea assentiente diutius absit.

Pontificiae constitutiones desertae personae quantumlibet innocenti nullo unquam tempore concedunt coniugium, nisi desertricem personam constet mortuam esse; sed supra recitavi dictum Pauli ex Corinthiis, quod liberat personam innocentem, et plerumque desertrix persona simul adulterii rea est: nequaquam igitur laquei iniiciendi sunt innocenti personae propter aliena delicta, sed intelligatur et in hoc casu liberatio non de inani vocabulo, et personae liberatae concedatur coniugium.

Justinianus expresse concedit coniugium desertae personae post decennium. Glossa in capitulo: in praesentia in Decretalibus, ita inquit: ubi post septennium verisimiliter praesumitur de morte viri, excusatur mulier, si nubat; ac mitior est glossa, quam textus; sed cum iudex inquisiuit negotium, et comperit, querelam de desertione non esse inanem praetextum, et videt mores personae innocentis honestos esse, posset imitari legem Constantini de quadriennio, vel dictum de quinquennio in Digest. in tit. de divortio.

Haec moderatio non videtur absurda; nec tamen praescribo certum tempus, sed sapiens iudex simul considerabit, quid deceat exempli causa, et ne laqueos conscientiae innocentis personae iniiciat.

De divortiis propter saevitiam, veneficia et insidias structas vitae.

Etsi autem aliqui reiiciunt hanc legem et contendunt eam ab evangelio dissentire, tamen hi non recte intelligunt discrimen Legis et Evangelii; et cum expresse dicat Dominus, in politia Moysi divortia permissa esse propter duritiem cordis, significat aliam esse gubernationem hominum sanabilium, qui sunt membra ecclesie, et volunt obtemperare Evangelio, aliam politicam impiorum et contumacium, qui frenos legum pati nolunt.

Si quis est igitur talis maritus, qui saevitiam in coniugem exercet, et admonitus a pastoribus non desinit furere et domesticae ecclesiae invocationem turbare, et uxorem ita crudeliter tractare, ut vita in periculo sit, hic certe magistratus politici imperio coercendus est, qui non solum vitam personae innocentis tueri debet, sed etiam debet eius conscientiae consulere, ne fracta dolore et indignatione tandem abiiciat invocationem aut aliquid iniuste faciat, ut dicitur; furor fit laesa saepius patientia. In eo casu, in persona crudeli, non pertinente ad ecclesiam, magistratus politicus Theodosii lege uti posse videtur.

Imperia politica vult Deus honori esse bonis, et terrori malis; vult Deus tegi eos, quorum mores sunt sine scelere, vult eis concedi pacem ad invocationem, ad educationem et ad institutionem sobolis; vult latrones reprimi, sive domi sive foris latrocinia exerceant; nec desunt unquam in imperiis homines contumaces, iniusti et ἀστοργοι, exercentes in suos iniustam saevitiam, quales nominat Dominus in hac concione duros corde.

An propter morbos contagiosos et incurabiles, ut propter lepram, divortium fieri possit?

Omnia igitur dicta, quae prohibent distractionem, proponant sibi homines timentes Deum: Gen. 2. 24: erunt duo in carnem unam; 1 Cor. 7. 4: vir non habet potestatem corporis sui, sed uxor; nec uxor potestatem habet corporis sui, sed maritus; Eph. 5. 25, 28. etc.: viri diligite uxores vestras; nemo carnem suam odio habuit, sed eam alit et fovet.

Cum igitur maneat foedus coniugale inter tales personas, quas non distraxit culpa, manifestum est, non deserendam esse aegrotam personam, ac deberi ei benevolentiam et auxilium tanquam proprio corpori. Summus amicitiae gradus est foedus coniugale; iniustissimum est autem, in calamitate amicum deserere egentem auxilio, et confugientem ad amici benevolentiam et fidem: quare desertio coniugis propter calamitatem, in qua nulla est culpa, iniusta et scelerata est.

Quidam vero crudeliter disputant, leprosos similes esse mortuis, et hoc praetextu consulere personae recte valenti student, sed hoc sophisma refutat manifesta crudelitas. Mortui non indigent aliorum hominum auxilio, aegrota persona adhuc indiget hominum auxilio; quare, quod ad verae amicitiae officia attinet, nondum est mortuae similis. Adhuc est caro tua, adhuc lex divina tibi concionatur: nemo carnem suam odio habuit; et auctoritate magistratuum cogenda est persona recte valens, ne deserat aegrotam, et ne negligat eius vitam, sed ferat opem aegrotanti. Etsi autem videtur aliquibus haec sententia durior, tamen iustam esse omnes bonae mentes intelligunt. Si quis autem maritus pius indiget consilio, interroget pastores eruditos et graves, et recte intelligentes doctrinam ecclesiae; potest enim responderi, ne perplexitate implicetur conscientia, et ne fides et invocatio in viro interrogante impediantur.

Peter Martyr.

De Diuortiis & Repudiis.

XVI.—(a) 52. Hebræis & Ethnicis fuit leue dimittere vxores, & licuit quauis de causa, at Christianis non ita esse debet. Christus hoc tractauit Matth. 5 & 19 vbi cùm dicat, Moses dedit vobis libellum repudii: nequaquam id sic accipi debet, quasi Moses id per seipsum absque iussu Dei egerit. Quia fuit, vt illi diuinitus testimonium datur, fidelissimus. Et quod iu Lege statuitur de diuortio, postea in Malachia præcipitur: Si odio habueris, nimirum vxorem tuam, dimitte illam. Nolebat quippe Dominus, odia et inimicitias in tanta necessitudine retineri. Reuocat itaque nos Christus in nouo Testamento, ad pristinam institutionem: Quia cùm modò sit spiritus copiosior & largior gratia, viri maiorem patientiam & charitatem erga vxores præstare debent, vt non quauis de causa sic aduersus illas offendantur, vt abijciant. Similiter ab vxoribus, maior obedientia & modestia requiritur.

(b) 53. Hîc mihi dices, Quid si hodie inueneris inter Christianos, tam duros corde & pervicaces, ad inimicitias & odia retinenda in coniugiis, vt Iudæos vincant, nedum illis æquentur? Quare cùm sit idem morbus, idem remedium non relinquitur? Quibus respondemus, eos qui sunt eiusmodi, à Christo alienos esse. Idcirco eos Reipub. committimus, vt statuat de illis prout melius visum fuerit. Quando enim ab Ecclesia emendari non possunt, illos vt Ethnicos et publicanos habemus. Agatur cum eis legibus ciuilibus. Ex verbo Christi satis explicatè habemus, id fieri non debere, vt citrà causam adulterii diuortium fiat: quæ exceptio non est mirum si à Paulo intermittatur: Quia cùm Paulus dicat, se non ista dicere, sed Dominum, nos ad eius verba remittit, neque mandato illius quippiam detrahit. Et cùm inquit se non dicere, sed Dominum: minimè reddit infirma quæ superius tradiderat, cùm à Christo dicta non legantur. Quoniam et illa sunt à Domino. Dicit quippe, Puto autem quòd et ego spiritum Dei habeam: Sed mandatum Christi ideo memorat, vt leniat verborum suorum acerbitatem. Carni quippe videtur întolerabile, matrimonium non posse dissolui: Est ac sì Paulus dixisset, Non propono vobis vel alienа, vel noua, et quæ ante me inaudita fuerint. Hoc mandauit Dominus. Alioquin et ista, et quæ superius scripsit Apostolus, firma sunt et authoritatis plena. Sed hoc interest, quòd ista Dominus per seipsum locutus est, et ea repetit per Paulum, illa verò tantummodo per Apostolum proferri voluit. Atque suam sententiam de non dissoluendo coniugio, Christus probauit ex testimonio libri Geneseos, vbi dicitur: Propter hoc relinquet homo patrem suum et matrem suam, et adhærebit vxori suæ. Duæ necessitudines his verbis conferuntur: vna est inter parentes et liberos, altera inter virum et vxorem. Cumque necessitudo paterna vel filiorum eiusmodi sit, vt diuelli ac discuti non possit, multò minus ista coniugalis: utqúe durat perpetuo necessitas inter filium et parentes, ita coniunctio inter virum et vxorem. Hæc est Christi interpretatio illius loci, et argumentatio quam inde producit. Vult attamen exceptam causam stupri. Et Paulus (per quem loquitur Christus) aliud excipit, si alter coniugum, quòd sit infidelis, nolit habitare cum fideli, vt suo loco dicetur.

(c) 54. Verùm de stupri causa, quam Christus excipit, nonnulli addubitant an ea sit sola, et dicere audent, Christum in illa complecti voluisse alia omnia scelera, quæ stuprum grauitate aut æquant, aut superant, moremqúe aiunt esse diuinarum literarum, vt in vna causa commemorata, alias consimiles includant Vti habetur in Deuteronomio de homicidio, quod casu et contra voluntatem admittitur: vbi tantummodo vna ratio describitur, quando securis è manubrio exilierit. Sed quid? Nónne idem iudicabimus, si ædificando, vel aliquid conuehendo, quispiam nolens, alterum occiderit? Ita dicunt in præsentia, sunt pleraque crimina paria, et fortè grauiora quàm sit adulterium: quamobrem existimant illa quoque crimina facere copiam diuortii. Quem sensum fortassis Imperatores nonnulli, alioquin pii et Christianissimi studiosi, multa crimina in suis legibus expresserunt, propter quæ liceret diuortium facere, quòd illa iudicauerint, non leuiora esse stupro. Et alias quoque causas extra crimen adulterii admittendas esse, inde potest apparere, quòd Paulus adiecit de coniuge infideli, qui nolit cum altero habitare, quem casum Christus reticuerat. Quin et hodie, si deprehendatur in matrimoniam iam contracto, vt loquuntur, frigiditas, vel simile impedimentum, iustum diuortium permittitur. Et nihilominus Christus causam tantùm stupri excepit: Imo si velimus inspicere, quantum sibi pontifices Romani hac in re permiserint, videbimus illos apertè sibi facultatem arrogasse, modò non esset (vt loquuntur) secuta copula, matrimonium iam contractum dissoluendi. Imò fertur diploma fuisse conspectum Papæ dirimentis matrimonium non tantùm contractum, sed vt dicunt, consummatum. Et Zacharias Papa, vt in quarto Sententiarum scribitur, cùm quidam polluisset adulterio sororem vxoris suæ, rescripsit: Cùm hoc facinus admiseris, neutram illarum habebis vxorem, erisqúe tu et illa, quam adulterio polluisti, sine spe coniugii; vxor verò tua cui voluerit, nubat in Domino. Quo casu aperte vides, iudicatum esse ab isto Episcopo, diuortium propter stuprum admittere alias nuptias. Volunt præterea matrimonium dissolui, si erretur in persona vel conditione, vt si qua putauerit se habere quempiam maritum, et deprehendet alterum esse ab eo quem habere voluerat: vel, si liberum et ingenuum sibi asciuit, quem comperiat seruum esse. Accedit et causa gradus propinquitatis, etiam diuina Lege non prohibiti, vt voluerunt matrimoniam contractum rescindendum esse. Quare apparet, non adeò seueriter iudicatum fuisse, vnam tantummodo causam, quam Christus expresserit, diuortium facere. Alioquin cùm Christus vnam tantummodo causam expresserit, quomodo Imperatores, et quidem Christiani, atque viri Ecclesiastici, tot alias adiecissent? Certè hoc fuit, quod arbitrati sunt, in illa vna Christum voluisse, et pares et grauiores culpas contineri. Adiecit Erasmus, qui hanc rem copiosè tractauit: Cùm Dominus præcipit ne iures, ne irascaris, ne dixeris Racha: si quis te percusserit in vna maxilla, obuerte illi alteram: si quis vult auferre pallium, da illi et tunicam, et alia id genus: admittimus interpretationes, vt hæc sæpe intelligamus de animi præparatione, vt non fiat leuiter aut temere, non sine iusta causa: et hic erimus tam duri et asperi, vt nullam vel interpretationem, vel expositionem admittamus?

diuortio intelligendi sunt. Ethnici quoque tam Romani quàm Græci, hanc solam diuortii rationem cognitam habuerunt, vt sic vnus coniugum ab altero solutus esset, quò nouæ nuptiæ licerent. Quod si Christus aliter intellexisset, potuisset videri ad quæstionem sibi propositam non respondisse: quia de eo diuortii genere tunc agebatur, propter quod libellus repudii à Lege concessus fuerat. De eo disputatum est: quare de eo verba Christi intelligi debent. Quid enim verisimilius est, Iudæos interrogasse de diuortio quod ignorabant, an de eo quod Moses in Lege illis concesserat? Non arbitror esse dubium cuiquam, de re vsitata illos interrogasse.

(h) 65. Verùm nunc expendenda quædam esse existimaui, quæ ab Augustino in duobus libellis de Adulterinis coniugiis ad Pollentium dicuntur, prout ad propositum huius loci ea facere iudicauero. Putabat ille quidem repudianti vxorem stupri causa, non licere alteram superinducere. Sed cum apud Matthæum ea causa excipiatur, is respondet vtrunque esse moechum, et qui propter adulterium, et qui extra illam causam vxorem à se repellit, atque alteram ducit. Et Matthæum (inquit) alterum eorum tantummodo expressisse, vt illam notaret qui grauius peccat. Ambo quidem moechantur, vxorem dimittendo, et alteram ducendo. Sed grauius, qui hoc extra causam fornicationis fecerit. Atque ita vult eam exceptionem tantummodo valere ad crimen adulterii leniendum, non tamen ad hoc vt prorsus tollatur. Atque id putat se posse ostendere ex verbo Dei. Quoniam Lucas et Marcus eam sententiam absolutè, et absque vlla exceptione protulerunt. Aiunt, Omnis qui vxorem dimiserit, et alteram duxerit, moechatur. Concludit itaque generaliter Christi dictum accipiendum, vt Lucas et Marcus scripserunt. Matthæus verò (inquit) illum notat, qui causa stupri hoc fecerit, vt intelligatur leuius peccare. Verùm hoc genus argumenti, equidem iudicarem infirmissimum. Quia potius videtur dicendum, Lucam et Marcum non completam seu perfectam scripsisse Domini sententiam, quam oporteat ex Matthæo contrahere, et definitè accipere. Quam regulam ipse tradit, et non semel vtitur in libro de Consensu Euangelistarum, vbi apertè dicit, in aliis Euangelistis persæpe minus explicatè ac integrè quædam dici, quæ ex Matthæo perfectius colligi debeant. Et est miraudum, quomodo is videatur semper accipere istam discessionem, de qua loquitur Apostolus, pro ea quæ liceat, cùm Apostolus apertè dixerit: Vxor à viro non separetur. Quare constat eum agere de illa quæ non liceat, cum eam prohibeat. Vnde facile apparet, non esse hic sermonem de causa stupri. Quia eo casu non mandaret Apostolus, vt vxor à viro non discedat: quippe id esset fouere lenocinium, si adulteria fieri se præsente atque morante apud virum pateretur. Iubet atque Paulus, vt non discedat propter istas leuiores causas, cùm id non liceat. Et si fortasse discesserit, vt innupta maneat præcipit, aut reconcilietur viro. Tenetur quisque auferre malum è sua familia. Qui posset vir non eijcere vxorem, cùm in adulterio eam deprehenderit? et tamen Apostolus ait, Vir vxorem non dimittat. Debet igitur eius adulteria fouere? Hæc satis ostendunt, de qua secessione seu eiectione hæc sint intelligenda. Et Chrysostomum habes hoc loco, nostræ huic sententiæ fauentem: nam inquit, Discedunt quandoque propter contentiones, propter pusillanimitatem, vel propter continentiam, aut alios prætextus, neque adulterii vllam mentionem facit. Tertullianus lib. 4. contra Marcionem inquit, Iustitiam habere Dominum assertorem diuortii. Quibus verbis facit Christum confirmasse diuortium, non prorsus sustulisse. Nam hoc nomine probare nitebantur hæretici, Christum pugnare cum Deo veteris Testamenti, quòd ea damnaret quæ ille instituerit. Quæ Tertulliani sententia vera non esset, si iusta diuortia, prout Hebræi habebunt, inter Christianos minime darentur.

XVII.—(a) Les autres contracts doivent bien estre gardez en bonne foy: mais cestuy-ci, d'autant qu'il surmonte en saincteté, doit avoir plus de reverence.

(Of the Jews.) Et Dieu (comme nous avons dit) n'a point là regardé à une perfection telle comme elle seroit requise entre les fideles; mais plustost il a supporté la durté de ce peuple, qui estoit rude et difficile à gouverner: et quand il n'a point puni les divorces qui se faisoyent contre equité, ce n'est point pourtant qu'il les eust permis. Car nous oyous ce que nostre Seigneur Jesus Christ en prononce, que l'homme qui aura delaissé sa femme (excepté le cas d'adultere, et qu'il soit prouvé contre elle qu'elle ait paillardé) et qu'il en ait prins une autre: qui c'est un paillard. . . . Si elle n'est punie devant les hommes: et bien Dieu se reserve tousiours son droict. Or ceci se fait, d'autant que pour la police on punira tousiours plus les interests humains, qu'on ne fera pas l'offense commise contre Dieu. Il est vray que les iuges et magistrats ne doyvent point lascher la bride, à ce que Dieu soit mocqué, que son nom soit mis en opprobre, que la religion soit foulée au pied: comme nous avons veu par ci devant, que les blasphemes estoyent plus griefvement punis que les meurtres. Mais quand il y a quelque peché oblique, là où on n'apperçoit point un mespris manifeste de Dieu en la police, on ne poursuyvra point cela si fort, que si les hommes y ont interest.

Au reste, quant à la police, Dieu a regardé ce que portoit l'infirmité du monde, et s'est conformé là. Et ainsi il y a beaucoup de choses qui n'ont pas este punies en la Loy de Moyse.

Or Deut. xxiii., 24, 25; xxiv., 1–4.

Or il est dit finalement: "Quand le mari auroit " ainsi repudié sa femme, et qu'elle seroit remariée à " un autre, que son premier mari ne la pourroit point " reprendre. Car cela seroit abomination au Seigneur," En ceste Loy nous avons à noter en premier lieu, quand Dieu a ainsi permis le divorce, qui ce n'a pas esté une dispense pour faire la chose licite: mais ça esté qu'il n'a pas voulu exercer rigueur (quant à la police) contre les Juifs.

[Magistrates ought to go by the Divine Law, but their regulations do not alter the Divine Law.]

. . . . Or quant aux maris, nostre Seigneur Jesus Christ dit, que si quelcun laisse sa femme, si-non pour paillardise, qu'il est un adultere, et qu'il fait sa femme adultere. Il met l'exception de paillardise. Or en disant que l'homme est adultere, c'est pource qu'il a rompu son mariage: et quand il se separe de sa femme, encores qu'il ne paillardast point ailleurs, puis qu'il a faussé sa foy qu'il avoit donnee, il est conveincu d'adultere. La raison c'est, qui le mariage emporte, que quand un homme s'adioint à une femme, il la prend pour sa compagne à vivre et à mourir.

[He notes contradictions between the civil law and the law of God]

Nous voyons donc comme la police est bien diverse de la Loy de Dieu: mais cependant aussi il n'y a nulle contrarieté. Et ainsi ce n'est point une excuse qu'il faille amener: mais plustost c'est une chose absurde, quand on dira: Et quoy? Dieu n'a point puni les divorces, il s'ensuit donc qu'il a consenté qu'ils se fissent ainsi. Non: la chose a autrement. Car le mariage tiendra indissoluble quant à la Loy de nature, et quant à la volonté de Dieu qui l'a institué, et a monstré qu'il doit estre inviolable. Mais cependant le divorce est permis: voire quant à l'ordre commun, qui n'est que pour tenir une bride entre les hommes ici bas, et non pas pour les reformer comme enfans de Dieu doivent estre, et qui sont gouvernez par son sainct Esprit.

Il est vrai qu'il nous faut bien obeir à l'ordre public: mais ce n'est pas le tout, ce n'est qu'une partie. Si un homme est transgresseur des loix civiles, et qu'il soit punissable devant les iuges terriens, il le sera bien au double devant Dieu.

Or maintenant traittons la matiere du divorce. Quant à la police, il est oit permis à un homme de quitter sa femme: voire, mais c'estoit en luy baillant tesmoignage, afin que la femme par la cruauté de son mari, ou par quelque chagrin qu'il avoit, ne fust point diffamee: mais qu'on cogneust qu'elle s'estoit gouvernee honnestement avecques luy, et que ce n'estoit point par sa faute qu'elle estoit reiettee. Voila quant à la police. Or si on demande: Assavoir si tel divorce pourroit auiourd'huy estre permis? Regardons ce que nostre Seigneur Jesus Christ traitté. Il dit: Pour la durté de vos cœurs cela n'a point esté defendu. Or si entre les Juifs telle permission a esté donnee, auiourd'huy ce n'est pas le semblable entre nous. Car aussi bien la pluralité des femmes à este permise, comme nous avons veu, d'autant qu'elle n'a pas esté punie. Et auiourd'huy seroit-il question d'avoir cela? Nenni. Car nous voyons que d'autant que Dieu nous a revelé sa volonté plus à plein qu'aux Juifs, que c'est bien raison que nous n'ayons pas une telle bride; voire et la liberté qu'il nous donne est pour nous obliger plus, quant à ceci, que n'ont pas esté les Juifs.

Calvin.

Atqui si nuntium quis patri remittat, et iugum excutiat cui alligatus est, tale prodigium nemo admittet. Multo igitur minor erit solvendi coniugii libertas. . . .

Erunt duo in unam carnem. Hoc dicto non minus polygamia damnatur quam licentia in repudiandis uxoribus. . . .

Abutitur enim sua potestate magistratus, qui viro gratiam facit repudiandae uxoris.

Adde quod à politia et externo ordine multum differt spirituale regimen.

Summa autem est: quamvis lex divortia non puniat, quae a prima Dei institutione dissident, adulterum tamen esse, qui reiecta uxore alterum sibi accipit. Neque enim est in hominis arbitrio coniugii fidem solvere, quam Dominus ratam manere vult: itaque pellex est, quæ legitimae uxoris torum occupat. Addidit autem exceptio, quia mulier scortando, se quasi putridum membrum a viro rescindens, eum liberat. Qui alias causas excogitant, quia supra magistrum coelestem sapere volunt, merito sunt repudiandi. Elephantiasin volunt iustam repudii causam esse, quia morbi contagio non modo ad maritum, sed et ad liberos perveniat. Ego autem, sicuti pio viro consulo ut elephantiacam uxorem non attingat, ita eius repudiandae licentiam non permitto. Si quis obiiciat, opus habere remedio, qui caelebes vivere ne queunt, ne urantur: dico remedium non esse, quod extra Dei verbum quaeritur. Addo etiam, numquam illis defore continentiae donum, si Domino se regendos tradant, quia sequuntur quod ille praescripsit.

Obrepet alicui uxoris fastidium, ut congredi cum ea non sustineat: an huic malo polygamia medebitur? Alterius uxor in paralysiu, vel apoplexiam incidet, vel alio incurabili morbo laborabit; an maritus incontinentiae praetextu illam reiiciet? Atqui scimus Spiritus auxilio nunquam destitui, qui in viis suis ambulant. Scortationis vitandae causa, inquit Paulus, quisque uxorem ducat (1 Cor. vii. 2). Hoc qui fecit, licet non succedat ex voto, suis partibus defunctus est. Ergo si quid desit, Dei subsidio sarcietur. Ultra progredi, nihil aliud est quam Deum tentare. Quod autem alteram causam notat Paulus (1 Cor. vii. 12–15), mempe ubi pietatis odio coniuges ab incredulis reiici contingit, non esse pium fratrem vel sororem tunc servituti obnoxium, a Christi mente diversum non est. Neque enim illie de iusta repudii causa disserit, set tantum an viro incredulo obstricta maneat mulier, postquam Dei odio impie reiecta non aliter redire in gratiam potest quam si Deum abneget. Quare nihil mirum, si Paulus alienationi a Deo dissidium cum homine mortali praeferat. Videtur tamen supervacua esse quam pouit Christus exceptio. Nam si capitale supplicium meretur adultera, quorsum attinet de repudio loqui? Sed quia mariti erat uxoris adulterium iudicio persequi, ut domum flagitio purgaret, qualis qualis fieret eventus, maritum, qui uxorem impudicitiæ convincit, absolvit Christus a vinculo: et fieri potest, ut in corrupto et degenere populo huius quoque sceleris tunc magna regnaverit impunitas. Sicuti hodie perversa magistratuum indulgentia facit, ut necesse habeant viri impuras uxores reiicere, quia de adulteris poena non sumitur. Notandum autem est, commune ac mutuum esse ius utriusque partis, sicuti mutua et par est fidei obligatio. Nam quum aliis in rebus primatum vir teneat, quod torum uxori aequatur, non enim est dominus corporis sui. Ergo quum adulter a coniugio defecerit, part est uxori libertas.

Qui repudiatam duxerit.—Hoc membrum pessime expositum fuit a multis interpretibus. Generaliter enim et confuse putarunt, caelibatum praecipi quoties divortium factum fuerit: ita si maritus adulteram reiiceret, utrique iniecta est caelibatus necessitas. Quasi vero sit haec repudi libertas, tantum ab uxore secubare: quasi etiam Christus non clare in hac causa fieri permittat, quod promiscue sibi Iudaei pro suo abritrio usurpare soliti erant. Fuit ergo ille nimis crassus error: nam quum adulterii damnat Christus, qui repudiatam uxorem duxerit, restringi hoc ad illicita et frivola divortia, certum est. Ideo Paulus manere innuptas iubet, quae sic dimissae fuerint, aut viris suis reconciliari, quia scilicet rixis et dissidiis non aboletur coniugium (1 Cor. vii. 11). Idque elicitur ex Marco, ubi nominatim exprimitur uxor quae a marito discesserit non quod liberum fuerit uxoribus dure maritis repudii libellum, nisi quatenus in exteros mores prolapsi erant Iudaei: sed notare voluit Marcus, corruptelam, quae tunc passim trita erat, reprehendi a Domino, quod post voluntaria divortia utrinque ad novum coniugium transibant: ideo adulterii nulla fit apud eum mentio.

Theodore Beza. De Devortio.

XIX.—(a) Nunc verò nobis de veris et ratis coniugiis dicendum est, num ea videlicet dirimi fas sit: et si fas est, quibus iustis rationibus id fieri liceat. Mirus enim hac in re fuit artifex Satan, humani generis hostis, modò quidem (quod difficile non fuit à plerisque impetrare, qui, quo sunt ad libidinem sponte naturæ propensiores, eò magis optant coniugiorum vinculum relaxari) persuadens quod mutuo quorundam consensu deuincitur, ab iisdem quoque, vt cæteros contractus, mutua saltem dissensione, ac proinde publica ex certis causis auctoritate, dissolui posse: modò verò apud homines religiosores vsque adeò arctè matrimoniorum nodum adstringens vt seruandæ fidei obtentu conscientias misere torserit timore, vbi nullus erat iustus timor: donec tandem vtràque via grassatus omnia foedis libidinibus contaminauit. Cogit ergo nos ipsa necessitas duo quærere, et in primis quidem, illud quod alioquin optimo iure posset superuacaneum uideri, num videlicet vlla ratione quod semel ratum fuit matrimonium dissolui possit; deinde quibus de causis iuste dissoluatur.

Duo sunt autem quæ hic affirmo: vnum, duobus præterea modis coniugia ex Dei verbo, ac proinde auctore Deo, dirempta censeri, nempe adulterio et desertione, quamuis non eadem sit adulterii quàm desertionis ratio, alterum, nullam hic esse hominum, imò ne Angelorum quidem auctoritatem ad nouas leges de plenis ac veris diuortiis ferendas, sed hac in re penitus acquiescendum esse in vno Dei verbo. De vtroque sigillatim dicemus, ac de illo quidem priore loco.

Huc accedit quòd iniquissimum fuerit innocentem luere nocentis culpam: quod sanè fiet si cogatur innocens vel adulteram recipere (quod sæpe honesto viro ipsa morte acerbius) vel scortationis periculum incurrere. Innocentius tamen de desertione loquens, hanc rationem diluit hac exceptione, quòd in multis casibus contingat aliquem iure suo sine sua culpa priuari, vt si alter coniugium incidatur. Sed facilis est responsio, longè aliud esse vitium corporis ex Dei voluntate superueniens coniugio, quàm crimen adulterii quo sese quispiam sponte et mala voluntate contaminauit. Itaque etiam si eiusmodi fuerit illud vitium vt alter alteri debitum ampliùs reddere non possit, tamen (vt suo loco dicemus) non propterea fit diuortium, tum quia potiùs oporteat coniuges in eiusmodi calamitate mutuo sibi auxilio esse: tum etiam quia qui propter eiusmodi calamitatem non potest ampliùs reddere debitum, tamen cum alio non factus est vna caro: ex quo consequitur adhuc manere matrimonii vinculum. At in adulterio, digna est supplicio nocens persona, non commiseratione: et præterea coniugii vinculum abrupit quisquis factus est scortatricis membrum. Præterea quum iidem Canonici quibusdam, et quidem meritò, præcipiant adulteram vxorem dimittere, ac proinde illam repetere prohibeant, quid illis fiet, obsecro, si non habuerint continentiæ donum? Petant illud, inquies. Verùm qua promissione freti particulare donum illud petent? Absurdum enim est statuere quempiam, sese per vxoris adulterium ad continentiam vocari. Deinde etiam si concederemus prorsus teneri innocentem nocenti resipiscenti veniam dare eò vsque vt etiam illam sibi rursum adiungat (quam Augustini opinionem suo loco expendemus) quid fiet, obsecro siqua perfrictæ frontis mulier vel scelus addat sceleri, vel simulatè resipiscat? quid si etiam adulterii repetiti conuicta sæpius repudietur? quid fuerit iniquius, obsecro, quàm innocentis qui uratur ne tum quidem rationem habere? Imò quis non videat ista noui ineundi coniugii prohibitione tum committendis eò audaciùs adulteriis, tum etiam si commissa fuerint, tolerandis et dissimulandis, aditum patefieri.

tolus, non placet cohabitatio, id est, qui indiuiduam illam vitæ consuetudinem penitus abrupit. Nec enim cohabitationis sine ὀφειλομένης εὐνοίας, id est, debitæ beneuolentiæ nomine intelligitur duntaxat corpornm copulatio, quam barbarè vulgò vocant debiti reddi-tionem, sed mutuus ille conuictus, atque adeò summa in omni sancto vsu vitæ coniunctio. Addo autem illud sancto, vt sciamus eum quoque desertorem esse habendum qui cohabitationem quidem non deneget, verùm impias conditiones pertinaciter requirat. Præterea quum variæ simultates & rixæ ob religionis diuersitatem incidant, eò usque interdum efferuescentes vt secessio consequatur, adiiciendum est et illud, non priùs videri desertorem quempiam, quàm de eius qui religionis odio consuetudinem vitæ abrupit, penitus obfirmata voluntate constiterit. Quoties ergo tale quippiam inciderit in coniugio impari, id est, quoties infidelis quispiam odio veræ religionis, penitus abruperit sanctum illum indiuiduæ vitæ coniugalis vsum, matrimonium quantunuis antea ratum dissoluitur: nullo prorsus facto discrimine, an quum matrimonium contraheretur, vtraque persona esset infidelis, an altera duntaxat: an verò vtraque fidelis, quarum altera postea ad hæresim aut impietatem defecerit. Apostolus enim in genere pronuntiat, Si discedit infidelis, discedat: non est seruituti subiectus frater aut soror in huiusmodi, id est, quum quippiam huiusmodi incidit. Seruitutis enim nomine nihil aliud quàm coniugii obligationem commodè possis intelligere.

fidelem deserat? imputetur infideli (inquit Apostolus), qui sanè adulter est si cum alia persona consuescat nedum vt legitimè diuertat. Interea verò æquum est vt fideli innocenti consulatur, quò possit vitam tranquilla conscientia transigere. Ex his efficitur Apostolum non facere ius dirimendi propter infidelitatem matrimonii, sed hoc tantùm dicere, desertionis culpam totam residere penes deserentem, et esse interea innocenti desertæ personæ consulendum.

enim vt sanctos Episcopos vel Presbyteros vsquam existimemus sibi vendicasse vllas civilis Magistratus partes. Mors enim Ananiæ et Sapphiræ, excæcatio Elymæ, et si qua eiusmodi facta sunt, extraordinaria et singularia fuerunt, neque in exemplum magis trahenda quàm Phinees factum. Sed rursus quum contractus iste, vt paulò antè dixi, vel maximè ad societatem humanam pertineat, plurimáque merè ciuilia in controuersiis coniugalibus incidant, vt quæ ad ius dotium, ad donationes mutuas, et plurima eiusmodi spectant: atque adèo plurimùm intersit Reipubl. ritè aut minus ritè ex verbo Dei coniunctos, aut postea separatos, auctoritate quoque Magistratus, diuinarum etiam legum custodis vindicisque, cognosci: iure suo certè non prophani tantùm, verùm etiam Christiani et religiosi Principes leges de coniugiis posuerunt passim extantes, et ex iis ciuiliter iudicarunt, bonis Episcopis non modò non reluctantibus, verùm etiam hoc in primis postulantibus. Sit igitur hæc moderatio, vt quum mixtus sit hic contractus, Presbyterium de iure conscientiæ ex Dei verbo, Magistratus de ciuilibus, ex legibus bonis et æquis iudicet: quòd si diuortio sit locus, Presbyterium quidem ex verbo Dei diuortium faciendum pronuntiet, Magistratus autem ipsemet dirimat: ita vt nec illud delibet vllam Ciuilis iurisdictionis partem, nec Magistratus ciuilis quæ Ecclesiastici ministerii sunt ad se pertrahat, quin potiùs Ecclesiæ auctoritatem sartam tectam tueatur. Itaque quòd nolunt Canonici in foro conscientiæ valere diuortia, nisi præierit Episcopi iudicium (præerat autem Episcopus Presbyterio, ex cuius etiam non autem ex sua vnius sententia iudicabat) in eo rectè sentiunt.

Th. Beza (Supplemental).

In pari autem matrimonio quum legitima non possit esse desertio (dicente Apostolo, neque vir uxorem, neque uxor virum relinquito) et utraque persona sit in Ecclesiae potestate, divortium desertione fieri non posse videtur: sed cogendum esse qui in culpa deprehendetur, tum Ecclesiasticis, tum etiam, si necessitas postularit, civilibus poenis, ad facienum coniugis officium, ut Christianum hominem et honestum civem decet.

Nostra haec igitur sententia est, de Divortiis vere sic appellatis, id est, quibus vinculum coniugii bona conscientia soluitur, ex uno Dei verbo iudicandum esse, cuius custodes, non autem transgressores, esse Magistratus oportet.

Summary of opinions of some Continental Reformers as to Divorce referred to in Q. 39,011.

Zwingli:

Allowed divorce under jurisdiction for various causes which seem to cover incompatibility.

Luther:

Allowed divorce for impotence, for adultery, and where they are unable to render duty to each other. [His language seems to vary.]

Melanchthon:

Allowed divorce for impotence, for adultery, for desertion, for "sævitia," attempts at life, but not for incurable disease.

Peter Martyr:

Allows divorce for adultery, and in the case of a heathen spouse. Other causes he dislikes.

Calvin:

Allows divorce for adultery, and in the extreme case of heathen spouses, but not for cases of disease.

Beza:

Allows divorce for adultery and desertion by an unbeliever. [In some cases the guilty party may re-marry.]

Bucer:

There must be divorce in all cases of adultery. Divorce is allowed in cases where the fullest ends of marriage are not reached, and practically by consent.

Hugh Latimer. Last Sermon before Edward VI. Sermon XIV. [Sermons of Hugh Latimer, Parker Soc., 1844, pp. 243–4.]

He urges the King "to take an order for marriages here in England. For here is marriage for pleasure, and voluptuousness, and for goods: and so that they may join land to land, and possessions to possessions: they care for no more here in England. And that is the cause of so much adultery, and so much breach of wedlock in the noblemen and gentlemen, and so much divorcing. And it is not now in the noblemen only, but it is come to the inferior sort. Every man, if he have but a small cause, will cast off his old wife, and take a new, and will marry again at his pleasure: and there be many that have so done. I would therefore wish that there were a law provided in this behalf for adulterers, and that adultery should be punished: and that might be a remedy for all this matter."

He refers to case of Fuliambe, who, having divorced his wife for incontinency, married again during her life: "and the second Marriage was declared to be void, because it was only a Divorce a mensa et thoro: and because Archbishop Whitgift affirmed, that several grave Divines and Civilians, whom he had assembled at Lambeth to consider that point, did all agree that such marriage was void."

Adjourned for a short time.

Rev. Cyril William Emmet called and examined.

39,106. (Chairman.) You are one of the clergy of the Established Church?—That is so, my Lord.

39,107. I believe the reason for your being present is that you wrote an article in the "Church Quarterly Review" in April last on the questions, to some extent, which we have under consideration?—That is so.

39,108. And you were accordingly communicated with, and have prepared a short paper on the subject?—Yes.

39,109. Your proof is really a resumé of the conclusions which you arrived at in your article?—I am afraid perhaps I ought to have put them more fully. I did not know what the proper procedure was before a Commission, and I just sent in a resumé of what I had already written.

39,110. Would it suit you to read this and comment on any points you wish to mention in the course of it?—Certainly.

39,111. That will enable you to put everything before us?—Yes.

39,112. I should ask, how long have you been ordained?—Eleven years.

39,113. And have you made some study of this subject?—I have, my Lord.

39,114. Will you kindly read the paper, then?—

"This proof is a resumé of the conclusions arrived at in the writer's article in the "Church Quarterly Review" of April 1910, where full references may be found, if required.

"In the Old Testament we find divorce taken for granted, as established by immemorial custom; it is limited and restricted by legislation though not abolished. At the same time, there are clear enunciations of a higher ideal of marriage which implicitly condemns the practice.

"In the New Testament teaching there are two main points to be considered: (1) There are repeated condemnations of divorce in general; the passages which emphasise this side present no special difficulties of interpretation, and give rise to little discussion; they are therefore in danger of being overlooked. (2) There are three much disputed passages which seem to admit the possibility of exceptions to the general rule. (a) Two verses in St. Matthew allow divorce and remarriage in the case of adultery. It is true this interpretation is disputed, but it is that adopted by the best scholars. Many leading critics, however, take the view that the exception represents a modification of Christ's teaching and does not rest on His direct authority. But even so, the following considerations must be borne in mind:—(i) The words in dispute are undoubtedly an integral part of St. Matthew's Gospel, and, therefore, embody the opinion of an important section of the early Church. (ii) They may be also a correct interpretation of Christ's meaning, since He may well have taken for granted the current view that adultery ipso facto dissolved a marriage. (iii) If we appeal to the New Testament in a matter of this sort, we must take it as it stands; we can hardly expect Parliament to adopt critical views (however probable) of the sources which lie behind the present text of our Gospels. (b) There is a much-disputed passage in I. Corinthians, where St. Paul perhaps allows remarriage in the case of a Christian deserted by a heathen partner.

"The New Testament then is clear and decisive in its statement of the main principle, but leaves a margin of uncertainty as to possible exceptions. This uncertainty can, from the nature of the case, never be finally disposed of. The conclusion to be drawn is that we are meant to go to the Bible for principles, not for detailed legislation. Neither Christ nor His Apostles left us codes of morality. They laid down principles which were to be worked out in practice by the Church or the Christian State. The writer is bound to say that in his opinion the New Testament does leave room for exceptions to the general principle which prohibits divorce, and that the precise limitation of those exceptions must be partly determined by the varying social requirements of each age. But he would submit that if justice is to be done to the teaching of the New Testament regarded as a rule, the following conditions should be observed: (i) That any exceptions should be carefully defined and restricted within as narrow limits as possible. (ii) That their existence should be recognised as a necessary evil, a concession permitted for the hardness of men's hearts, in order to prevent worse evils. In an ideal state they would not exist, just as, according to Christ's teaching, oaths ought to be superfluous, if a man's simple word could always be trusted. We have, however, to recognise facts; men are not always truthful and marriage is not always ideal. (iii) That the ultimate object of any legislation which is to claim the sanction of Christianity should be the gradual realisation of the ideal, not an increasing liberty to drift further from it. If these considerations are forgotten, and the whole stress is laid on the possible exceptions admitted by the New Testament, the true drift of its teaching is entirely mistaken."

39,115. You rather indicated that you might desire to add something. If you will do so, I shall be obliged?—I notice in reading it over I say "in an ideal state they would not exist." I mean, of course in an ideal state, or condition, of society, not an ideal government. I should like to add something with regard to a question about which I believe the Commission has heard almost as much as it wants—the question of the supposed exceptions in St. Matthew's Gospel. I quite admit that the critical arguments are in favour of the view that probably the exception does not represent the ipsissima verba of Christ. At the same time there is a margin of uncertainty as to whether it may not go back to some other report of His words, some memory of a conversation of His on some entirely different occasion, and then combined with this same occasion which Mark narrates; and certainly the Church and State must take the New Testament as it stands in a matter of this sort. Further, even if the words are not Our Lord's, they might quite well be a correct gloss giving His real meaning, and modifying the general principle as He would have Himself modified it. There is a very good parallel to this in the Sermon on the Mount, where certain manuscripts of St. Matthew add after: "He that is angry with his brother" the words "without a cause——." Now the words "without a cause" are a gloss, and are omitted from the best manuscripts of St. Matthew—at the same time they are no doubt a correct gloss and convey Our Lord's real meaning—modifying the very general and sweeping statement; and it is quite possible that the exception "except for the cause of fornication," can be explained in the same way. But there is one further thing I should like to say very emphatically, only I say it with some hesitation, because one is loath to differ from people whom one greatly respects; it is this: that those who maintain this exception in St. Matthew does not represent the words of Christ, and also is directly contrary to His teaching, are taking up a most dangerous ground. They regard a second marriage after divorce for adultery as a legalised adultery or bigamy; that is to say, they are committed to the position that the author of the first Gospel is guilty of the horrible mistake—assuming it is unintentional—one must call it something stronger if it was intentional—of twice putting things into Our Lord's mouth the permission to commit a heinous sin. Now, that is really the most serious attack on the authority of the first Gospel that can possibly be imagined; it destroys its credit altogether. Now it is on this Gospel, for instance, that the command to baptise in the name of the Trinity rests; and the text on which that rests is open to critical attack no whit less grave than that to which this exception "except for adultery" is open; and it seems to me the only possible Christian view, if we maintain the credit of the Gospel, is to hold that whether the Gospels represent the words of Christ or not, they represent His mind in all essentials, as the outcome of the Spirit which was to guide His followers into all truth. This attitude alone, for instance, can properly preserve the authority of the fourth Gospel, which we cannot well receive as the ipsissima verba of Christ, but we say it represents the spirit, and we must apply the same thing to the exception in St. Matthew, even if it cannot be said to represent His exact words. That is the chief thing I should like to add. I see I have said, speaking of 1st Corinthians, that "perhaps" St. Paul allows remarriage. I confess that further thought and further reading incline me to substitute "most probably" allows remarriage.

39,116. There is one question I should like to ask. Do you confine the exception, according to your interpretation and your views, to adultery, or do you permit of other causes which are, as you say, carefully defined or restricted?—It is a question, my Lord, that I find some difficulty in answering. I have no doubt at all about the adultery, but building on the 1st Corinthians' passage and its probable interpretation, it does seem to me that the door is not entirely shut, and that the Christian Church ought to be able to acquiesce in certain carefully restricted exceptions besides; but whether those exceptions are really necessary is a point that should be decided by the social requirements and conditions of the age.

39,117. You would then, perhaps, in some way suggest their definition by considering whether they entirely frustrated the objects of marriage?—Exactly.

39,118. According to the needs of the day?—Yes.

39,119. Is there anything else you think it worth while to add?—No, I think not, my Lord.

39,120. (Lord Guthrie.) Mr. Emmet, I suppose you are as strong as any men against divorce except as the most final remedy?—Most certainly so. I should have said I should yield to nobody in my sense of the importance of the sanctity of the marriage tie and the pure home as the whole foundation of society.

39,121. As far as you are aware, though the Churches have differed so much, has every Christian Church in every country discouraged divorce wherever possible?—I imagine so, my Lord.

39,122. And never recommended it where it could possibly be avoided?—Certainly not.

39,123. You would refer to St. Paul's action as stated in 1st Corinthians. Is it your view that he there introduced a remedy at his own hand for a case which had not been before Christ at all?—That would be the most probable interpretation.

39,124. Now you said that this question admits of room for difference of opinion. There is room for difference of opinion, even as to whether St. Paul was right, is there not, in that particular case?—As to whether he was right in limiting remarriage to the case of a mixed marriage?

39,125. Yes?—Certainly it would be quite possible to say St. Paul allowed this and St. Paul was wrong. That is a perfectly intelligible position.

39,126. Anyone who thinks that divorce should be allowed only for adultery would necessarily disapprove of St. Paul's action?—He would probably say, if he was building on the Bible, that the passage in 1st Corinthians does not allow of remarriage but only of separation.

39,127. But if it does allow of remarriage?—Then he would have to throw St. Paul's authority overboard, as far as I can see, or else he would take the line that there is a distinction to be drawn between a Christian marriage and a non-Christian marriage.

39,128. Now I would like to know what you say about that. What view do you take with regard to Christian marriage as opposed to universal marriage?—I am bound to say that with regard to the question of dissolubility I can see no difference whatsoever. St. Paul was certainly writing as a Jew, though in this particular case he was writing mainly to Gentiles. Amongst the Jews I believe it is the case that there was no sort of religious ceremony, and it did not come into Christian times till comparatively late I think. Mr. Lecky, in his History of Morals, says it came in about the 10th century; but that I should have to verify. [II., p. 351.]

39,129. As a necessity?—As a necessity, yes; but St. Paul when he was writing was writing of marriages that had been solemnised according to the ordinary law of the State in which the parties lived; not marriages which had received some further sanction from a religious ceremony. I cannot see how a distinction can come in there.

39,130. Apart from St. Paul, what do you say of the suggestion that Christ was legislating for Christian marriages as against universal marriages?—That is really, I suppose, the whole question of the proper interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount and His teaching in general. There is no doubt that, as laying down a moral ideal, in that record His words are binding on Christians in a sense that they are not binding on non-Christians. But with regard to this particular point of marriage one hesitates to say what was in Our Lord's mind, at the same time one can see no evidence for suggesting that He was thinking only of marriages amongst his future followers and not in the world as a whole. In speaking of marriage He was very possibly referring to the recent divorce of Herodias and her adulterous marriage with Herod. That was possibly the original ground of the Pharisees' question. He is answering the Pharisees in one passage at any rate.

39,131. Then with regard to His teaching in general, do you understand that He was recommending His views only to those who would become His followers or to all whom he addressed?—I should imagine that in a case of that sort He would say that the more widely His views were adopted the better, but that it could only be expected that they would be fully adopted by those who were His followers.

39,132. But they were addressed to all?—Addressed to all, certainly.

39,133. Then if St. Paul took the line he did in a case that had not been before Christ, do you think that his action could be reconciled (assuming that remarriage was meant, you know) with the Rigorist interpretation of Christ's words?—It does seem to me (and that is the point that has most affected me in my consideration of the subject) that if St. Paul, more or less knowing the tradition of our Lord's words, yet allowed remarriage in certain cases, he looked upon our Lord as laying down a principle that was susceptible of certain modifications. I can, myself, see no escape from that conclusion.

39,134. If St. Paul took that line—thought himself entitled to take that line at his own hand with regard to a case not before Christ, is it your view that Christians from time to time, when new cases arise, must apply their minds and consider how these new cases are to be dealt with, always in conformity with the general principles of Christ's teaching?—It is difficult to say what authority there is at the present time that could quite, in our own minds, correspond to the authority of St. Paul. If the Christian Church was really united and could speak with a unanimous voice, one would certainly accept its conclusions in a matter of this sort, and would certainly say it had power to lay down a possible exception. I am not prepared to say what authority could really add to St. Paul's modifications.

39,135. You are keeping in view that St. Paul expressly says that he is doing it himself?—Yes, "Not I but the Lord."

39,136. Not after consultation with other apostles or with the Church in general?—No, but I should consider that St. Paul had certain plenary individual authority.

39,137. Which is not represented now?—Not quite represented now.

39,138. How does the argument affect you, Mr. Emmett, which has been powerfully urged, that when the disciples heard Christ's views they practically said, "Well, what is the good of being married at all?" Does that seem necessarily to imply that he had prohibited divorce in all circumstances, or merely that he was laying down a stricter view than was prevalent?—I admit that it does rather suggest that He had prohibited divorce under all circumstances, but I do not think that is quite incompatible with the view that He was taking a line which was quite as strict as the strictest theoretical view of His time, and was practically a great deal stricter than any practice that was in force.

39,139. Then there is another argument I should like to have your view upon. We know what you say as to whether the words "save for fornication" were used by Christ or not. Now it is suggested that, suppose He enunciated a law with one exception, it is more difficult to read in another exception than to assume that He made a general statement recorded by St. Mark and St. Luke, and to assume that He did not exclude possible exceptions?—You mean it would be really easier to graft further exceptions on to the version of St. Mark then it would on to the version of St. Matthew?

39,140. Precisely?—I confess there is something in that. I am not prepared with an answer at the moment.

39,141. Take as an illustration, Christ tells the young ruler to keep the Commandments, "Thou shalt not kill." Then, of course, He did not prohibit the two well-known exceptions of self-defence and that of a public authority, although the enunciation is absolutely general. It is suggested that that is easier than if He had said, "Thou shalt not kill save in self-defence." Do you think there would have been any difficulty there in putting in the other exception, the act of a public authority?—I do not think there would, unless one thought that Our Lord was really speaking as a legislator. Otherwise it would be easy to say that self-defence was an illustration of exceptions that could be applied according to common sense.

39,142. I suppose it is quite clear, Mr. Emmet, that Christ maintained, as every Church has maintained, the normal indissolubility of the marriage relation?—Of that I should think there was no doubt whatever.

39,143. And it is equally clear that any proposal which would involve the dissolution of that relation for trivial causes would be contrary to Christ's teaching?—Absolutely.

39,144. Or which gave, as among the Jews, one of the spouses the right, at his own hand, to put away his wife. It would he absolutely inconsistent with Christ's teaching?—I am not quite sure that I follow you in the last. Do you mean the right to put away without application to any legal tribunal?

39,145. Yes?—Oh yes, certainly.

39,146. Then how do you put it. Can you express in a general statement what you think would be necessary in order to come within the permission, which you think the State has, to introduce limited divorce?—I feel that is a point that is really outside the range where I have experience or any power of speaking.

39,147. May I put it to you in this way. You have heard what other witnesses have said, that it must be something that makes the continuance of the marriage relation practically impossible?—That seems to be a fair definition.

(Chairman.) He has already said so. I put it to him.

39,148. (Lord Guthrie.) Very well. Might I ask you finally this question. In your view, must such a cause involve moral wrong on the part of the person who is divorced. Of course, I have in view insanity, you know?—I know. That has been a question which has been in my own mind, to which I have been able to find no answer. I think I had better say that.

39,149. A very difficult question?—Yes.

39,150. (The Archbishop of York.) I only wanted to ask one or two simple questions, Mr. Emmet. I am sorry I was not here earlier in your evidence. I see in your proof you say, "Any exception to what seems "to be the principle laid down in the New Testament "should be carefully defined and restricted within as "narrow limits as possible." Have you been able in your evidence, which I have not heard, to indicate on what principle you would restrict any extensions.

(Witness.) Do you mean as to what should be the authority imposing the restrictions?

39,151. No, on what principle you would make any restrictions?—I think that is the same as the question which has just been asked me. The only formula that I can think of (and it is very difficult of application) is one which entirely destroys, not only one of the purposes of marriage, but all the purposes of marriage, and makes them impossible.

39,152. Do you include mental as well as physical obstacles? Perhaps you have not thought that out?—I have thought about it a great deal, and found it very difficult to find an answer. I am bound to say a case of insanity, if it can really be assumed to be incurable, does seem to me to be just one of those things that are to be admitted on the analogy of the Pauline exception.

39,153. But surely the Pauline exception has very little reference to any exception except as to some difficulties in heathen lands?—That is so if one takes it literally; but if one accepts the interpretation of the Pauline exception, that it implies the possibility of remarriage, it admits the principle that marriage is not indissoluble under all circumstances whatever. Then one would maintain that it became a question for the Christian conscience, guided by the Spirit, and expressing itself through what organs it may, to decide what possible exceptions may be allowed on the same analogy, 39,154. You speak continually of Christian conscience and Christian land, and so on—a situation which was not in St. Paul's mind when he was dealing with a very difficult and real case. He was dealing with a wife who was married to a heathen who probably was very loose in his old conceptions of the marriage relation, and probably took part in religious celebrations which would be digusting to the wife, and possibly immoral. There is hardly any real analogy, is there, between the circumstances that St. Paul was dealing with and the circumstances in what is called from time to time a Christian country and so on?—When I referred to the Christian conscience I meant the Christian conscience as expressing itself through St. Paul's words; and in adequate circumstances admitting that the marriage bond should be dissolved for certain grave reasons.

39,155. Then I will not go further with that. Then you say, "the ultimate object of any legislation which "is to claim the sanction of Christianity should be the "gradual realisation of the ideal, not an increasing "liberty to drift further from it." By that, I suppose you mean the object of legislation should be to bring marriage law and marriage customs as near as possible to that ideal of indissolubility which is put before us by Our Lord in the New Testament?—As near as circumstances will allow, and without introducing worse evils.

39,156. Your idea is that the progress of legislation in a Christian country should be towards that ideal?—Undoubtedly; but it would not always imply that under the special circumstances of any particular country it would be possible to make the marriage tie stricter.

39,157. But is it much use, in view of what we know to be the point of view all over Europe, to say at one moment that you can multiply the grounds of divorce, and to say in the next that the idea of legislation ought to be towards the Christian ideal?—Is it not possible to say that restrictions on the legal possibility of divorce do in fact tend to the increase of immorality, and therefore to the drifting away from the ideal? That would be a question in my own mind.

39,158. Then would your position be that it is qu te possible that increasing laxity in the strictness with which the ideal is enforced and the increasing number of the grounds on which divorce could obtain, would tend towards the realisation of the Christian ideal?—"Increasing number" rather conveys something a little bit loose. I should be inclined to admit that there are certain circumstances in which the granting of a carefully restricted facility for divorce might in the end make for greater morality.

39,159. Do you think, for instance, that the progress of divorce in America has made for the greater morality of the country, or for the progressive realisation of the Christian ideal?—I should imagine they have not attempted to keep the Christian ideal in view at all. They have gone a great deal too far.

39,160. I think they would maintain they have only made concessions with regard to human necessities?—My point would be that each individual ground for restriction must be judged on its own merits; that it ought to prove the necessity for its inclusion up to the hilt before it could be admitted.

39,161. All I venture to put is that I do not see much help in your actual suggestion towards that object which you put before us as the aim of legislation—a gradual realisation of the ideal?—So far as circumstances would allow.

39,162. I am afraid circumstances are generally rather stronger than ideals?—If I might give one illustration. I should have suggested, though one hesitates a little after one or two of the remarks made this morning, that the Roman and the Mediæval Church had its strict theory of the marriage law, and at the same time did drift very much further from the ideal by allowing practical immorality and practical dissolution of marriage on the ground of nullity of marriage from the beginning; that it drifted further from the ideal than other States and other Churches which have frankly allowed divorce for grave and adequate reasons.

39,163. As you have put that, I should like to ask again if there is any real evidence that marital infidelity was greater in the Middle Ages or in England when those divorces were permitted at all than it has been since. Is there any real evidence beyond inference, say from the time the Canon law was established up to the Reformation, that there was looseness in the marriage tie greater than there is now?—I am afraid I am not a historian. One has the evidence of the preamble to the Act of Parliament in Henry VIII., and so on. Evidently that implies it was a pretty well recognised thing that no marriage was so tightly tied that it could not, under certain circumstances, be dissolved if people were prepared to take enough trouble about it and pay a sufficient amount in fees. And it seems to me that would offer such a tremendous temptation that human nature, being much the same in all ages, would probably take advantage of it.

39,164. As a witness was asked this morning, that is merely a natural inference; but is there any evidence to show it was so?—It is a point I cannot answer. I was building on the special statements.

39,165. And, again, would you say, in spite of all the evils of the 18th and early 19th centuries, that the marriage tie was more loosely observed than it has been since 1857?—It always seems to me it is extraordinarily difficult to compare one age with another, so I think I had better not attempt to answer the question. I feel there are no grounds for the comparison; or rather, there are grounds, but it is so difficult to get at the facts.

39,166. (Lady Frances Balfour.) May I ask one question? Of course, in England certain classes are precluded from getting divorce because divorce is too expensive. Do you think those classes are more moral than the classes that can get relief by divorce?—I am bound to say that my impression would be, they simply do without it; that is to say, they live without it because they do not feel the need of being whitewashed by the respectability that comes from divorce.

39,167. They are a law to themselves?—This is rather my impression.

39,168. (Chairman.) Do you consider that if the restrictions are too severe the law may be disregarded? I am afraid I do not quite grasp the bearing of the question.

39,169. Well, if marriage was absolutely indissoluble in this country by law do you think that would tend in the direction of morality in this country?—I think it would tend in the direction of immorality unquestionably.

39,170. That would equally be so if the restrictions were not wide enough to meet the necessities of life?—It would, I suppose—yes.

39,171. Is your view that you would tend in the direction of morality by meeting the real necessities of the case?—I consider that in this question, as in most others, it is a question of the balancing of advantages and the balancing of conflicting claims. On the one side one has to consider the needs and the necessities of the individual, and the hard cases of the individual, and on the other side the influence on society that would come if you tend in any way to make the marriage bond lax.

39,172. On page 2 in your paper you say: "Their "existence should be recognised as a necessary evil, "a concession permitted for the hardness of men's "hearts, in order to prevent worse evils." What are the worse evils that you refer to in that paragraph?—Oh, the case of people living in union without the marriage bond, unquestionably, immorality in the ordinary sense.

39,173. If they are not able to get free?—Yes.

39,174. When perhaps the necessity of the case would justify it?—Yes.

39,175. That is the idea?—Yes.

(Chairman.) Thank you, Mr. Emmet: I am sure we are very grateful for your attendance here.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FORTY-SIXTH DAY.

Wednesday, 23rd November 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

His Grace The LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORGE WHITE, M.P.
His Honour JUDGE TINDAL ATKINSON.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES, Secretary
J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY, Esq., Assistant Secretary.

Rev. Professor JAMES COOPER called and examined.

39,176. (Chairman.) You are a Doctor of Divinity of the University of Glasgow?—I am a Doctor of the University of Aberdeen, and I am a Professor of Church History in the University of Glasgow.

39,177. I beg your pardon. I was reading from the memorandum of evidence. I thought the D.D. referred to Glasgow?—No, Doctor of Divinity of Aberdeen and Professor of Ecclesiastical History of Glasgow. I am also Secretary of the Scottish Church Society.

39,178. Which branch of the Church do you belong to?—The Church of Scotland.

39,179. The established Church?—Yes.

39,180. You have been good enough to send a short memorandum on the construction of scripture with regard to the divorce question?—Yes.

39,181. I think if you have it before you the best way would be for you just to read it, and anybody can ask you questions upon it afterwards?—"I. Divorce in the Word of God. (1) In the Old Testament divorce is (a) contrary to the original institution of marriage; (b) 'suffered for the hardness of men's hearts,' but discouraged, and restricted by the Law; (c) and declared by the Prophets to be hateful to God. (2) In the New Testament, the teaching of our Blessed Lord: the original institution of marriage re-asserted, and legal permissions"—that is, the permissions of the Mosaic Law as understood by the Rabbis—"removed by the authority of the Son of God—the 'time of ignorance' being past, and 'grace and truth' having 'come by Jesus Christ.' (3) The limits of possible permission of divorce (a) by the clause 'except it be for fornication' (St. Matthew v. 32 and xix. 9); and (b) the words of St. Paul, 'if the unbelieving depart, let him depart,' and the further words in the same chapter, 'A brother or sister is not in bondage in such cases.' '(4) But (c) the clause in St. Matthew is of doubtful genuineness" in both places; "and (d) the interpretation of St. Paul's permission is difficult and uncertain." It refers to a case that the Apostle Paul is considering, namely, the case of mixed marriages only. "(5) While neither text in the Gospel says anything allowing re-marriage.

"II.—Divorce in the subordinate standards of the Church of Scotland. (1) The Confession of Faith—'the public and avowed confession of this Church'—allows re-marriage to the innocent party in the case of a 'divorce sued out' for 'adultery after marriage' (chapter xxiv. (5). (2) But it declares 'Nothing but adultery or such wilful desertion as can in no way be remedied by the Church or civil magistrate, is 'cause sufficient of dissolving the bond of marriage' (chapter xxiv. 6).'

39,182. That, I think, is adopted from the Westminster Confession?—These are from the Westminster Confession.

39,183. We have had that put in already?—I think the law as at present interpreted and administered in Scotland is contrary to the doctrine of the Church of Scotland. and is of a nature to overturn the doctrine of the Church. In the first case, with regard to divorce for desertion, by the Act of 1861, all the precautions which the Church took, and which were specially preserved in the Act of 1573, have been swept away, and there is not always even an intimation now to the person charged with desertion; and I think this is a violation of the laws of the Church, and extending the permission of divorce for desertion far beyond anything that the Church ever consented to.

39,184. That Act of 1861 did away with the necessity for the suit of adherence beforehand?—Yes, and with every effort on the part of the Church to heal the desertion.

39,185. But it did not abrogate in any way the right to get a decree for divorce on the ground of desertion?—But there was no right to get a decree for divorce except under certain conditions, and after a great many efforts had been made to heal the desertion.

39,186. I quite understand that?—We think that a very outrageous state of things. Then the law of divorce for adultery is directly evaded, because it has become very frequently the practice now not to put in the name of the paramour, with the express effect of letting the adulterous spouse marry the paramour.

39,187. You would be entirely averse to allowing guilty people to marry?—Yes.

39,188. That, I take it, is on the ground that it is injurious to morality to allow that temptation?—Yes.

39,189. Apparently the Act contemplated, originally, that that should be so, but there is the loophole out of it by leaving the judge power to leave the name out?—Yes, but it was never intended that the judge should use that loophole to evade the purpose of the Act. Divorce was never considered as a thing desirable or to be encouraged; nor re-marriage a thing to be helped, but rather to be objected to.

39,190. I think I quite appreciate that point. Then may we pass on to No. 3?—Yes. "(3) Complaint that in regard to divorce for desertion the Church's conditions, carefully set down in the Confession, have been wholly disregarded by the Scottish law courts. Is this right? seeing that (apart from higher considerations) the Confession of Faith is part of the Public Law of Scotland, being embodied in the Act of Parliament 1690. Such divorce injurious to religion and morals. (4) Opinion and discipline in the Church of Scotland."

"III. Evidence of previous witness traversed. Our Lord's teaching in regard to divorce is not a mere 'ideal' at which a community ought to aim; neither is it a 'counsel of perfection' for individual souls." Our Lord always says "Whosoever": on the other hand, when He gives a counsel of perfection He speaks to those who wished to be His disciples, or are His disciples. The "counsels of perfection" begin "If thou wilt be perfect" (St. Matthew xix. 21), and apply to such things as a voluntary vow of poverty or celibacy, but they are not laws for everybody. In regard to marriage, however, it is different. there our Lord's law is general; and He uses general terms, "whosoever" and "a man shall leave father and mother and cleave to his wife." Also, He did not say that for a man to put away his wife and marry another was to come short of the ideal: He said it was to commit the great sin of adultery. "In the New Testament, as in the Confession of Faith, marriage is 'for all sorts of people who are able with judgment to give their consent.' Our Lord's words regarding it were spoken not to, or for, the disciples only, but to the Pharisees (St. Matthew xix. 3, 8; Mark x. 2). This law of Christ must be preached by the Church to all nations and enforced by her godly discipline; it ought to be acknowledged and supported by the civil magistrate, since Christ is King of Kings and Lord of Lords; it can be kept by every individual, since the Holy Ghost is given; and His help is open to all men in and by the means of grace which are open to all.

"IV. Christ's teaching in regard to divorce not isolated, but connected with His laws and teaching concerning (a) repentance, (b) forgiveness." There must be space given for repentance and forgiveness, and I hold that no man should divorce his wife, however guilty she is; because he is bound as a Christian to give her an opportunity of repentance, nor does it follow that therefore he is bound to condone or connive at sin. The whole object of Church discipline is to win men from sin, and every Christian husband or wife is bound first to care for the salvation of the other partner. A husband must not shut himself out from the opportunity of being able to forgive until seventy times seven. This is the doctrine of repentance and forgiveness. "(c) The moral benefits of suffering, trial, and self-sacrifice." Christianity teaches that adversity is a blessing; prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament, and adversity of the New Testament, and trials patiently and lovingly borne do more to ennoble a man and woman than anything else. It is not happiness that is the end of life, but moral well-beign.

"V. Divorce in Scotland too easy and morally injurious. The religious aspects of marriage ignored in the law-courts, and therefore to a large extent in popular opinion." I hold the law courts should be the servants of God and of Jesus Christ, and they ought to care for the souls of the persons called before them, and call upon the ministers of religion to use all means in their power to keep people out of sin. This was intended by the Reformers, and has always been contended for by the Church of Scotland. "Harm to religion and morality through the confusion of thought engendered whensoever the civil law permits what the Church is bound by her fidelity to Christ to condemn as sinful."

39,191. Is it your view that divorce for adultery and for desertion—if the desertion is properly guarded—are permissible according to the teaching of Christ? —I am very doubtful on the point, and I think the doubt should go in favour of God's general law, which declares in plain terms against divorce in general.

39,192. But apart from that point you must regard the alteration of the law as to desertion in Scotland; the established Church has recognised since 1560 certainly the ground of adultery, and from 1673 the ground of desertion, provided the procedure there laid down is followed?—Yes, and provided the re-marriage is only for the innocent party.

39,193. We may take it that the Scotch Church has not treated the marriage tie as an indissoluble tie? —Not as absolutely indissoluble.

39,194. Is that your view?—No, personally I hold it is indissoluble. While the Church of Scotland deprecates divorce it thinks that on these scriptures permission may possibly be given with the precautions referred to.

39,195. Your own view is rather of a more restricted nature?—My own view is of a more restricted nature on account of the uncertainty, which seems to grow among scholars, as to whether our Lord used words that have been founded on.

39,196. Would you regard our Lord as indicating a general principle which in certain cases should have exceptions, or that there should be no exception? — Well, I am not sure that He made any exception at all. I think it is doubtful whether the clause "Except for fornication" was ever spoken by our Lord.

39,197. Leaving that doubt to be resolved in favour of there not being any special exception mentioned, would you then think that the general principle might be modified?—No, I think the foolishness of God is wiser than men. I do not think we have any right to alter——

39,198. I just want to finish what I was going to put. Do you think no amount of human weakness and suffering would justify a departure from your view? —Yes.

39,199. (Mr. Brierley.) Were you quite right in saying that the Church of Scotland only allows the remarriage of the innocent party?—Certainly. It is in the Confession of Faith.

39,200. I thought that what they forbade was the inter-marriage of two guilty parties?—I have the very words here.

(Mr. Brierley.) I thought it was the intermarriage of the two guilty parties with one another.

39,201. (Lord Guthrie.) You might just read the passage, Professor, as you have it there?—Yes. "Adultery or fornication committed before a contract being detected after marriage giveth just occasion to the innocent party to dissolve that marriage. In the case of adultery after marriage it is lawful for the innocent party to sue out a divorce, and after the divorce to marry another as if the offending party were dead."

39,202. (Mr. Brierley.) Does that mean that the guilty party may not re-marry at all?—Apparently. Certainly the guilty party may not re-marry with his or her paramour, or in the lifetime of the injured spouse.

39,203. One other question. I understand you personally are against divorce being allowed in any case whatever?—Yes; I think the exceptions in scripture are so problematical that it is safer not, and I think the general law of God should prevail when the question is a question of doubt. I think the benefit of the doubt should be given to the general law of God.

39,204. Do you allow a judicial separation?—There may be circumstances that would render a judicial separation necessary. I should think even a judicial separation undesirable.

39,205. Take this case where a husband is an adulterer, is a drunkard, is syphilitic and is cruel. That is not an imaginary case, but I have a case in my mind. What is the wife to do in those circumstances? —Well, in such a case judicial separation might be considered, but not permission for her to re-marry.

39,206. Do you think it the duty of the wife to live with such a man as that and bear children?—It would be not necessary for the wife to live with him at the time, but to pray for him and wait for his recovery and hope on to the end. It is not a greater trial than other trials that have to be met.

39,207. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) On what principle yourself do you object to the guilty party marrying? What is the principle on which you proceed? Not altogether from scripture or religion?—I do not know any principle except the principle of religion. Religion is the guide of life, and I believe permission to re-marry to be contrary to religion and good morals, and also an encouragement to people to commit adultery in order to get a separation.

39,208. It may be that in some cases the chance of re-marriage may be an inducement to adultery; but that is not so in all cases?—Well, people have to bear trials.

39,209. I should like to know what is the object of keeping a man and wife in a state of celibacy for the rest of their lives or to live in immoral relations. Would it not be better that they should marry?—I do not think their marriage would be lawful, and I do not think that any ceremony of marriage would deliver them from sin. I think it would still be adultery as long as the original partner is alive. I do not think the ceremony of marriage would remove the sin. It might cover it, or pretend to cover it; it would not heal it; it would not cure it.

39,210. At all events it would be better for the children born of that connection?—No; I think the law should discourage such a connection in every way, because for a man to live with another woman so long as his wife is alive is adultery.

39,211. Would it discourage the parties living together if you prohibited them from marrying?—Yes. I think it would. Permitting the paramours to go through the marriage ceremony would only tend to make it look as though it were a good marriage; and it would be sin for a minister to bless it because he would be apparently absolving them from sin.

39,212. You do not think it would be better for the children?—Unfortunately the sin of the parents—well, I should not say unfortunately as it is of God; but in the order of the world children must often suffer for the sins of their parents, and that ought to be a reason why people should avoid sin: the possibility of their children suffering is a strong motive for them to avoid sin.

39,213. You recognise that there are circumstances under which it is impossible for the spouses to live together owing to the conduct of one?—Yes.

39,214. What is the justification in scripture for a judicial separation when there is no justification for divorce? Where do you find in the words of scripture any right of the parties to live apart under any circumstances?—You find it in the seventh chapter of the 1st Corinthians, verses 11 and 15, where it is said, "Let not the wife depart from her husband; but and if she depart let her remain unmarried or be reconciled to her husband," and "If the unbelieving depart let him depart." That is a separation without a marriage; but the wife is to remain unmarried.

39,215. That only applies to one particular instance?—It only applies to one particular instance, but there are to be very few instances of such cases. A judicial separation is only to be given in the extremest cases. If the sin be one which, like idolatry, practically amounts to a total denial of the whole duty to Christ, judicial separation may then, I should fancy, take place.

39,216. Then the exeeption given by St. Paul does justify separation?—I think it justifies separation in very extreme cases.

39,217. If that can be a justifieation for a separation, why does not that make for the justification for divorce for good reason—for the same reason?—Because God's general law is that "He hateth putting away," and that a man is not to put away his wife, and that any person who marries while the other party is alive, he committeth adultery, or she committeth adultery be re-marriage.

39,218. Then there is justifieation in scripture, I understand, for judicial separation for life?—I do not know that it should be for life; judicial separation till the guilty person repents.

39,219. But the judicial separation is a decree of the court which puts the parties in the same position except with regard to the wife re-marrying?—The court ean alter the terms of its deeree.

(Judge Tindal Atkinson.) I doubt that.

39,220. (Lord Guthrie.) It eannot do that?—Well, the law can be ehanged. It is not a Divine law; it ean be changed.

(Chairman.) Might I suggest you are getting rather into argument than asking questions; are you not?

(Judge Tindal Atkinson.) If your Lordship thinks so, I will not follow it.

39,221. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I had not the advantage of hearing your evidence, Professor Cooper, but I just want to make clear, if I can understand it, what your view was as to the scriptural warrant for judicial separation?—I have just been speaking on that point, sir.

39,222. I know, but I want to make that a little clearer. I understand your point to be that St. Paul in the 1st Corinthians, seventh chapter, says—speaking not of himself but, as he says, the Lord speaking through him—that if the wife depart from her husband she is to remain unmarried. That is in the 10th and 11th verses?—Yes.

39,223. Do you regard that as a seriptural warrant for judicial separation?—In certain cases.

39,224. In rare cases?—But without re-marriage.

39,225. Yes, for judicial separation. Then it is suggested: if that is so, is not the 14th verse a similar warrant for divorce in the case of desertion? I understand you to distinguish the two. Is your ground of distinction that the 14th verse, which deals with divorce for desertion, applies only to an unbelieving marriage?—I think St. Paul is ouly dealing with the case of a marriage contracted by a pagan man and woman, where, after hearing of Christ, one spouse became a Christian and the other remained in unbelief.

39,226. And that is his own view—not, as he says, our Lord's view?—Our Lord's view is as plain as possible. He says, "Let not the wife depart from her husband and let not the husband put away his wife."

39,227. Yes, I am only trying to make your view clear to myself. You distinguish between these two passages?—Yes.

39,228. First that one is our Lord's teaching, and the other, St. Paul's view?—Yes.

39,229. And, secondly, that the first applies to all marriages, and the other to unbelieving marriages?—Yes, mixed marriages with unbelievers.

39,230. (Lord Guthrie.) Are your views which you have just enunciated in accordance with the standards of the Church of Scotland?—I think they are to a large extent in accordance with the standards of the Church of Scotland, but I drew the distinction, and I draw the distinction with regard to my official actions. Nothing would induee me to solemnise the marriage of any divorced person; I have always refused to do so, and I should do everything I could to dissuade such persons from marrying. When, however, as a parish minister I had a ease before me of a man who had divorced his first wife for adultery, he himself being innocent, and had married again, I felt in my official capacity as a minister of the Church of Scotland that I was bound to admit him to Holy Communion, and I did so.

39,231. But you see, Professor Cooper, I asked you if your views are in accordance with the standards of the Church of Scotland?—I think they are.

39,232. Amongst the standards of the Church of Scotland one includes the Westminster Confession of Faith?—Yes.

39,233. If that Confession expressly sanctions, and on scriptural grounds, divorce for adultery and desertion, and if you think both are wrong, how can your view be in accordance with the standards of the Church of Seotland?—Because I think the standards of the Church of Scotland say that the supreme standard is Holy Scripture, and that in both the cases referred to the supreme standard does not warrant the statements of the Confession. There is very good reason—not a private opinion of mine but the opinion of a large number of the best scholars and critics—to think that the words relied on in St. Matthew are not genuine, and also that the passage in the 1st Corinthians which is quoted does not apply; moreover, the Confession of Faith, in cases of divoree for adultery, allows re-marriage only to the innocent party, and with regard to divoree for desertion, the conditions set down in the Confession of Faith are not implemented. It only allows it for certain causes which are now no longer complied with.

39,234. That is not an answer to my question. You have said you felt bound to admit to Communion a person who has divorced the guilty person and was re-married. That implies that you are bound by the Confession of Faith apart from the supreme standard?—Well, I think that a member of the Church of Scotland is entitled to Church privileges, if his position is authorised by the Confession of Faith, whatever my private views may be.

39,235. Then it comes to this, that the standard of the Church of Scotland in that matter ought to be altered?—Yes. We have no power at present to alter our standard.

39,236. You have power by going to Parliament?—We have power by going to Parliament.

39,237. Have you ever proposed going to Parliament?—I have often wished to do so.

39,238. I am not talking of "wish." Have you ever moved in the General Assembly to have this important alteration which you think would bring the standards of the Church of Scotland in that matter in conformity with scripture?—I do not think it would be possible to touch one part of the Confession of Faith, and I do not think it would be desirable to have a discussion in Parliament as to a matter of that kind with regard to one article in the Confession of Faith, and I have not moved it.

39,239. This has existed—divorce for adultery—for 350 years as part of the law of the Church of Scotland, and in the case of divorce for desertion, 240 years?—Under rigidly specific limits.

39,240. So far as you know, has any person Episcopalian or Presbyterian, Established Church or Dissent, ever proposed in Scotland to alter the law as it stands?—I do not know of any.

39,241. How do you account for that?—Well, I account for it partly on the ground that a great deal of practical liberty has been left to ministers. I account for it also partly because our system of government does not lead individuals to make motions of that kind; and also by the extreme difficulty and inadvisability of altering the Confession in any particular in the Established Church, and the danger that it would open up very large questions. "Better to bear the ills we have," perhaps——

39,242. For 350 years?—For 350 years, yes.

39,243. You say in your proof that you think divorce in Scotland is morally injurious. How do you account for Scotland standing for 350 years a morally injurious system without any person lay or clerical, Episcopal or Presbyterian, State Church or Dissent, proposing to alter it?—Well, I think it is very largely a case of indifference with regard to the marriage tie. I think the state of morals in Scotland with regard to the breaches of the Seventh Commandment is not of the highest and never has been of the highest, and I think that is due to a low view held of the sanctity of marriage in Scotland.

39,244. Everywhere, I suppose?—Everywhere I suppose, but very much so in Scotland. There has been a great increase of marriages without religious service. That is a sign of the same thing.

39,245. You are the first person who has said that in Scotland the marriage tie in comparison with other countries is held in low estimation?—I never said in comparison with other countries. I do not know enough about other countries.

39,246. Well, do you not say that the law of divorce in Scotland has produced less sanctity for the marriage tie than in other countries?—I should like to know what you mean by the sanctity of the marriage tie?

39,247. Well, do not use that expression; say the value and the permanence of the relation. Do you say that the law of Scotland has had that effect as compared with other countries?—I do not know about other countries, but I know a large number of people in Scotland think as I do with regard to them.

39,248. With regard to what?—With regard to the evils; that divorce is too frequently given both for desertion and adultery, and that this is evil. A very large number of people think that.

39,249. Then it is your view that divorce is increasing in Scotland in proportion to the population?—I am not aware of the statistics.

39,250. Do not you know the opposite is the fact?—I was glad to see so from your Lordship's paper in the "Historical Review."

39,251. What do you make of this, Professor, that in Scotland where we have this law, instead of there being a rush to the Divorce Court, the divorces in proportion to the population are diminishing?—Well, I am very glad to hear it.

39,252. So am I. You mentioned a very interesting point about the present administration of the law, and you referred to the Act of 1861?—Yes.

39,253. Was that Act opposed by the Assembly of the Church of Scotland?—I think in Fraser's "Law of Husband and Wife" there is a passage which may in part explain why it was not: it is where he says that he wishes permission were given to repeal clauses that are in the Act of 1600 with regard to the marriage of adulterous persons—about naming the paramour—he says that this was not put into the Act for fear of exciting opposition. 1861 was before my personal——

39,254. I mean with regard to 1861, abolishing the cumbrous procedure. Was that opposed?—I do not think the attention of the Church was called to the Act. A good many things are done in the way of getting Acts of Parliament on legal points, which the Church of Scotland, not being accustomed to legislation nor having any direct representatives in Parliament, does not observe.

39,255. It was not opposed?—It was not opposed, was it?

39,256. No?—Was it known to the Churches? Was it sufficiently obvious to the Churches what was being done?

39,257. You said that divorces were granted without any intimation to the person charged. What is your information about that?—I was present myself at a case of the kind—a case where I had solemnised the marriage, and I had to be a witness, and I stayed to hear the case.

39,258. Was it a case of desertion?—Yes, and the husband who was the defender was in India. Lord MacLaren was the judge, and the counsel proceeded to lay evidence before him that the husband—the defender—had received information, and Lord MacLaren said it was not necessary to go into that.

39,259. I think you must be mistaken, Professor. That is entirely contrary to the practice as far as I know it?—Well, that was a case that I——

39,260. You see there would be written evidence of it, and it was not necessary to have oral evidence. I think that is what you mean?—Perhaps your Lordship is right, but I was very much shocked at the time.

39,261. You see written evidence is put in and a copy is produced usually with the man's acknowledgment in his own handwriting on it, and in that case we do not have any oral evidence of it?—When the counsel was going to lead proof that the husband had received intimation, Lord MacLaren interposed and said it was not necessary.

39,262. No, because written evidence was already in?—Very well.

39,263. You refer to the opportunity of repentance. How far do you go in that? You quoted the text about seventy times seven; even that is limited?—Even that is limited, but it is not intended to be limited.

39,264. Supposing the man or the woman, as is usually my experience, has appealed again and again to the person to abandon the adultery and to return to mother or father the children, they have refused and lived with a paramour and borne children to the paramour, or, in the case of the man, become the father of the paramour's children. What do you say about repentance then?—I think it would still be better to bear the very heavy cross. I think much greater glory will come.

39,265. Have you ever known any case historically—one knows your very minute acquaintance with the history of Scotland—in either the Episcopalian or Presbyterian Church where a person who divorced a guilty spouse and re-married has been subjected to discipline?—I beg your pardon.

39,266. Have you ever known a case in the Episcopalian or Presbyterian Church where the innocent person divorcing and re-marrying has been subjected to discipline?—The innocent person divorcing and re-marrying could not be subjected to discipline in the Church of Scotland because of the Confession of Faith.

39,267. And, as far as you know, the same thing prevailed while the Episcopal Church was established?—I think so; I do not think the Episcopal Church was established; I think it was two different governments established successively in the same national Church.

39,268. Well, there was a period when Presbytery was superimposed on Episcopacy?—Yes.

39,269. Or Episcopacy superimposed on Presbytery?—Yes.

39,270. Now with regard to the guilty persons re-marrying. Suppose the guilty persons were prohibited to marry each other, but the guilty person was not prohibited to marry somebody else. Do not you think that would take away what everybody feels is a strong point which you make on that?—But I do not think the guilty person has a right to re-marry at all while the other party is alive.

39,271. But it would be important to prohibit the guilty person marrying the paramour. You attach importance to that?—Yes.

39,272. Now suppose the guilty person repents, Professor; on evidence of repentance he is entitled to be restored to Church privileges?—I should think not so long as he was living with any woman except his still living wife.

39,273. No, of course not. I am assuming the guilty person, of course, gives up the guilty cohabitation, comes to the Church, makes confession, gives evidence of repentance. He would be entitled to be re-admitted, would he not?—Yes.

39,274. To the Communion?—Certainly.

39,275. If he has done so, and given evidence of repentance, why, after that—being, to use a popular phrase absolved—should he not re-marry, not the paramour?—Nobody should re-marry while the other spouse is living.

39,276. You lay down an absolute rule?—An absolute rule. I think our Lord lays that down.

39,277. That the tie subsists whatever may happen during life?—Yes.

39,278. You refer to separation and the passage from St. Paul. There is nothing in what Christ says that you found anything on in that matter?—Not in regard to separation: as to divorce, I think the words that St. Paul quotes from our Lord are probably the oldest record of our Lord's sayings on the subject.

39,279. But what is there in any record of our Lord's sayings that would warrant permanent judicial separation?—I do not know anything in our Lord's sayings, but ——

39,280. And, as I understand, you do not think there is any scriptural warrant for permanent separation?—I should think not.

39,281. Then can you tell me, Professor, that being your view, has there ever been any country, or any age, or any Church, which has both denied divorce and permanent separation?—Well, I think the abuses in regard to marriage in the latter period of the Roman Church were one of the causes of the Reformation. I think there were very great abuses in giving judicial separations and giving dispensations which were contrary to the Word of God, and I think the Reformation partially proceeded on the wickedness of these practices.

39,282. That is not quite an answer. I asked, has there been any Church, or any age, or any country which has not only denied divorce but has also denied permanent separation?—I do not know.

39,283. So the result is that you go further in your views—and you are entitled to—than the Roman Catholic Church?—I think the Roman Catholic Church erred very grievously about judicial separations, and also with regard to the dissolution of marriage.

39,284. Would you give me an answer; the result is you do go further?—I do go further than frequent practice in the Romish Church.

39,285. (The Archbishop of York.) How far are the views which you have kindly expressed to us representative of any large section in the Church of Scotland?—They represent a very considerable section of opinion both of the clergy and laity. I am able to say that.

39,286. So you would wish us to regard what you have said as more than an individual opinion of your own?—In many respects. I did converse with a few who approved of my paper and I know I am not speaking for myself alone.

39,287. Would you say that anything based on the views you have expressed would represent a very considerable minority in the General Assembly?—I do not know about the General Assembly, but I know that they would have considerable support throughout the Church.

39,288. You think the views you express —— ?—Represent a very considerable minority.

39,289. A growing minority?—I hope so.

39,290. With regard to some questions that Lord Guthrie asked, do you know whether the Episcopal Church in Scotland has formally accepted and acquiesced in the principle of divorce?—I should doubt it very much. I should think this Commission might hear evidence from the Episcopal Church. I answered Lord Guthrie that I did not know that at any time when Episcopacy was established in Scotland there was any protest against the state of the law as it then was.

39,291. I was talking of Episcopacy since the Reformation or whatever you call it?—I think the view of the Episcopal Church should be asked on that subject.

39,292. You say in your proof that "In regard to divorce for desertion the Church's conditions, carefully set down in the Confession, are wholly disregarded by the Scottish law courts." What does that refer to?—Perhaps the words "law courts" are wrong, because in regard to divorce for desertion the law courts go upon an Act of Parliament passed in 1861 which dispensed (as far as the civil law was concerned) with all the conditions laid down in the Westminster Confession. I believe myself that the Church acted per incuriam in allowing that Act to be passed.

39,293. You think the Church ought to have been more vigilant than she was?—But I am sure it is not in accordance with the will and desire of the Church. However, I think the Church was very much to blame for not opposing that Act.

39,294. (Chairman.) May I just ask this. You wrote to offer your evidence here?—Yes.

39,295. Feeling it was desirable it should be presented?—Yes, and I may say that a number of people have thanked me for doing so—a very considerable number of people.

39,296. I should like to ask as to what you said to his Grace the Archbishop about a minority holding your view. Has there been any meeting or expression of that view in any definite form?—It has not yet been before the courts of the Church in any definite form; but when the Act of Parliament giving civil sanction to marriage with a deceased wife's sister was before us, and the proper course for the Church to take in view of that change of the civil law, there was a very large committee, and I may say that every person on that committee protested that any interference with the law of the Church with regard to divorce would be strongly opposed. There had been no proposal yet to alter the law.

39,297. Was there any opposition to the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill?—Oh yes, there was a good deal of opposition to the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill.

39,298. Do you know in what proportion?—The doctrine of the Church in Scotland remains what it was before: the Confession's statement against such unions was not altered; but permission was given to dispense with discipline in such cases.

(Lord Guthrie.) Lord Gorell, there is one matter which Sir Lewis has drawn my attention to that I ought to put in fairness to Professor Cooper.

(Chairman.) If you please.

39,299. (Lord Guthrie.) I put to you, Professor Cooper, which was not accurate in a sense, that you objected to permanent separation, and I suggested that therein you would be going further than the Roman Catholic Church. Now I ought to tell you that in the Roman Church the separation which they allowed is not permanent in this sense, that it is rather indefinite than permanent?—Well, I have no objection to indefiniteness.

39,300. One moment, Professor. The clause that is put in these decrees runs in this way: "Until they shall be reconciled to each other"?—Yes, I do not go further than that. I quite approve of that; reconciliation, on repentance, is what a Christian must desire and seek.

39,301. There is no power for one to come and ask that it be recalled, but they can both go together?—Yes, I quite agree with that. I have no objection to that. That is what I desire to get—reconciliation.

39,302. But would you allow one to go and show that the cause for which the judicial separation had existed had ceased?—I am not a lawyer, but as a divine I should think the indefinite condition is much better—until they both be reconciled.

39,303. And only until?—And only until. It was the abuse of the thing I was objecting to.

(Chairman.) May I thank you very much for your attendance and the assistance you have given us here.

Rev. Canon HASTINGS RASHDALL called and examined.

39,304. (Chairman.) Will you kindly tell us what is your official position at present?—Canon Residentiary of Hereford; Fellow and Lecturer of New College, Oxford.

39,305. You have given the subject of this question of divorce and matrimonial causes your very careful consideration on certain aspects of it?—I think I may say that.

39,306. May I ask you if you would kindly read us your memorandum on the subject. I think on these matters it is better that questions should be asked after, because these are prepared papers?—"(1) The opposition to divorce with liberty to re-marry in so far as it rests on religious grounds is based partly upon the sayings attributed to Jesus Christ in the Gospels, partly upon the authority of the Church. I should like to deal with these points separately. With regard to the first a full discussion of the subject would involve a very thorough enquiry into the nature of revelation and of authority on ethical questions, and the limits within which any external authority—even that of Christ himself—can be regarded as regulating the details of morality for all time. Such a discussion would be out of place on the present occasion, and I will only say (1) that to my own mind the unique authority which Christians rightly attribute to the teaching of Jesus is based in the last resort upon the appeal which it makes to the moral and religious consciousness, and the response which it evokes in the souls of men. That being so, I should find it difficult to regard a saying of Christ as absolutely and permanently binding upon His followers if it were found to be in collision with the dictates of the moral consciousness in the present, (2) that it is only for general principles and not for details of morality, which must necessarily vary with changing circumstances, that Christians can look for guidance to the dicta of their Master; and one of the chief claims of Christianity to the position of a universal religion is just the fact that its Founder confined himself almost entirely to laying down principles of the broadest possible character, and made no attempt to draw up a detailed code of rules which should be binding upon His followers for all time. That Christians must not expect in the teaching of their Master explicit guidance as to the details of conduct is a principle which has been still further emphasised by the Christian doctrine of the Holy Spirit.

"I feel bound to say this much upon the more fundamental issue which is raised in the particular problem before us; and the line I have taken would, I think, be fairly representative of a large body of Christian opinion. But some who might be disposed in a general way to accept these principles would doubtless contend that the marriage question is one of so much importance that it must be regarded not as a detail of morality, but as one of its fundamental principles, and consequently that, if Christ taught the doctrine of the absolute permanence of marriage, it must be regarded as one of the eternal principles of Christian ethics. Without attempting to decide how the line is to be drawn between principles and details, I wish in what follows to discuss the question from the point of view of those who would hold that a dictum of Christ on such matter should be final for all Christians for all time.

"(2) I proceed, therefore, to ask what was the actual teaching of Jesus Christ upon the subject. He is reported by two Evangelists to have forbidden divorce under any circumstances whatever (Mark x. 11, Luke xvi. 18) and by St. Matthew (v. 32, xix. 9) to have forbidden it 'except for fornication,' which in such a connection must be taken to mean adultery. No scholar competently acquainted with Jewish customs and modes of thought will, I take it, deny that divorce must be taken to include liberty to re-marry (as indeed is suggested by the following words about marrying her that is put away): the idea of a mere divorce a mensa et thoro was unknown at that time. Consequently those who would forbid divorce in the case of adultery even to the innocent party cannot appeal to the authority of Christ. It is true that there are critical grounds for suspecting that the unqualified prohibition of divorce represents the historical form of the saying. That is the version of St. Mark and St. Luke; and when there is such a consensus, it may usually be assumed that St. Matthew represents a later development. But those who wish to rest not only the personal conduct but the political arrangements of modern communities upon the ipsissima verba of Christ can hardly base the prohibition of what might otherwise on their own principles be lawful upon a critical conjecture made for the first time by nineteenth century scholars. This is no question of mere textual criticism; there is no doubt that the exception forms part of the genuine text of our present first Gospel. Such an attitude is particularly inconsistent in those who insist much upon the authority of the Church; for the exception introduced by the first Evangelist at least represents the interpretation given to the saying by the Church of his day, i.e., the Christian Church at the end of the first century A.D., or, possibly, the beginning of the second. The very fact that it is impossible to ascertain with any certainty exactly what Jesus said on a matter of this importance illustrates in a striking manner the impossibility of making the ipsissima verba of His teaching—there is no great difficulty in ascertaining its general spirit—into an exclusive and final authority for modern Christians.

"Moreover, though the words 'except for fornication' are, critically speaking, a gloss, it is extremely probable that they represent what our Lord really meant. What He was attacking was the idea that a husband had the right to divorce his wife for mere caprice—for any and every cause. This was the actual attitude of the Jewish law and of average Jewish opinion in spite of the higher teaching of Malachi (ii. 16) and of a school among the Rabbis. Against such a view He set forth that the true ideal of marriage was a permanent monogamous union. No one should enter upon a marriage union without intending to make it so. That adultery on the part of the wife, which ipso facto destroys such a union, was an exception would go without saying. The political question—the question under what circumstances the State should permit of divorce—lay, it may be safely affirmed, wholly beyond the scope of our Lord's thoughts. He no more thought of laying down what should be the legal conditions of marriage than He thought of abolishing the institution of property when He recommended His followers to allow the man who had taken a man's cloak to take his coat also. Nor can we assume that, even as a rule for the private guidance of His followers, He would have refused to recognise that there might be other cases besides that of adultery in which divorce might be the less of two evils. Many of Christ's sayings can only be understood as expressions —sometimes paradoxical expressions—of a principle, a general rule which might admit of many exceptions, a rule for the guidance of an ideally righteous society. He condemned the use of the term 'fool'; yet He is several times recorded to have used it himself. What He must be taken to have prohibited is the angry and unreasonable abuse of a fellow-man. (In the following words 'He that is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment,' the later MSS.—followed by the received text—have added the gloss 'without a cause,' very much as the earlier gloss 'except for fornication' may be supposed to have been inserted by the first Evangelist.) He condemned oaths; yet the Christian Church has generally allowed them on solemn occasions. He urged non-resistance; yet Christians have interpreted His words as allowing a Christian State to hang or imprison offenders, and Christian men to take up arms at the command of the magistrate. And so on. Our Lord undoubtedly intended to teach that men should endeavour to make the matrimonial union a life-long union. What He would have recommended when such a union had become virtually impossible through the fault of the wife, is a question which can only be answered by an appeal to our own moral consciousness—a moral consciousness enlightened by His teaching and the working of His Spirit in Christian Society.

"(3) I should like to make one or two further remarks with reference to the teaching of Christ on this matter:—(a) The same kind of critical reasoning which suggests that the words 'except for fornication' may be a gloss suggests also—though doubtless with less certainty—that the words 'And if the wife shall 'put away her husband and marry another, she com- 'mitteth adultery,' likewise represent a traditional amplification of the original dictum. These words are found in St. Mark; but, as they are absent from the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke, they can hardly have been found in the form of Mark which these Evangelists had before them; and they are absent from the passage on the subject in Matthew's version of the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew v. 32), which was presumably derived from what scholars are disposed to look upon as the earliest Gospel source—the document now commonly spoken of as Q—the presumed source of the sayings preserved by Matthew and Luke, but not by Mark. As a wife had, according to Jewish law, no power of divorce, it was unnecessary for our Lord to deal with that case. (b) I agree with Canon Henson in recognising that the divorce à mensa et thoro is—or rather may be, in so far as it is avoidable—just as much a breach of our Lord's principle as the divorce à vinculo matrimonii. In Matthew v. 32 the mere act of putting away is forbidden, the words 'and marry another' being omitted. 'Everyone that 'putteth away his wife saving for the cause of fornica- 'tion maketh her an adulteress.' The mere repudiation was wrong, because it placed her in a position in which she was likely to marry again during the life-time of her husband. It would be admitted to be adultery for the wife to put away her husband and marry someone else; the husband who puts away his wife is practically making his wife do this. Such seems to be the thought of the passage. It suggests both that the divorce condemned is not merely the divorce à vinculo, but any termination of a union in life and in affection which should be dissolved by death alone. Cleaving to one's wife does not mean merely abstaining from marrying somebody else. It may be urged with reason that there are circumstances in which a continuance of cohabitation is practically impossible; but, if exceptions may be assumed in our Lord's teaching, it may be equally contended that exceptions are to be assumed as to the divorce à vinculo. I may add that the form of the saying in Matthew v. 32 powerfully suggests the objection to a permanent judicial separation. It tends to encourage illicit unions.

"(4) I hold, then, that the only principle that is absolutely binding upon Christians for all time is that the ideal of marriage is life-long monogamous union. And that is a principle which, I believe, appeals to the developed moral consciousness on its own merits, even apart from the authority of Christ. Christians are, no doubt, bound by this principle when they act as legislators no less than in their own private conduct. At least, it should certainly guide the legislator when he is legislating for a community whose moral consciousness does, speaking broadly, recognise the ideal. The question for such a state is 'By what kind of 'legislation will most respect be secured for this 'ideal; and where the ideal cannot be realised, which 'is the less of two evils—the hardship inflicted upon 'an innocent party (and even upon the guilty party) 'by the prohibition of re-marriage, together with the 'social evil of encouraging irregular unions, or the 'evil inflicted upon society by the tendency which 'such permission may have to lower the ideal of 'marriage for the whole community?' A Christian may, it seems to me, quite well recognise that the conditions of marriage are a matter which the State should regulate in accordance with its view of social expediency, provided that in the notion of social expediency is included the cultivation of a high ideal of life and character and not merely the promotion of maximum pleasure.

"(5) And here I should like to add a remark which is suggested by some of the evidence already given before the Commission. It seems in some quarters to be assumed that there are only two alternatives before us—either a highly ecclesiastical view of marriage, based upon the doctrine that marriage is a sacrament, and the theory that it is a mere contract, like a deed of partnership or a conveyance of property, the terms of which ought (it seems to be suggested) to be left entirely to the discretion of the parties. Of course marriage is a contract, Even according to the teaching of medieval Canon Law the essence of marriage lay in the consent of the parties: up till the Council of Trent, as is well-known, the ecclesiastical ceremony was not recognised as essential to its validity even as between Catholic Christians. Nor has the very technical doctrine that marriage (not the marriage ceremony) is a sacrament in reality anything to do with the question of indissolubility, since some of the sacraments obviously admit of repetition. Marriage is certainly a contract; but no State, civilised or barbarous, has ever looked upon it as a contract of no social concern, the terms and consequences of which might be regulated entirely by the whim of the parties. There are some contracts which every State recognises as immoral and refuses to enforce, as being intrinsically immoral and contrary to public policy. This attitude can easily be defended even on grounds which would appeal to advocates of the most purely hedonistic utilitarianism. Few, for instance, would be prepared to say that a modern State ought to recognise and enforce a contract by which a man made himself the slave of another for life. Still more is that the case from the point of view of those who think that the State has an ethical end, and that, while undoubtedly all moral laws and institutions depend for their justification on their tendency to promote social well-being, social well-being, properly understood, does not mean a mere maximum of pleasure but includes as its highest element a certain ideal of character. One most important element in the ideal which commends itself to the developed moral consciousness is a high type of feeling and practice in the matter of sexual relations. The only type of sexual relations which commends itself to the moral consciousness is that of permanent and monogamous marriage. The question is what is the best thing to be done when through the fault of one or both of the parties, by adultery or in other ways, this ideal becomes in the particular case impossible of attainment. In deciding that question, the State is bound to have due regard to the general and permanent interests of society, and not merely to the desires, or even the interests, of the parties in the particular case.

"(6) Church and State alike are interested in promoting the highest type of character in their members. It does not necessarily follow that (apart from the particular relations between Church and State existing in England and Scotland) the attitude of the State and of the Church ought to be precisely the same. It might be quite possible to hold that the State ought to allow—as the less of two evils—divorces and re-marriages which the Church, a voluntary society consisting of persons definitely pledged to a high ideal of life, might rightly refuse to perform or even refuse to recognise when contracted by the authority of the State. At the same time the great evil involved in such a discrepancy between the law of the Church and that of the State ought to be duly borne in mind; and the difficulty is, of course, increased by the peculiar relations between Church and State prevailing in England. That being so, it will be desirable for me to say a word about the question of Church authority. It should, I think, be remembered that the decisions of the Church have always professed to be interpretations of the teaching of Christ. Except for those who believe that the Church is incapable of misinterpreting the teaching of its Founder—which, in view, for instance, of the history of religious persecution, would be a difficult contention for any modern Christian—this authority will have little weight, if we believe that its interpretation is really a misinterpretation. Another circumstance which seriously weakens the attempt to base an absolutely exceptionless prohibition of divorce with liberty to re-marry upon the authority of the Church, is the enormous variety of attitudes which the Church has adopted at different times. St. Paul himself introduced an exception not explicitly recognised by his Master, and allowed divorce, doubtless with liberty to re-marry, to a converted heathen whose unconverted husband or wife desired a separation; and such a liberty is still allowed by the Roman Church with all its strictness in other respects (cf. the speech of Sir Henry Maine on the re-marriage of native converts in 'Sir Henry Maine; a brief memoir of his Life,' by Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, pp. 137 seq.). In the early Church there was the greatest variety of teaching on the subject. At one time people who had married slaves were allowed to divorce their spouses and to marry again. Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, allowed slaves who had gained their freedom to divorce their consorts. Some Christian emperors permitted divorce by mutual consent, and such a permission could not have been without some support in Christian public opinion. The Theodosian code allowed divorce for certain crimes. A law of Ethelbert, passed in the time of Augustine of Canterbury, simply required the adulterer to provide the injured person with a new wife. Even St. Ambrose allowed the re-marriage of the innocent party after divorce for adultery. (References to the original authorities for these statements will be found in Smith and Cheetham's 'Dic. of Christian Antiquities,' Art. Marriage.) It was only very gradually that it was settled in the East that re-marriage should be allowed to the innocent party, and in the West that it should not be allowed to either party. I mention these facts merely to show that there is no ground for contending that the permission of re-marriage to the innocent party is opposed to any universally admitted principle of Christian ethics, or that the Church is for ever precluded by its own past from reconsidering the question of still greater extensions of facilities for divorce. If the authority of the medieval Church is binding and final, we are bound also by the innumerable prohibitions of marriage on grounds of consanguinity or affinity which our Church has abandoned. While the view is not untenable that the State ought to allow divorce and re-marriage which the Church ought to forbid, the State ought, I think—even when there is no close connection between Church and State—to be extremely reluctant to establish lower standards of conduct in the matter of marriage than those recognised by the Church. In Protestant countries, at least, the State is—for the mass of the people—a more powerful moral educator than the Church. It is hard to persuade the average man that a union which the State allows is not sanctioned by the highest morality. Any divergence between the rule of the Church and that of the State on this matter is therefore a very serious evil; and this ought to be borne in mind on both sides.

"(7) I now approach the fundamental question: 'Is it desirable for the State to extend the causes for 'which it will grant divorce with liberty to re-marry?' I have no doubt whatever as to the desirability of allowing divorce where it is now allowed; and I think morality would gain rather than lose by the extension of this permission—practically for the first time—to the poorer classes by conferring jurisdiction upon the county courts, or some of them, with due precautions against collusive divorce, and proper machinery for compelling the guilty husband to contribute to the maintenance of his wife and children. The question is: 'Should the causes for divorce at present recognised be extended?' And here I will confess at once that I feel much more clear as to the principle on which the question should be decided than as to the actual application of the principle to particular cases. I am quite clear that no principle of religion or morality forbids divorce with liberty of re-marriage if a sufficient social advantage can thereby be secured, including in the notion of social advantage a strong public opinion in favour of permanent marriage and fidelity to marriage bonds and a generally healthy state of feeling as to sexual relations. I feel that I should perhaps be able to arrive at a more decided opinion if I possessed just that knowledge of the results of different types of legislation in other countries, and that evidence from persons possessing the kind of practical experience which I do not possess, which it is the business of this Commission to collect. I have no doubt that divorce for causes other than the adultery of one of the parties should be made difficult. In the abstract the extension of the grounds of divorce to many other cases seems to be reasonable; but I strongly feel the difficulty of defining such cases rigidly enough to prevent the relaxation growing into divorce by mutual consent, and so practically allowing every husband or wife to get rid of his or her spouse simply because he or she would prefer another. I would rather, therefore, express no decided opinion as to the desirability of extending divorce to such cases as desertion or cruelty, and to confine myself to urging that, if there is to be any extension of the present grounds for divorce, the extension should be of a strictly limited character, and should be surrounded by as many safeguards as possible against abuse. If cruelty is to be a ground for divorce à vinculo matrimonii, it should be at the discretion of the judge to grant a divorce or a judicial separation; where the cruelty is not extreme, the State may reasonably say to the injured party: 'We cannot compel you to live with this man 'or this woman; but if you insist on separation, the 'desirability of discouraging hasty marriages and 'precipitate divorce is so great that in the public 'interest you must remain unmarried.' Another strong reason for not granting a divorce à vinculo in every case of cruelty is that it is desirable to encourage reconciliation. Among the poorer classes such reconciliations are, it is evident, very common. If the power at present possessed by magistrates of granting judicial separations is to continue at all, the separation ought in the first instance to be for a short period only; and it would be well that, even in the High Court, separation should be at first temporary. If desertion is to be recognised as a ground for divorce, the desertion should be for a considerable period. The strongest cases for an extension of the present grounds seem to be (1) the case of long-continued and apparently incurable insanity of a serious type; (2) the case of disappearance for a certain number of years—the period should not be a short one—when it is established that the deserted party does not know, and cannot discover, that the deserter is still alive. In these two cases I should have no hesitation about the desirability of allowing re-marriage. The permanently insane person may be regarded as virtually dead; and it is reasonable that death should be presumed after a sufficient period of disappearance.

"I doubt very much whether habitual drunkenness ought to be a ground for divorce; the difficulty of definition is too great; it is possible that the worst kind of dipsomania might properly be treated as insanity. As to the case of long sentences for crime, I should feel the objection which has been expressed by the Lord Chief Justice and others. In all cases it would be desirable that re-marriage when allowed should only be permitted after an interval, in order to permit of reconsideration and to diminish the inducement to divorce by mutual consent.

"(8) There remains the question 'Under the 'particular relation between the Church and State 'prevailing in England, what legislation should there 'be as regards the ecclesiastical side of marriage, in 'the event of any extension by the State of the 'grounds for divorce à vinculo?' In the first place I should like to express in the strongest possible manner my dissent from the suggestion that civil marriage should be compulsory in all cases, and that the State should cease to concern itself with the ecclesiastical ceremony at all, whether in the Church of England or in Nonconformist chapels. Such a measure would, I believe, have the effect of seriously lowering the public estimate of the solemnity of marriage, and of the moral obligations which it involves. It would suggest the idea that it was only in the view of the clergy of certain religious sects, and not in the view of the general community, that marriage possesses any greater solemnity than a mere commercial transaction; while to make the right to be married in church and to be admitted to communion in the Church of England wholly dependent upon the views of the individual clergyman or of a purely clerical assembly like the present Convocations, would be to take an important step in the direction of Disestablishment, and to make concessions to sacerdotalism such as even a disestablished Church would not be at all likely to make. At present, at all events, Parliament is the only legally recognised organ for the expression of lay opinion in the Church. I quite agree with Canon Henson's suggestion that the re-marriage in church of the guilty party in a divorce suit might well be prohibited. This does not necessarily imply that such a marriage is altogether unlawful. The guilty party is a notorious evil liver, and as such cannot claim to be admitted to communion, or to have his marriage blessed by the Church. It does not follow that his continued co-habitation with the second wife should be made a permanent bar to communion; but the question of the duration of time within which such a notorious evil liver is to be debarred from communion is at present (in the practical desuetude of proceedings against laymen in the ecclesiastical courts) left to the individual clergyman, and the prohibition of such marriages in church would leave matters in this respect just where they are. The same prohibition of re-marriage in church for the guilty party would, I think, remove the one feature of the present law which is shocking to those churchmen who do not share the extreme view as to the intrinsic indissolubility of marriage, and would strengthen the position of the State in refusing to defer to the dominant clerical opinion as regards the re-marriage of the innocent party, which, as has been seen, has always been allowed in those Eastern Churches with which high-churchmen are so anxious to establish inter-communion. With this exception it seems to me that the attitude of the State up to the present is one which commends itself to Christian public opinion, even to the great majority of lay churchmen and to a considerable minority among the clergy. In such matters Parliament is, I believe, a much better exponent of Christian, and even of Church of England, opinion in this country than the majority of the bishops or of Convocation.

"I strongly hope, therefore, that in any future legislation on the subject the State will not go back upon its present attitude, and will allow (without enforcing upon the conscientiously objecting clergyman) the re-marriage of the innocent party and of those who have contracted a marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and will insist on the right of such persons to Holy Communion. If the State were to go further and to extend the grounds for divorce to such cases as I have discussed, I admit that a grave situation would arise. As an individual churchman I should be in favour of the Church recognising the act of the State and allowing re-marriage. The question of such permission being one of social expediency, and a matter within the competence of the State, the Church ought, I think, to accept its decision—so long as the State does not extend the facilities for divorce to a point at which they become obviously inconsistent with the ideal of permanent monogamous marriage, and so, from the Christian point of view, sanction something intrinsically immoral. But any official recognition of such re-marriages by the bishops or by the Convocations, or by any ecclesiastical authority whatever, would be at present wholly impossible; and here the refusal to celebrate or recognise such marriages would be supported by a much larger body of Christian opinion inside and even outside the Church of England. Unsatisfactory as such an expedient must be admitted to be, the best practical course would perhaps be to allow any clergyman who is willing to perform such marriages to do so in any church which its incumbent is willing to lend for the purpose, with due protection for both clergymen against interference or vindictive proceedings by individual bishops. In this way Christian public opinion will be allowed to develop itself freely in the matter—whichever direction such development may take—whereas the total prohibition of all such marriages in church would stereotype the present phase of ecclesiastical opinion on the subject.

"I am assuming that any extension of facilities of divorce, if granted at all, will be of the moderate kind which generally commends itself to Christian public opinion in Protestant Churches other than in the Church of England. I will not attempt to discuss the history of Protestant opinion on the subject, but will merely appeal to the fact that the Westminster Confession allows divorce à vinculo in the case of 'such wilful desertion as can in no way be reconciled by the Church or civil magistrate" (Chap. 24), while other Protestant Churches have gone further than this. I appeal to the fact not as an example which ought necessarily to be followed, but merely to show that the proposal to offer further facilities for divorce is not opposed to universal Christian opinion.

"Within such limits I do not think the State should prohibit marriage in church to an innocent party. I regard it as inconceivable that this country should adopt the marriage laws of the laxer American States, against which a strong opinion is gradually forming in America itself. If it did so, I should fully admit that a more decided distinction between the civil and the ecclesiastical marriage would become inevitable. The celebration in a Christian church of re-marriage after divorce granted for mere caprice or collusive desertion or a mere pretence of cruelty would be an intolerable scandal which the State ought not to permit, still less to enforce. So long as divorce is only granted on grave and serious grounds, such as may reasonably be held to fall within the principle that marriage can only be dissolved when the conduct of one of the parties has ipso facto dissolved it, I do not think that in an Established Church the State ought to forbid a clergyman who takes this view from celebrating the re-marriage of the innocent party, or to forbid him from admitting such a person to Holy Communion. In this case it would perhaps be necessary to protect from legal proceedings a clergyman who should feel himself bound in conscience to refuse Communion to such a person, while he would also be protected from legal proceedings for admitting him.

"(9) I should like to second Canon Henson's protest against the clause in the recent Act by which a clergyman is liable to penalties for marrying his deceased wife's sister. The clause was introduced into the Act by the House of Lords at the last moment, and I do not believe the House in the least understood that the technical expression "ecclesiastical censure" (to which the clergyman who contracts such a marriage was made liable) included deprivation of a benefice. I should like to observe in passing that the ecclesiastical authority (patristic and conciliar) against the second marriages which are freely contracted by high-church bishops and priests is far stronger than any that can be pleaded against the marriage with a deceased wife's sister whether in priest or layman. If there is to be any further legislation on the marriage question, opportunity might be taken to remove this anomaly from the statute book."

39,307. I have not read that passage before. I doubt whether that is really relevant to our inquiry at all. Up to that everything seems to be?—I think the subject was introduced by Canon Henson.

39,308. It may have been mentioned, but we probably said so at the time?—"(10) I venture strongly to plead for permitting the publication of divorce cases with the degree of fulness now usual in respectable newspapers. I am inclined to think that there is some exaggeration about the bad effects of such publication, except what is the inevitable result of that knowledge of evil which boys will be sure to acquire at an early age without the assistance of newspapers. And I do not believe that the deterrent influence of a mere statement that A.B. has been divorced on the ground of adultery or cruelty would be strongly felt. I suspect that is not so much the mere fact of its being known that he is guilty of adultery which exercises a deterrent effect on the class of people who figure, or might under certain circumstances figure, in divorce suits as the publication in detail of the discreditable and often (according to the most worldly standards) dishonourable behaviour, on one or both sides, which have led up to the actual adultery. In the same way, many a man who would care comparatively little about the world knowing that he had been guilty of something which the law called cruelty—mere technical cruelty, as he would say to his friends—would shrink from having the actual details of his neglect or bad temper or brutality proclaimed to the public.

"(11) Although I recognise that there are strong arguments on the other side, I think on the whole it would be conducive to the interests of morality that adultery without cruelty or desertion on the part of the husband should be a ground for divorce à vinculo matrimonii, when it could not be shown that the other party had conduced to or connived at the adultery for the purpose of facilitating a divorce. I may perhaps be allowed to add one further suggestion; while it is certainly desirable to offer no inducements to misconduct deliberately planned with the view of facilitating a divorce, I have always found it difficult to understand why misconduct on the part of the petitioner should be held a bar to an absolute divorce in all cases, even when the misconduct was in no way responsible for the misconduct of the respondent. When both parties desire a divorce it might be desirable to extend the discretionary power of the court to overrule such an objection on the part of the King's Proctor when it is of opinion that the misconduct did not take place by mutual agreement for the purpose of procuring the divorce. The argument in favour of such an extension is the general social objection to the multiplication of judicially separated persons living apart and yet forbidden to contract legal marriages, I do not say that no such separations should ever be allowed, but they should be minimised as much as possible in the interests of morality itself."

39,309. That is so very full, Canon Rashdall, that I have not much to ask you; but I should like to get one point a little more fully, if you would kindly turn to page 2. It is a question of fact and not comment It is the paragraph beginning, "I feel bound to say this much upon the more fundamental issue which is raised in the particular problem before us; and the line I have taken would, I think, be fairly representative of a large body of Christian opinion." I want you to tell us to what extent you consider your views in that respect are representative of a body of Christian opinion?—Well, I should be disposed to say if this particular question of divorce were not raised, if one confined oneself to the general question of the authority of our Lord on matters of conduct, I should think that nearly all intelligent Christian opinion would recognise that our Lord only purported to lay down general principles, leaving the detailed application of them to the individual conscience, or to the conscience either of the community or the individual as the case may be. That I think would be almost universally admitted in general terms. When we come to this particular case, I admit that the number of people who would be disposed to agree with me would be smaller; I think it is probable it would be a minority of the clergy—certainly it would be a minority of the clergy—but I think it is very probable it would be a majority of lay members of the Church of England. But, however, opinion on this subject is so rarely expressed that it is rather difficult to say what view is generally taken.

(Chairman.) I think that indicates a little more fully than the paper does what you intend to convey.

39,310. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You are strongly disposed, Canon, to the admission of incurable insanity as a ground for divorce. You state no reasons for that?—Well, I should have thought it was so obvious that the insane person is not capable of being to the other person what a husband or a wife should be.

39,311. But it has been said in this room that that applies to many other incurable diseases, and why select insanity?—You said any incurable disease?

39,312. Yes?—Well, I should have said the case was scarcely parallel; because as long as a person is incurable, no doubt he or she cannot be all that the ideal of marriage requires that he or she should be to the other party; but then there would still remain duties and good offices which the other partner may render to the sick person, and I do not think it should be laid down that he or she is discharged from rendering those good offices by virtue of a disease. But, when you come to insanity, you have to deal with a being who, in the moral sense of the word, is not a person at all.

39,313. And therefore you would put insanity by itself as a condition totally apart from the ordinary mass of incurable diseases?—I should be inclined to do so.

39,314. It has been said that marriage is for better or for worse; and if an unfortunate person becomes insane, in view of that statement do you still hold insanity should be a ground for divorce?—Yes, I think so.

39,315. On what ground?—Well, I do not think you can take a particular formula like "for better or for worse" and base your whole theory of marriage on the actual use of those words. Most general statements require some qualification, and it obviously would not be convenient in the marriage ceremony that the parties should enumerate the particular cases to which the general rule does not apply.

39,316. (Mr. Burt.) Just one question. I gather from your evidence that you would place the two sexes on terms of equality?—I should incline to do so, though I do not feel at all decided on the subject. I think there is so much to be said on both sides; but on the whole, I think so.

39,317. (The Archbishop of York.) I should like to ask you one or two questions, Canon Rashdall, bearing on your evidence, so as, if possible, to elicit your real meaning. At the beginning of your very interesting proof you lay it down as your opinion that you would find it difficult to regard any saying of Christ as absolutely and permanently binding on His followers if it were found to be in collision with the dictates of moral consciousness in the present. Does that mean that the moral consciousness, so far as it can be discovered at any time, is to condition the acceptance of a saying of Christ?—Well, perhaps I might put it in this way. I regard the grounds for the authority that we ascribe to Christ, and the position which is assigned to Him by Christian theology, as resting very largely indeed on the appeal His teaching makes to the moral consciousness, and, therefore if we found that to an important extent the teaching of Christ was such as did not appeal to the moral consciousness, the ground for the authority that is ascribed to Him would be gone, and one would find oneself involved in a circular argument. I might illustrate the point in this way. Suppose, as a matter of fact, Christ taught what Mahomet had taught. I could then no longer accept His authority, and, therefore, I should find it difficult to say: "Here is some important general "rule which does not commend itself either to my "moral consciousness or the moral consciousness of "the age, and yet I feel bound to accept it merely "because it is recorded that our Lord Jesus Christ "said so nineteen hundred years ago."

39,318. Might I submit that is a purely hypothetical case. Might I ask who is to determine what the moral consciousness of the present is?—Well, with regard to his own personal conduct everybody must determine it for himself.

39,319. So if a person said. "I refuse to obey a "saying of Christ, because it does not commend "itself to my moral consciousness," would one be justified in considering him a Christian?—Well, I think it would depend on the special character of the precept. He might reject some detailed recommendation of Christ and remain a Christian on the ground that the detailed recommendation of our Lord referred to a state of things that has passed away, and that the principles of the Master's teaching must be applied by each age to its own circumstances. But if the thing were a matter of sufficient importance, then I think, ipso facto, he would cease to be a Christian by refusing to accept it; or his Christianity would become a Christianity of a different kind.

39,320. Would you say that our Lord's sayings about marriage are dealing with details?—If they are to be taken as absolutely binding rules, binding upon the State as well as the individual, and upon the individual in all possible circumstances, I think it might be possible to regard them as dealing with details.

39,321. But apart from these conditions, do you wish to convey to us that your opinion is, that even a strong ideal expressed by Christ, if in conflict with the moral consciousness of the present at any time, might be set aside?—Certainly, I think the moral consciousness ought to prevail; but then in that case the moral consciousness would, to that extent, have rejected Christianity.

39,322. Quite; but I want to know what your opinion is, as it is capable of very wide extensions. On that principle one ought to follow the development of the moral consciousness, even in such a case. That is, apparently, a higher authority than the sayings of Christ?—I did not quite gather what you said.

39,323. You would admit that an individual or a body of individuals would be entitled to say the development of the moral consciousness must prevail, even against what seems to be a large ideal laid down by Christ?—Yes, I should say it would be the duty of such a person not to be a Christian, since the reason that we have for being a Christian is the fact that the Christian ideal appeals to us. If the Christian ideal did not appeal to us, it would be certainly our duty not to be Christians.

39,324. Then you would say the only authority that Christ had on the individual or community was limited by whether or not what he said commended itself to the moral consciousness of that person or community?—Yes, if that is to be taken in this sense, that so long as it did not commend itself to the individual or community, the individual or community ought not to follow it; but it would not follow that the individual or community was right. The teaching of our Lord might be the right moral teaching.

39,325. But you say we can only determine what is right by its correspondence with the moral consciousness of the present?—Certainly.

39,326. Then a person would be right to reject even a large ideal of Christ, if it did not correspond with that moral consciousness?—Yes, I think so.

39,327. You would agree that hitherto the general impression has been amongst Christians that the ideals of Christ were to control rather than to follow the ordinary development of moral consciousness?—I never for a moment suggested that the ideals of Christ should follow. Christ laid down the ideal, if I may say so, out of His own moral and religious consciousness. I have not suggested that He ought to have subordinated His ideas to the lower ideas of His time.

39,328. No, but what you have suggested is, that the moral and religious consciousness of Christ has no authority to control or guide the moral and religious consciousness of humanity, but should rather defer to that as a higher authority?—No, I have not suggested it should defer to it. I have suggested that an individual who finds himself hopelessly in collision with the ideal of Christianity should follow his own conscience. I do not mean to say the individual is not to take account of the authority. In making up his mind if a thing is right, an individual ought to pay great deference to authority; and for anyone who is a Christian, the authority of Christ would be the highest authority that could possibly be appealed to. But, all the same, in the last resort, if, having taken into account the importance of the authority against him, he still is clear that what is recommended by that authority is wrong, he ought not to do it I think your Grace said that the general Christian opinion would be against me. I believe I could appeal on that matter most distinctly to the authority of Bishop Butler and of Cardinal Newman. In a well-known letter Cardinal Newman wrote practically to this effect —that if the Pope, whom he acknowledged to be infallible, told him to murder the King, he would feel bound to obey his conscience and not the Pope.

39,329. I think you admit that is an extreme case?—Certainly, but I think it is necessary to take into account extreme cases when we lay down general principles.

39,330. Then would you say that when the moral consciousness in the past had taken a strong line, the Christian ideal ought to have deferred to it, or accommodated itself to it?—I not only think it ought to have done so, but that it did so, because no age has based its conduct entirely on some external authority without appealing to its own moral consciousness.

39,331. Then were such generations forcing the teaching of Christ to accommodate itself to their own moral consciousness?—It would not have been necessary in their own view. The age that recommended celibacy and regarded marriage as barely tolerable, and a necessary evil, based its view on the deliverance of the moral consciousness. They really did think marriage a base and a low thing, and that celibacy was a high ideal. That being so, they would no doubt have thought that their ideal was the ideal of our Lord; they interpreted his sayings in that way.

39,332. Then would the persons who resisted those low notions on the ground that they were not Christian have been justly shut up, if I may use the expression, by being told that that was the moral consciousness of the present?—I have never said the individual Christian should submit unreservedly to the moral consciousness of other people, but take it into account; and I think the individual might be justified in acting on the authority and thinking it was more likely to be right than himself. But if his moral consciousness was sufficiently clear that it was his duty to act against the general view of his age, I say he ought to have acted upon it.

39,333. Then we will come to the future. Supposing that over any large section of civilised society views of marriage prevailed which were of an extremely lax kind, but these views commended themselves to the moral consciousness of the present; it would be, in your view, no longer open to the Christian to say, "I object to this because it is inconsistent with the ideal of Christ"?—It would be open to him to say so, certainly; for in some cases to act upon authority is a perfectly reasonable thing if an individual does not feel perfectly clear about a matter, It is impossible to define the degree of conviction and clearness which makes it the duty of individuals to act against even the highest of external authorities; and when the conviction is not of a very strong kind, and his opinion is not the clearest possible, he may very well be justified in deferring to the authority. He might put it to himself in this way: "Christ's moral stan- "dard I recognise as being the highest the world "has ever known, and, if in a particular case I find "myself at issue with it, it may still be better for me "to defer to it, because I think Christ is more likely "to be right than the spirit of the age." But if that were not the case, and he felt in his own consciousness that the spirit of the age was right, he ought to act on that judgment, no matter what the external authority against him was.

39,334. No doubt that is the individual conscience; but you say that the ideal of Christ about marriage even is subject to the greater authority of the moral consciousness of the present—which may mean equally at any future period of the evolution of ordinary morality?—If I may say so, I do not think that is a fair way of putting it. You are suggesting that what I have said——

39,335. No, I am not suggesting anything I only want to know what your opinion is?—Well, you seem to think my opinion was that the individual ought always to defer to the opinion of his age, excluding himself. I have not suggested that. I am taking the case where an individual's moral consciousness agreed with that of his age. I think the individual ought to pay a certain amount of deference to the opinion of others; but still there are limits to that deference.

39,336. I will not pursue the question further, except by reading again what you have said in your proof, and asking whether it represents your considered judgment. "I should find it difficult to regard a "saying of Christ as absolutely and permanently "binding upon His followers if it were found to be in "collision with the dictates of the moral consciousness "in the present." Does that represent your judgment? — The moral consciousness of the present includes the individual's own moral consciousness, and your Grace rather assumed that it should be excluded.

39,337. I assume nothing. I only want your opinion. I understand that is so?—Including the individual's own moral consciousness. I stand by that sentence.

39,338. I should like to know what your opinion is as to this. Looking at it from the public point of view—how is the State, in dealing with this marriage question, for instance, to discover at any time what is the best moral consciousness of the present?—I suppose Members of Parliament are elected as representatives of the moral consciousness. They must act on their own moral judgment, but they must also use the means that are open to everybody of finding out what is thought by those who they are inclined to think are most likely to know.

39,339. But you would say that the opinion of the majority of the House of Commons might be taken as a good expression of the developed moral consciousness of the present?—The opinion of the House of Commons acting with a sense of responsibility, knowing that they are the representatives of other people, and therefore are not free to express merely their private opinions, but of the opinions which are generally held——

39,340. But surely every majority of the House of Commons would suppose it was acting as the representative of the people after full deliberation?—Yes.

39,341. Therefore any opinion of the majority of the House of Commons could be legitimately taken as the best test of the moral consciousness of the present?—By themselves. They act under the belief that they do represent the people. When I say the moral consciousness of the community I do not necessarily mean of a bare numerical majority. On moral matters I should think there would be a larger amount of agreement than there is on the ordinary issues of party politics, and I do not think a member of the House of Commons would be justified in accepting a view that only represented a majority of his own party. Perhaps I might say that all along it is to be understood that authority does not mean infallibility, I have not claimed infallibility for any authority.

39,342. No; I understand your view is that, as far as it is to be discovered (and I have a difficulty in knowing what your opinion is, as to how it is to be discovered), the moral consciousness of the present is the highest ethical authority?—I do not mean the moral consciousness of the present when it clashes with the individual's own conscience. Supposing the individual does not agree with it, the individual should think, no doubt, of the moral consciousness of the past as well as of the present.

39,343. Thank you. I will not pursue that further. I am coming to what you have said about extensions, which you would be prepared to think would be of social advantage in the grounds of divorce, rather bearing on what Sir Frederick Treves was asking you. Could you give us any indication whether the grounds you have selected for possible grounds for divorce have been selected upon any basis of principle governing them?—The existing grounds?

39,344. No; the proposed grounds of extension, which you have advocated?—I think it is a matter of social expediency, and each case must be considered by itself. I am quite clear about the two cases I have mentioned. I am rather inclined to think that there should be further extensions, but there are so many expediencies on both sides that I do not pretend to have a very clearly decided opinion as to any further grounds.

39,345. You would have no objection on any ground of principle (though you might have grave objections on grounds of expediency) in accepting mutual consent as a ground for divorce?—If divorce by mutual consent was for the real good of the community I should be prepared to vote for it, but I cannot conceive that under any possible circumstances or in any possible community the permission of divorce by mutual consent could be for the real good of the community.

39,346. You would not consider that our Lord's saying would have any bearing except as representing a high moral opinion on the question as to whether mutual consent should be a ground for divorce or not?—I think an individual, before committing himself to such a judgment, should weigh the authority of Christ; but I think if he came to the conclusion that, in spite of Christ having held another ideal divorce by mutual consent ought to be permitted, he would have taken a considerable step towards repudiating the authority of Christ altogether, and, so far, have ceased to be a Christian.

39,347. I only wanted to know. You would leave even that to be determined by the social expediency of the time?—Yes, including in one's notion of social expediency the maintenance to a certain moral ideal which does not vary with the times.

39,348. I have found a little difficulty in knowing just where your views would carry us. I see you think there might be these extensions "if a sufficient "social advantage can thereby be secured, including "in the notion of social advantage a strong public "opinion in favour of permanent marriage and fidelity "to marriage bonds, and a generally healthy state of "feeling as to sexual relations." I should like to ask whether you think at the present time, for instance, even in our own country, there is a generally healthy state of feeling as to sexual relations?—I do not think the state of feeling is as healthy as it might be, but I think the ideal generally held is much in advance of the general practice. The ideal is much healthier than the practice.

39,349. Then, do you think, if the views you have put before us as to the moral authority of the sayings of Christ were generally adopted—not by a student in a university, but by people generally—these strong feelings about the permanence of marriage and the sexual relations would remain as strong as they are?—I think the judgment of the great mass of the people on moral questions is, and always must be, very largely determined by authority—by the general sense of the community. They have no reason very often for believing a particular thing to be wrong except that it is generally accounted so.

39,350. And you would think that is a reasonable opinion?—I think as long as they have no decided opinion of their own they are right in deferring to the accepted standard of the community, but those accepted standards are not infallible; and they ought to be, and continually are, modified by changes of moral sentiment which first of all spring up in individual minds or in a section of the community and gradually extend to the community at large.

39,351. Leaving out these rather elaborate distinctions, what I want to get at is, do you think the views you have promulgated about the sayings and authority of Christ, if largely adopted, would tend to the strengthening of the feeling about the permanence of marriage, or even the obligation of personal purity. What I wish you to have in mind is that you cannot expect every man in the street to make the distinction which you have been good enough to put before us?—The question that your Grace is raising constitutes one of the most difficult problems of moral philosophy. I quite admit that it may possibly not be very desirable to encourage masses of ignorant people to enquire too curiously into the grounds on which things are accounted right or wrong, but I do not think there is anything in the views I have propounded the diffusion of which would tend to lower the general ideal of marriage.

39,352. Then I come to one or two questions about the very interesting opinions you have put before us, on the difficult question of the relation of Church and State with regard to marriage. How far would you wish us to suppose that the views you have represented to us represent any considerable section of opinion in the Church of England. I want to get a little more clearly what you said in answer to the Chairman?—Well, I have read the evidence of several clerical witnesses who have given evidence within the last few days, and I find myself in general agreement with them. I may not agree with every word they have said, or they with every word I have said; but I find myself looking at the thing from the same point of view as such people as Professor Sanday and Professor Inge, and I think they represent a considerable section of opinion among the clergy and a very much larger section of opinion amongst the laity, in so far as the laity have ever arrived at very distinct and definite opinions on the subject.

39,353. Do you think Dr. Sanday would be prepraed to agree with the opinions you have expressed on the first page of your proof?—Dr. Sanday is chiefly a theologian and has not written on questions of ethics, but I think it is extremely probable he would agree.

39,354. Now how far would you regard Convocation as fairly representing the mind of the Church of England on this matter?—I should think it represents fairly enough the minds of the majority of the clergy.

39,355. Do you regard Convocation as having any constitutional place in expressing the mind of the Church of England?—I recognise it as having the amount of authority which the law attributes to it.

39,356. It is the only constitutional (whether it is sufficient or not is another matter) expression of the mind of the Church of England, is it not?—Except in so far as the mind of the Church of England is the mind of the nation expressed in Parliament.

39,357. I am coming to that in a moment. Do you regard the Houses of Laymen elected by members of the Church as in any way representing the mind of the Church of England?—I should think they are about as bad representatives as it is possible to discover.

39,358. Is there any other way to represent laymen in the Church of England except Parliament?—No, I do not think there is.

39,359. So that in the absence of anything else except Parliament it is in some way representative?—Well, there is a body of persons elected by somebody, and they call themselves representatives, but I do not recognise that body as possessing any legal or much moral authority.

39,360. Then do you regard the Diocesan Conferences as at all representing the mind of the Church of England?—They represent the opinions fairly well of the majority of the clergy, but I do not think they are very expressive of the real mind of Church people. Knowing the kind of way they are practically elected I do not attach much importance to their decisions, because people who are not strongly interested in ecclesiastical questions seldom take much part in electing them or their deliberations.

39,361. But ecclesiastical questions is a Latin way of describing Church questions, and those members of the Church who are interested in the Church should be more generally regarded as representative of the mind of the Church than those who are not?—I do not know that I should admit that.

39,362. You would say as to elections that those citizens who thought about and informed themselves of the affairs of the State are more representative, and their opinion more worthy of being considered, than the mass of citizens who read and think very little, would you not?—I should not admit that the people whose opinions are not represented by Diocesan Conferences necessarily feel less strongly about moral matters than those who are represented.

39,363. But this matter is a matter of something more than a mere technical ecclesiastical question?—Certainly; but I do not think because a man has strong views about this question he is necessarily likely to offer himself to be elected, or to be elected, a member of a Diocesan Conference.

39,364. Then except for Parliament you think it is not possible to ascertain the mind of the Church of England?—I do not think it can be ascertained in a cut and dried way. I think one's general knowledge of life will tell one what is the view generally held by members of the Church of England.

39,365. It must be a matter of individual experience?—Yes, necessarily.

39,366. It must depend on the particular members of the laity you encounter?—Yes. It is not only by personal conversation, but one reads books and papers which give an idea of the views that are held in the community in which one lives on this and other religious questions.

39,367. Then is it, or not, true that both Houses of Convocation in both provinces, both Houses of Laymen, the representative Church Council containing all of these met together, and, so far as I know, every single Diocesan Conference, has expressed opinions very diametrically opposed to those you have represented?—That does not convince me at all——

39,368. I am not seeking to convince you, Canon Rashdall; I know I could not; but is it not the fact, as far as you know?—I have not examined it very carefully, but I take it from your Grace that that is the fact.

39,369. Then if that is to be set aside, we come to Parliament as representing the mind of the Church of England in a more satisfactory way. Is that so? I think you said in your proof that you thought Parliament was a better exponent of Church of England opinion than certainly a majority of bishops in Convocation?—Yes, I think that is so.

39,370–1. Even if Parliament were composed of a majority of people who were not members of the Church of England?—But is it so composed? I do not say under no conceivable circumstances Parliament might cease to represent the opinion of the Church of England. I mean taking Parliament as it stands. It might be that the majority of the community should become Mohammedans, and then the majority of Parliament would represent Mohammedanism.

39,372. Do you think that the mind of the Church of England on this matter would be dumb and inarticulate except so far as it is expressed by the House of Commons?—It has no other formal expression, but I should not say it is dumb and inarticulate; because it reveals itself in the literature of the day and the public opinion of the day; that you cannot find its opinion by counting the heads of a particular assembly, I admit.

39,373. In other words, you are not able to point to anything except your own impression as to the mind of the Church of England on this matter?—I think if I had time I could probably produce evidence that these opinions are not confined to myself; but I cannot point to any easily accessible proof of that for the moment.

39,374. Now with regard to the effect of any possible extension of the grounds of divorce in the relations between Church and State. I think you have very forcibly said that if the State were to go further (that is, than allowing the re-marriage of innocent parties and those who have contracted marriage with the deceased wife's sister) and extend the grounds of divorce, a grave situation would arise. You feel that the relations of Church and State would be very greatly strained if the State were to adopt these grounds of extension and were to expect the clergy to celebrate marriages made in consequence of that?—Which kind of extension does your Grace mean?

39,375. Beyond the innocent party in a divorce for adultery re-marrying, which is at present permitted by the present law?—Yes, I think it would be a difficulty that would have to be dealt with.

39,376. I suppose the main difficulty would be, first of all, the celebration of such marriages?—Yes.

39,377. And you say you think the best practical course would be to allow any clergyman willing to perform such marriages to do so in any church which its incumbent was willing to lend for the purpose. But might not there be a very strong feeling that the celebration of marriages based on these extended grounds of divorce was a profanation of the church itself, and was a very violent exception, for instance, to the meaning of the marriage service?—Some people would think so, no doubt.

39,378. And would not the feelings (which I think would be those of a very large number of lay people in such matters—even parishioners) be entitled to be considered as well as the wish of the individual incumbent to lend his church?—I think it should be a consideration certainly, but to give it too much importance would be to prevent the celebration of marriages which the majority of the community thought it desirable to allow.

39,379. Then supposing the majority of the community thought it right to allow divorce by consent, would you consider then that the religious service should be held in church?—No; because that would be opposed to the feeling, not merely of a bare majority but of practically the whole of the population which could be considered seriously Christian.

39,380. Yes, but I am talking of the future?—Then it would be the duty of Christians, no doubt, to protest, and bring about some modification in the relations between Church and State.

39,381. Then the next point, with regard to the admission of persons who have re-married, under whatever conditions, to the Holy Communion. Is it your view that it is the province of Parliament (I suppose that is ultimately the majority in the House of Commons) to determine who are and who are not to be admitted to Holy Communion in the Church of England?—I think, at present, under the present relations between Church and State, it is right that that should be determined by Parliament.

39,382. That is, by a majority of the House of Commons?—Yes.

39,383. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) There are just one or two points I want to get clear in my own mind. On the first page of your memorandum you say—towards the end of it—that "one of the chief claims of Christi- "anity to the position of a universal religion is just "the fact that its Founder confined himself almost "entirely to laying down principles of the broadest "possible character." It is so carefully written one can see every word is weighed; but does that mean that there are some cases which are covered by that word "almost"?—I think there are detailed applications, but I think they are intended rather as applications or illustrations.

39,384. Could you give me an example of a case where our Lord, departing from His usual method, did give what you would call a detailed rule?—Well, for instance, He said, "Lend to him that asketh of thee." That, I should say, was a detailed application of the general principle of love to one's neighbour. But that detailed application, though it is the most obvious one, does not necessarily imply that that is a rule which is to be acted upon in every individual case for all time.

39,385. Certainly not. You would not contend we are always to lend to those who desire to borrow from us?—No.

39,386. Then you do not mean really that our Lord laid down any specific rule of action which was to be followed in what was called yesterday here the statutory sense?—I think that no rules other than broad general principles were laid down and intended to be observed by all persons, under all circumstances, for all time.

39,387. I do not want to pursue the subject you have been asked so much about, namely, moral consciousness, but I have a difficulty in following the sort of basis of your view which you lay down on the seventh page. "The only type of sexual relations "which commends itself to the moral consciousness is "that of permanent and monogamous marriage." Why do you say that the only type of sexual relations which commends itself to the moral consciousness is monogamous?—Well, the deliverances of the moral consciousness are ultimate facts, and you cannot appeal beyond them. When it has reached a certain period of moral development, every community has generally recognised that, or at all events the persons I should regard as representing the moral consciousness at its best are certainly agreed about that point.

39,388. Would not it be true to say that at least half the human race regard polygamy as not inconsistent with their moral consciousness?—I rather doubt whether, as a matter of fact, that is so, because I think the tendency of recent research has been to show that the general rule all through history has been monogamy, and polygamy rather the exception.

39,389. Well, it is common ground between us that there are vast sections of the human race, by no means the least civilised, who believe in and practise polygamy?—Yes; but then I do not regard the moral consciousness that sanctions that as being the highest. Of course, in the last resort one has to fall back on one's own moral consciousness, as one does in matters of scientific truth. The vast majority of the human race probably believe that the sun goes round the earth, but that does not make it true.

39,390. I quite follow what you say. Then it comes to this, that the basis of what you start with in the marriage relation is that your moral consciousness requires as a substantive matter that marriage should be monogamous, and that the moral consciousness of another may favour polygamy?—But it does not follow we are both right.

39,391. But who is to settle?—Well, each individual must settle it, just as each individual acts on his own views with regard to scientific truth; and when it comes to the action of the community, the community must act on the moral ideas that are prevalent in that community.

39,392. I quite follow that, and if I may say so, with all respect, that is quite an intelligible view in the lecture room, but for the law we have to be definite. An Act of Parliament cannot rest on the moral consciousness of an individual. What is the basis on which an Act of Parliament, in this matter, is to go in changing the law? You start with what is a subjective basis—monogamy. But why is Parliament to take that?—I do not ask Parliament to take my individual opinion, but I think Parliament would have no difficulty in satisfying itself that the vast majority of the community do equally regard monogamy as the right thing.

39,393. Of the community here?—Yes.

39,394. Then we come round to the same thing again. The community here does not agree with the community somewhere else, and you tell me that in the end you must decide by your own moral consciousness. That, again, is an individual matter?—Yes, but I do not see quite the exact point of the question which you want me to answer.

39,395. I am trying, Canon Rashdall, without any desire to create a difficulty in your mind, or any confusion, to translate your evidence into practical action; and I confess I fail to see, with your view of the ultimate force of the human moral consciousness, how we are to arrive at a definite law which will bind everybody?—Well, of course we cannot make it possible that there may not arise a collision between Acts of Parliament and individual consciences, and unfortunately such collisions arise, and it may be the moral duty of the individual to disobey the Act of Parliament, though I am strongly inclined to think it very rarely is so. I am not contending for anything novel. Parliament does act on its view of what the moral consciousness requires, and I might say, by way of illustration, that judges are often called upon to determine whether a certain contract, for instance, is opposed to morality, and they will in those cases act upon their own view, partly of what is generally thought moral and partly of what they themselves think moral. There is no external way of discovering what is moral. In the last resort morality is created by the moral consciousness, and I am afraid there is no way out of that—just as in intellectual matters. Supposing the question to be whether it is desirable to act on the views that the sun goes round the earth, or that the earth goes round the sun—Parliament has to act on its own view of scientific truth after paying due attention to the opinion of experts.

39,396. Now turning to another matter. You said in your paper very clearly that you would regard any divergence between Church and State in this matter as a deplorable matter, or a grave evil?—Yes.

39,397. That means, I suppose, that you regard the sanction of religion in connection with marriage as an important social factor?—I do.

39,398. That means also, does it not, that the Church is entitled to have an opinion; otherwise there would be no divergence?—Yes, but at present I think the Church is only entitled to express its opinion through the present constitutional channels.

39,399. Do you mean as the result of establishment?—Yes.

39,400. But you would agree, would you not, that the Church of England is a society which exists apart from establishment? You would not say, would you, that the Church of England has no existence apart from its union with the State?—It has consented to the union with the State, and therefore it has no legal existence except in such a way as is allowed by the terms of that union.

39,401. Yes, that is so. I am not on that. I am on the question whether they were two parties that could agree. and whether there is an independent body or society which is the Church of England?—I do not think there is any outward and visible organisation——

39,402. I do not ask that. Is there an independent society or institution?—I should say it exists ideally rather than as an actual fact, because you cannot point to the determinate persons who constitute it under the present conditions.

39,403. That brings me to one other matter I want to ask you about. I am not going to repeat his Grace's questions, but I have a difficulty here. You say on page 13, "At present at all events Parliament is the only legally recognised organ for the expression of lay opinion in the Church." I do not quite understand what it is you are referring to when you say that?—For some purposes we must take the Church to mean the people who are members of the Church of England in some other sense than merely being members of the nation, but they cannot be very accurately determined. It would be too narrow a conception of the body of churchmen to limit it to the people who habitually go to church, and on the other hand it would be too large to say that everybody is a member of the Church who is not actively a member of any other body; but we know in a rough way who are churchmen and who are not.

39,404. I am not asking you to define churchmen. That is not my point at all. There are two points on this. First, it seemed to me that that sentence did seem to be a recognition that there was such a thing as the Church independently of the establishment?—There are a body of persons who are adherents of the Church of England, and for the moment I was using the word in that sense.

39,405. Now the other point I do not understand in that sentence is what you mean by Parliament being the legally recognised organ of it. When did it become the legally recognised organ of the Church? I do not follow that?—Well, I think it has always been so more or less; and became very definitely so at the Reformation.

39,406. Became the organ of the Church? I will drop the matter altogether if you mean that no legislation is possible which Parliament does not consent to (if it is not the action of Parliament). That is the case with all legislation in England, and is only a truism. But I cannot follow what you mean by saying that Parliament is an organ and a legally recognised organ of the Church?—Well, it is not very easy to define accurately, but legislation proceeds on the theory that the nation is the Church. We all know, in point of fact, that that theory does not quite correspond with the fact; but I think it does correspond with it to a certain extent, even now, in such a way that it is on that ground that the present legal arrangements commend themselves to a large number of churchmen. They are satisfied with the present arrangement, satisfied that Parliament should act as the governing body of the Church and make the ultimate laws which the Church must obey, and in that sense I think it may be said to be still an organ of the Church.

39,407. May I regard this as your view; that the Church is really the nation in its ecclesiastical capacity. And then, of course, Parliament as the organ of the nation becomes an organ of the Church?—That would be the ideal, but one has to recognise, in point of fact, that there is a certain discrepancy between the ideal and the actuality.

39,408. That is what I was coming to. The House of Commons now does not represent the Church in any real sense, does it?—I think it would not be likely to legislate on these Church questions in a way that is not acceptable to the majority of churchmen.

39,409. Do you think the House of Commons itself takes the view that it represents the Church of England?—Well, it does in so far that it actually legislates on that basis. Of course the actual individual members of it——

39,410. Does it legislate for the Church? Have you ever had any practical dealing with getting Church Bills through Parliament?—No, I have not. I know it is very difficult to get them through.

39,411. It is startling to me to hear that the House of Commons performs the function of legislation for the Church of England?—If you open an ecclesiastical law book you will find most of the laws of the present—laws relating, for instance, to the relations between bishops and the licensing of curates, and about non-residence and pluralities.—by far the greater number of the operative laws of the Church are Acts of Parliament, and are printed in books of "laws relating to Church and clergy," and so on.

39,412. All changes have to be made by Act of Parliament?—Yes, and that does justify the assertion I make.

39,413. I ask you all this because it is of very practical importance to this Commission to understand what the view of the Church of England is with regard to these questions in view of what you yourself have said of the undesirability of there being any conflict between the Church and the State. It is in that way only that this question is relevant, and that brings me to the other point as to which his Grace asked you, and as to which I doubt if there is any real difference of opinion between us, namely, as to the position of the Houses of Laymen and Diocesan Conferences. I quite followed what you said, and personally I do not think I disagree with it—not that that is important. But would it not be true to say that there are two kinds of laymen of the Church of England? There is, is there not, the ordinary man of the world who if you asked him what he is would say he was a churchman; and there is the man who is actively interested in Church matters, and matters in his parish and diocese—a man who has active interest in the concerns of his Church. Do not these represent two very distinct classes?—Yes, but I should say there are a great many classes. There are all sorts and degrees of adhesion to the Church; and some who would be the very best churchmen from some points of view would not be so from other points of view.

39,414. But you do recognise these two types?—Yes, and others.

39,415. Have you much practical acquaintance with Diocesan Conferences and Houses of Laymen and these bodies?—At the present moment I am a member of one, and I have taken part in one such conference; otherwise my experience is limited to reading the reports in the newspapers.

39,416. Would not you say that all those bodies are fairly representative of opinion amongst the second class I have indicated—the actively interested churchmen—but are not in the least typical of opinion amongst ordinary lay churchmen?—I do not think I could admit that they are fairly representative even of the narrower class, the class of those people actively interested in the affairs of the Church, because I think very largely the people taking part in them are those whose views agree with those of the clergy. They are often asked to stand by the clergy, and many men may be counted as good churchmen in the sense of being interested in the affairs of the Church, whose views are not uppermost in these ecclesiastical assemblies, and who shrink from offering themselves as members of such bodies.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Then if you do not take the view I suggest, I have nothing more to say. It is your evidence that is being given and not mine.

(Sir George White.) May I ask one question?

(Chairman.) If you please.

39,417. (Sir George White.) I should like to ask a good many questions on the examination of his Grace the Archbishop, but it is forbidden by the rules of this Commission. However, I think I may be permitted to ask one question. May not I take it that where, in your judgment, the moral consciousness differs from the views which the Church, for instance, gives, or the interpretation which the Church gives of the view of Christ's teaching, that it at once raises the question as to whether that interpretation is a correct one or not. Do you follow me?—Yes.

39,418. As I gather from your evidence, you would feel that where this moral consciousness differs from the views of the Church, those views are probably incorrect; that the interpretation of Christ's teaching by the Church is an incorrect one?—Yes.

39,419. And it is on that ground, as I gather, that you would pay heed to the moral consciousness rather than the interpretation which the Church puts on these teachings?—Yes.

39,420. (Chairman.) May I just ask one thing? The questions, as I listened to them, are rather exclusively in the interests of the Church of England. I should like to know if you can tell me what proportion is generally recognised of the whole population in this country as belonging to the Established Church, because we have a great many interests here to consider besides the Established Church; there are all the other Churches, and many people who do not accept Christianity at all?—I think I would rather not answer——

39,421. I only want to know if you can give us any idea?—I should not like to give a definite answer without looking up statistics on the subject, but the general impression, I suppose, is that those who can be considered, in a rather liberal sense, members of the Church of England are a small majority—are not a very large majority of the community—but they are a majority. Perhaps I might say with regard to these moral questions I think nearly all I have said would be equally applicable to the great body of Christian people. I mean to say I am not suggesting that the Commission should act on the views of the Church of England, but on those which would commend themselves to the great body of the Christian people in the community.

39,422. I only put the question because we have to keep in mind the view of more than one Church?—I intended to bear that very distinctly in mind in all I have said.

(Chairman.) Canon Rashdall, I think we ought to thank you very much indeed for the trouble you have taken over this evidence, and I am sure it will be very valuable to us. Thank you very much indeed for your attendance as well as for the paper.

(Chairman.) I daresay some of you will remember that Dr. Swete said he was not well enough to come to-day (I have the correspondence here), and at one of the meetings we resolved that his memorandum which he had prepared should be read I have it here. This is a copy he sent up corrected in his own handwriting, but some of it is Greek and some is Hebrew.

The following memorandum was read by the Chairman:—

MEMORANDUM prepared by Dr. Swete, Regius Professor of Divinity, Cambridge, and presented to the Commissioners.

"In this paper I limit myself to two points: (1) the text and interpretation of certain sayings of our Lord which bear on the question of re-marriage after divorce; (2) the interpretation of a passage in the Epistles of St. Paul.

"1. Mark x. 11 = Luke xvi. 18, Matt. xix. 9; Matt. v. 32.

"In Mark, the statement that the re-marriage of a divorced person is adulterous stands without qualification. Luke supports this, and the text shows no important variant in either Gospel.

"On the other hand the parallel passage in Matthew (xix. 9) notes an exception to the general rule. There is a good deal of uncertainty as to the verbal form of the exception; the "Western" text gives παρεκτὸς [λόγου] πορνείας (so BD latt^{vt}); the other uncials and the later authorities, generally have [εἰ] μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ (so ℵ C vg, &c.). It has been suggested that these are two renderings of the same Aramaic, and that the addition of the words κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν in Matt. xix. 5, prepares us to expect an exception of some kind in verse 9. It is possible, therefore, that one or other of the forms of exception in the MSS. of verse 9 stood in the autograph of the Greek Matthew.

"In Matt. v. 31, there is no variant, and the exception (παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας) is probably original, i.e., it belonged to the Saying as reported by Matthew in that context. Nevertheless, it is open to question whether even there the exception is a true part of the original Saying. In both the Matthean contexts where the Saying occurs there is clear reference to Deut. xxiv. 1, which permits a husband to divorce his wife 'if he has found some unseemly thing in her' (lxx. ὅτι εὗρεν ἐν αὐτῇ ἄσχημον πρᾶγμα), i.e., as the school of Shammai interpreted the words,* some act of unchastity. Now the first Gospel represents our Lord as adopting this interpretation and basing an exception upon it. But in that case it is difficult to see how He could have spoken of the Mosaic regulation as a concession to the σκληροκαρδίαt of the Jewish people. Moreover, His own ruling would have been substantially a republication of the old law, and not, as the whole context in Matthew v. plainly requires, an antithesis to it.

* See Driver on Deuteronomy, p. 270. † Matt. xix. 8.

"But, as it appears to me, there is a stronger reason against attributing the exceptions in Matt. v. 32, xix. 9, to our Lord Himself. It is not after the manner of His Synoptic teaching to guard the principles He lays down by making possible exceptions. He states a principle broadly, leaving it to His disciples to apply it to the circumstances of life, and, where necessary, to relax its rigidity. There are excellent examples of this habit in the immediate neighbourhood of Matt. v. 32, e.g., in v. 22, 39 ff.; in verse 22 some early interpreter has endeavoured to supply a limitation by adding εἰκῇ, which has found its way into the Received Text. In verse 32, if my view of the passage is correct, this has been done by the Evangelist himself, who has thus brought the Saying into line with what was probably the practice of the Jewish Christian circle in which he moved.

"I believe, then, that, in its original form, our Lord's condemnation of re-marriage after divorce was absolute, i.e., that He stated no exception. Such a contingency could find no place in the new ideal of marriage and married life which the Church was to present to the world. But I do not draw the inference that it is not lawful for the Church or for a Christian State to permit divorce or re-marriage in any circumstances. Both, however, are strongly to be deprecated because both are departures from the Christian conception of marriage; neither was contemplated by our Lord; and if they must be conceded, this should clearly be done only under grave necessity, and because of the σκληροκαρδία which the new law of love has not yet dispelled.

"2. 1 Corinthians vii. 1–17.

"In this passage St. Paul deals with marriage, (a) where both parties are members of the Church, and (b) where one of them is a heathen. With regard to (a) he says that the Lord's rule is to be followed, γυναῖκα ἀπὸ ἀνδρὸς μὴ χωρισθῆναι —the reference being probably to the Saying in Mark x. 9, ὃ οὖν ὁ θεὸς συνέζευξεν ἄνθρωπος μὴ χωριζέτω.* But in the case of mixed marriages (τοῖς δὲ λοιποῖς, v. 12) which in a Christian society lately gathered from a great heathen population, as at Corinth, would be the great majority, no instructions had been left by Christ, and the Apostle decides upon his own authority (λέγω ἐγώ, οὐχ ὁ κύριος). His ruling is as follows:—

"The Christian partner in a mixed marriage (contracted presumably before his conversion, and with heathen rites) is not to seek divorce (μὴ ἀφιέτω), but if it be forced upon him by the heathen, it is to be accepted (χωριζέσθω). In this case the Christian who has been divorced may regard himself as free from t marriage bond (οὐ δεδούλωται: cf. Rom. vii. 3, ἐλευθέρα ἐστὶν ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου). But (δέ) this liberty is to be used with due regard for the maintenanee of peace, for peace is the very atmosphere of the Christian calling (ἐν δὲ εἰρήνῃ κέκληκεν ὑμᾶς ὁ θεός). No step should be taken by the Christian which would render reconciliation impossible, for (γάρ) there still remains the hope of winning the heathen to the faith of Christ.

"In this interpretation I have assumed that both ἀφιέναι and χωρίζειν refer to divorce and not mere separation by consent. There is some evidence that both verbs were so used in the literary and perhaps also the colloquial Greek of the time.† I have assumed also that either the Greek or the Roman process of divorce is in view. Lastly, in the clause τί γὰρ οἶδας . . . εἰ . . . σώσεις, I have taken εἰ to mean 'whether . . . not,' as in Esther iv. 14, lxx., τίς οἶδεν εἰ εἰς τὸν καιρὸν τοῦτον ἐβασίλευσας;‡

"It appears to me that in this passage, while full liberty is allowed to the divorced Christian in the circumstances described, such a step as re-marriage is strongly discouraged on the ground of Christian charity. The question, so far as St. Paul faces it, is lifted on to the high ground of the Christian calling. The case, of course, is a special one, and does not now exist amongst us; but the Apostle's ruling seems to show how the Church has to meet all such questions—not so much by an absolute veto on conduct which is not in itself immoral, as by raising the whole standard of human life, and the relations of the sexes in particular."

* In this connection μενέτω ἄγαμος is to be noticed as showing St. Paul's belief that re-marriage after divorce was, as a general rule, prohibited by Christ.

‡ For this passage, see the Oxford Hebrew Lexicon, p. 50 (2, b).

Adjourned for a short time.

Dr. William Emery Barnes called and examined.

39,423. (Chairman.) You are a Doctor of Divinity and Fellow of Peter House, Cambridge, and you are Hulsean Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge?—Yes.

39,424. I belong to the same college, but I do not remember how long you have been Hulsean Professor?—Since 1901.

39,425. You have been good enough to prepare a very short memorandum expressing your views in connection with the subject we have under consideration. Perhaps you would read it to us, and state any points on it which appear desirable to present. I see it is only a skeleton. I confess I hardly know what to ask you. If you would take it through and tell us what views you propose to indicate as you go along I think that would do. It is suggested to me that, perhaps, you have expanded this into a paper of your own?—Yes, those points that need expanding.

39,426. Then will you give it us as you proceed?—'The institution of marriage is protected by Church and State, (a) by the State through the enactment of laws; (b) by the Church through the presentation of an ideal given by our Lord Jesus Christ." I believe there is a great difference between the work done by the Church and by the State, and I feel that the Church does its work through the presentation of an ideal. I do not think that the Church has anything that can be called a law. For laws we look to the State, and we as Christians look to see the Christian ideal expressed in the laws. Our most important duty is to discover what our Lord's ideal was. It was given in the form of a criticism of Jewish law, and therefore it has the nature of an utterance called forth by a particular occasion. But in spite of that we may detect the principle. It was given in criticism of a Jewish law. According to recognised authorities this law allowed a husband to put away his wife for a cause deemed sufficient by himself without applying to any public court—a state of things hardly to be understood I think in modern England, so different is it from present conditions. But this divorce, which was the act of the husband himself, included power to marry again. The only bit of justice about it was that as the husband was free so the wife was free also to contract a fresh marriage. Re-marriage was of the essence of Jewish divorce. Against this unrestricted freedom of divorce and re-marriage our Lord stated His ideal that marriage is to be regarded as a divine institution and a sacred compact. "Those whom God has made one are not to be put asunder by man." The reference in the word man is undoubtedly to the action of the husband. There is no reference to the work of a court of law because a court of law did not enter into the case. Our Lord states that the husband breaks a divinely-sanctioned compact if he puts his wife away except for fornication. The words "except for fornication" are taken by many authorities to be simply St. Matthew's limitation of our Lord's own words, but I believe that the exception "except for fornication" belongs to our Lord's own teaching, though the words are absent from the parallel account of what our Lord said as given in St. Mark. This strong word "fornication" implies such conduct as of itself breaks the marriage bond, so that divorce becomes merely declarative of a fact. A court that grants divorce in my belief simply states a fact—that a separation, in fact, has taken place—and that the fact must be recognised by public authority.

39,427. Might I ask you to make this sentence a little clearer. Where you say "The strong word 'fornication' implies such conduct as of itself breaks the marriage bond." Does that refer only to sexual immorality or does it include other classes of conduct?—I believe only sexual immorality. May I refer to the passage St. Matthew v. 32. My argument is that the exception, "except for fornication," does belong to our Lord's own teaching. Our Lord is speaking of the different precepts of the Ten Commandments, and He gives an extended reference to each of them. When He comes to the command "Thou shalt not commit adultery," He extends it in this way: "I say unto you that every one who dismisseth his wife except for the cause of fornication causeth her to be the subject of adultery." The verb is in the passive, and I believe it means that the husband causes his wife to become the victim of another man's act of adultery. So that our Lord's extension of the command "Thou shalt not commit adultery" in this case is "Thou shalt not cause adultery to be committed by another person"; and I think it is absolutely necessary for the sense to include the words "except for fornication," because if a wife has already committed adultery it could not be said that the husband, by putting her away, caused her to be made an adulteress, because she would be one already. So that I think the words "except for the cause of fornication" necessarily belong to our Lord's words, and that our Lord does therefore allow divorce in His own ideal for the cause of fornication. Fornication I take to mean all immoral conduct.

39,428. I want to get this quite clear. What do you mean by "all immoral conduct"?—Some have tried to restrict it to immoral conduct before marriage. I think that cannot be sustained for a moment. There is no doubt, from instances of the use of the word in the Septuagint and in the Greek Testament which I have here, that the word fornication can be applied to adultery after marriage. It is simply a somewhat wider word—includes a little more than adultery, or some cases that could not be described simply as adultery. For instance, in the fifth chapter of the Epistle to the Corinthians the word fornication is applied to the conduct of a man who had taken his stepmother to wife. I think the word is chosen simply because it is a wider word than the word adultery.

39,429. I only wanted to get it clear that you meant by "all immoral conduct" sexual immoral conduct?—Yes, sexual immoral conduct.

39,430. I think there is a little more at the end of your proof which you have not referred to?—"Unless the Church renounces Christ's ideal, it cannot bless the marriage of any divorced person, except that of the innocent partner in the case of divorce for fornication." I mean by that that the marriage is absolutely broken by the immoral conduct, and therefore that the partner who has not been guilty of the immoral conduct is perfectly free.

39,431. May I then sum up the point that I gather you make broadly thus. You would not regard the teaching to be found in the Gospels as teaching the absolute indissolubility of marriage, but its dissolubility only on the one ground of sexual immoral conduct after marriage?—Yes my Lord, that is so.

39,432. That is substantially the position of the present state of the law?—Yes.

39,433. Except that the wife in her case has to add something to the proof of such an act?—Yes.

39,434. (Sir George White.) Do you say there are no other circumstances that would as effectively break the bond of marriage as fornication? You say here that fornication of itself breaks the marriage bond, so that divorce becomes merely a declaration of the fact. Are there not other conditions which as effectively break, or at least do break the marriage bond as well as fornication?—I think, if I may say so, that that is a question for one who has much more practical experience than I have. I have been fortunate enough to come across very few matrimonial difficulties, and I feel I am hardly qualified to answer that question. I hope you will not think that I am shirking it. It is simply that I feel one ought to have experience to answer such a question as you put to me.

39,435. The only ground upon which I put it is that part of the marriage bond, for instance, is to love and cherish your wife. A man may go on in a system of brutality of the grossest kind for many years. Surely that breaks the marriage bond?—I suppose that would bring in the difficulty of when the marriage bond became broken. One knows that wives do cling to their husbands in an extraordinary way after a great deal of terrible ill-usage.

39,436. Or you can have wilful desertion continued for very many years. That must certainly be held to break the vow?—I have never come across that case, so I do not feel I can pronounce upon it. I can imagine the possibility of other things really destroying the bond effectively, but I should be sorry to give my own opinion with an absence of practical experience.

39,437. You would consider that the declaration of Christ upon the subject was really confined to fornication. That is your reading of the scripture?—I have no warrant to go further.

39,438. And having in view the fact that a great deal of Christ's moral teaching was based upon general principle rather than specific cases, would you have expected Him—if I may put it so—to go into greater detail; and are we justified in assuming that because He did not go into further detail, therefore it is absolutely confined to the condition of fornication, when we know in real life there are other hardships almost as great under the marriage bond as fornication?—I think I see some difference between fornication and other things in breaking the bond; but in the absence of experience——

39,439. May I put a general question, whether your reading of Christ's teachings on these moral questions does show that He lays down general principles rather than specific cases; is that your reading of the scripture?—I think we must look for general principles rather than special cases.

39,440. (The Archbishop of York.) How far would you say, Dr. Barnes, in this particular matter, that there was anything more than a mere general principle? The general principle is stated in the words, with all the comment on them, that "These, whom God hath joined together, let not man put asunder"; and then in addition to that there is made a specific and definite provision about marriage, which is a definite act and not a mere moral attitude. How far would you say that in this matter our Lord was going—however little—beyond the usual practice of merely stating a general ethical principle?—I am not quite sure that I grasp your Grace's question, but one exception of course our Lord was bound to go into, because the school of Shammai among the Jews asserted it so definitely. They had the qualification, "Except it be so that he hath found in her uncleanness"—that is fornication of some kind.

39,441. That was not really quite what I meant. What I meant to ask was this, whether you think there is any distinction between our Lord's words about marriage and any of these general moral principles which He has laid down—for instance, in the rest of the Sermon on the Mount?—No. I think they are all of the nature rather of ideals than of positive laws.

39,442. If your view is right, that our Lord himself introduced this specific exception in what He said about marriage, would that, in your judgment, make it more—rather than less—difficult to suppose that He admitted other exceptions?—I think it would make it on the whole less difficult to believe that He would have allowed other exceptions; but He does not mention them, I should say, because such exceptions would be rarer, and in any case, not such good exceptions. Fornication is such a very clear thing; it either has been committed or not, whereas cruelty is a case of degree; and even desertion, with regard to time, is a case of degree.

39,443. But, surely, may it not be said that if an exception is so very obvious there was no good in making it?—The Sermon on the Mount I should take rather to be a discussion in which there were other people speaking as well as our Lord; and I imagine that directly our Lord laid down the principle that whosoever dismissed his wife was guilty of adultery, some person present must needs say, "What of the case of fornication?" and then I imagine our Lord would say, "Yes, except in the case of fornication."

39,444. That is purely a hypothetical account of the Sermon on the Mount, is it not?—Well, I suppose I am following good authority. Few people imagine that the Sermon on the Mount is a verbatim report.

39,445. But it is a hypothetical account?—A hypothetical account, yes, your Grace.

39,446. But if our Lord were laying down a quite general principle, and if He did in doing that state one general exception, it would be more natural to regard Him as limiting it to that rather than illustrating other possible exceptions?—It really might be taken, I imagine, either way.

39,447. You do not wish to express an opinion about that?—I have no formed opinion on it.

39,448. I should only like to ask you one other question, Dr. Barnes. You say in your last point that "Unless the Church renounces Christ's ideal it cannot bless the marriage of any divorced person except that of the innocent partner in the case of divorce for fornication." After what you have said does that still remain your opinion?—Well, if any case were put to me which plainly proved to be an ipso facto breaking of the bond just as much as fornicction, then I supposa I should have to add that to my exception here.

39,449. May I ask whether you have really given the question of the possible extension of the grounds of divorce the same thought and care which you have given to the critical question of the authority of our Lord's words in the New Testament?—No, I have not.

39,450. So that your qualification of this last point in your proof would be based on impressions you have received to-day rather than from careful thought beforehand?—Certainly. I am quite willing to acknowledge that.

39,451. Then it would be scarcely fair to press you further on that point.

39,452. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) There is really only one point I want to ask you about. Referring to paragraph E of your memorandum, you said "Those whom God hath made one are not to be put asunder by man," and you say, "The reference to putting asunder is to the action of the husband"?—Yes.

39,453. And I understand you to give as a reason for that that no court came into the matter in the case of a Jewish divorce, but the husband did it without any court?—The husband could do it without any court.

39,454. We had a great Jewish expert before us on Monday, I think it was, and he told us that that really was not so, that the husband could do it without a court if they both agreed, but that if they did not agree, and "the wife contested the divorce, it is highly probable the husband had to specify his reason, and bring the matter before a regularly constituted Beth Din," and I think I gathered that a Beth Din was a court consisting of three judges. Would that modify your view at all?—He only says "It is highly probable."

39,455. Well, suppose that high probability was well founded, would that modify your view at all—your view I mean that you are right in construing the marriage being put aside by man as necessarily and exclusively meaning the husband?—I think it does really mean the husband

39,456. But, supposing Mr. Abrahams' view which he describes as highly probable is well founded, that it did require a Court unless the parties agreed; would that make any difference to your view as to the meaning of our Lord's words that man was not to put asunder those whom God had joined together?—I should still think that the chief reference was to the husband, because so much in any case is left to the husband in Jewish law; what Mr. Abrahams says, rather in my belief describes what was gradually evolved after this time than what was in force at this time.

39,457. He gives it as his view of what went on at the time. But that is your answer; you still think that applies to the husband only?—Yes.

39,458. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) In the marriage service, when the parties take each other for better or for worse, does the Church place no limitation on the word "worse"? Does the party who marries take the other party for worse under all conditions and circumstances, or must there be some limitation?—There must be the limitation of fornication.

39,459. And may not there be other limitations too? For instance, supposing a man a few days after his marriage commits a murderous assault on the wife; the wife did not take the husband for worse agreeing to submit to such a condition as that?—Forgive me, I am a little inclined to say that "hard cases make bad law" in answer to that suggestion.

(Chairman.) I think, Dr. Barnes, that is all we require to ask. Thank you very much for the trouble you have taken in coming here.

Adjourned.

FORTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Tuesday, November 29th, 1910.

PRESENT:

HIS GRACE THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK (in the Chair).

The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir WILLIAM ANSON, Bart., M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.
The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES, Secretary.
J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY, Esq., Assistant Secretary.

Mr. ROBERT LESLIE BLACKBURN, K.C., called and examined.

39,460. (The Archbishop of York.) You are a King's Counsel?—Yes, of the Scotch Bar.

39,461. You are Chancellor to the Primus of the Episcopal Church in Scotland?—Yes, and I am here by his request and the request of the bishops.

39,462. Perhaps it will be convenient if you will just go through the points on the proof which you have submitted?—I am here because of some questions which your Grace put to Lord Salvesen when he was in the box. In consequence of answers Lord Salvesen gave an idea was suggested that the views of the Scotch Episcopal Church in reference to this question of divorce were somewhat different from the views held by the Church of England on the same subject. I am here to say that the attitude of the Scotch Episcopal Church in this matter is the same as the attitude of the Church of England, and that the Scotch Episcopal Church adopted the resolutions on the subject of divorce of the Lambeth Conference both in 1888 and 1908. I may add that I have Lord Salvesen's authority to say that in giving the answers he gave he did not profess to be speaking on behalf of the Episcopal Church of Scotland; all he intended to say was, so far as he was aware, not being a member of that Church, that the Episcopal Church in Scotland had never publicly protested against desertion being regarded as a legitimate ground of divorce, and that it was within his knowledge that Episcopalians had from time to time taken advantage of the Scotch Act on divorce in order to put an end to the marriage tie. The matter is probably best expressed by a letter which the Primus addressed to your Grace on the 25th May last.

39,463. That is the letter which is put in the appendix to your proof, appendix 1?—Yes.

39,464. Will you kindly read it?—The Primus wrote, "I am writing on behalf of my brother bishops "and myself to say that we understand that a state- "ment has been made before the Royal Commission "on Divorce to the effect that the Episcopal Church "in Scotland recognises divorce on the ground of "desertion. I need hardly point out to your Grace "that this is not the case, and I have only to mention "as proof that our bishops accepted, both in 1888 "and 1908, the terms of the Lambeth Conference "resolution on the subject, viz.:—

> 'That inasmuch as our Lord's words expressly forbid divorce, except in case of fornication or adultery, the Christian Church cannot recognise divorce in any other than the excepted case.' (Resolution 39, page 55 of Report.)

"It may be true that certain members of our "Church have applied for divorce on the ground of "desertion. But the action of individuals who happen "to be nominal members of a church of course in no "way involves that church in responsibility for their "conduct. I can with confidence add to what I have "already said that in this matter our clergy generally "and the faithful laity are at one with the bishops in "repudiating the ecclesiastical lawfulness of divorce in "the case of desertion. We should be very grateful "to your Grace if you would kindly find an opportunity "of reading this letter to the Commission, or of letting "its contents be known in any way you may judge best, "in case a wrong impression may have been created by "the statement which is reported to have been made."

39,465. Perhaps you would return to your proof. On the first page you have dealt with the point of the acceptance of these resolutions of the Lambeth Conference. Perhaps you would begin the proof at the bottom of the first page?—With reference to the statement in the Primus's letter that he has the support of the clergy and the faithful laity generally, I may refer to what has happened in connection with the Code of Canons of the Scottish Episcopal Church. The laws of the Scottish Episcopal Church are embodied in a Code of Canons which has from time to time been added to and extended. In the stormy days of the Episcopal Church of Scotland, when practically it was a very small body, the canons consisted of only four or five in number, directed generally to the management of the Church, and designed as far as possible to ensure the continuance of the Episcopal succession; but within recent years, the last 40 or 50 years, the canons have been from time to time extended, and although they have never up till recently included a canon dealing expressly with this question of divorce, there is no doubt that the canon which has recently been enacted by the Consultative Council of the Scotch Episcopal Church represents the attitude of the Episcopal Church in this matter. That Council recently passed a canon to this effect, that no clergyman shall perform the marriage service for either of the two persons between whom divorce has been pronounced during the lifetime of the other party That canon was passed after mature consideration by a council which may be said to thoroughly represent the Church, consisting of all the Bishops, 38 representative clergymen, and 38 representative laymen. I may say that that canon was adopted practically unanimously, though a motion to except the innocent party in cases of adultery was proposed and only negatived by 31 votes to 18. There was some difference of opinion in the council as to whether or not the canon should go further and say what punishment should be inflicted by the Church, either on a clergyman who should perform the marriage service in contradiction of the canon I have read, or on parties who had offended against the Church views of marriage laws, but after mature consideration the council came to the conclusion it would be better to leave that matter as it stands without any express directions as to punishments to be inflicted. I may say from my own personal knowledge of the feeling of churchmen on the subject that that canon will represent the views of, anyhow, the faithful laity in the Scottish Episcopal Church. Perhaps I should point out this. I have already said up to now the Code of Canons has not contained the whole of the laws of the Church on matters of discipline and so forth; it has been added to from time to time, but there is no doubt, as far as I can gather from the bishops, and as far as my own experience goes, that has always been the attitude of the Episcopal Church of Scotland in the matter of divorce. They have never recognised divorce for desertion as being a ground justified by scripture for divorce.

39,466. I think you add on page 2 of your proof another opinion with regard to the attitude of the bishops in case of a divorce for adultery. Will you read that?—I know that the bishops have acted on the footing that even in the cases of divorce for adultery and the innocent person remarrying, the marriage should not be celebrated by the clergy of our Church. I know, personally, of a case within recent years of someone socially and otherwise in a high position, who was the innocent party in an action of divorce, and who subsequently wished to remarry; the Episcopal clergyman refused to celebrate the marriage, and it was ultimately celebrated in a Presbyterian Church. I am told by the bishops that there have been other instances of the same thing, and I have also been told by the bishops that one, at all events, has refused to allow a spouse, who had divorced the other spouse for desertion and then remarried, to attend a celebration of sacrament in the Episcopal Church. I know of no case of desertion having been recognised by the clergy of our Church as being one of the lawful grounds of divorce recognised by scripture.

39,467. I understand you do not wish to go into any of the other questions before the Commission, but merely to give evidence upon a particular point?—That is so. I am here representing the bishops, and I would rather not give my personal views about anything. Your Grace has had plenty of personal views before this Commission. I would rather be here as representing the bishops on this question and go no further.

39,468. I notice you said that the canon to which you have drawn attention was passed by the Consultative Council, but in your proof you say that it was recommended. What is the difference between the council recommending a canon and passing a canon?—The position with regard to that is this. The Consultative Council have been engaged for the last three years in revising the canons. We have completed our labours, or practically completed our labours, but the canons have to be approved by the Provincial Synod before they finally become law. You may take it the Consultative Council has approved the canon to this extent; it is practically adopted although formally it is not yet the law.

39,469. (Lord Guthrie.) You said that the canon had been enacted by the Consultative Council. That, as you have explained just now, is not strictly accurate?—That is so.

39,470. It goes to the Provincial Synod, which has an Upper House composed of seven bishops, and a Lower House of representative clergy?—That is so.

39,471. These representative clergy are not necessarily the same, and are never the same as the clergy who happened to be in the Consultative Council?—No, not necessarily. They are not the same just now, but they might happen to be the same.

39,472. The Consultative Council merely reports any proposed amendment which they think fit to the Provincial Synod, who may pass it or not, as they choose?—That is so.

39,473. In addition to that, if the Provincial Synod originate any proposed amendment, they must refer it to the Consultative Council for opinion?—I am not certain whether they have not power to pass an amendment without reference to the Consultative Council, but I think it must be referred back to the council for consideration and opinion before being passed.

39,474. The bishops themselves, when they meet alone, are called the Episcopal Synod as distinguished from the Provincial Synod?—Yes, when they meet as a synod they act as an Episcopal Synod.

39,475. The body which has judicial power is the Episcopal Synod; the body which has legislative power is the Provincial Synod acting along with the Consultative Council?—Yes.

39,476. You said that the attitude of the Scotch Church is the same as the attitude of the Church of England. Are you referring to its present position under its present canons, or its position under the proposed canons?—When I said Scotch Church I mean the Scotch Episcopal Church.

39,477. I mean that?—I think all of it. I know of no reason to suppose that at any time the Scottish Episcopal Church took up any different attitude on this question. When I say the Scottish Episcopal Church there, I mean after the date of the Revolution, that is to say, after 1688 or 1689, because I do not think that before that date, that is to say from the Reformation, 1560 onwards, the Episcopal Church had hived off as a separate body. The Church of Scotland at that time was a Protestant anti-Romish church, sometimes governed by an Episcopal form of government and sometimes by a Presbyterian form of government; when the Episcopalians were in power a certain number of the Presbyterians probably did not worship in the church, and when Presbytery had the upper hand a certain number of the Episcopalians refused to worship in the church. The church as a body was the same church, sometimes governed by Episcopalians and sometimes by Presbyterians, and I do not think it is possible to arrive at any definite conclusion as to what the views of that church at that time were on this question. At that time individuals had views; John Knox had a view one way much stronger than people take nowadays, and there are views expressed by Episcopalians and others in different directions. The only test as to the view of that church is to turn to the Confessions of Faith. The Confession of Faith first adopted, that was the Confession of the Church from 1560 down to 1647, was John Knox's confession, which recognised adultery as the only ground of divorce justified by the word of God. In 1647 the Westminster Confession was adopted, which recognised divorce for adultery and desertion. It has a very curious clause in it to the effect that where divorce has taken place on the ground of adultery the innocent spouse may be allowed to marry again during the lifetime of the guilty one, which to my mind leads to the direct innuendo that the guilty spouse in the case of adultery was not to be allowed to marry again; in the case of desertion it was not contemplated that either of the spouses should marry again under any circumstances.

39,478. Do I understand that your evidence is on the footing that the Church of Scotland between 1660 and 1690 was not a truly Episcopal church?—1560, the Reformation?

39,479. Is your evidence on the footing that the Church of Scotland established between 1660 and 1690 was not a truly Episcopal church?—That is the last period of Episcopacy.

39,480. Yes?—My evidence is this; the government was certainly Episcopal, but at that date the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches had not hived off from each other in the definite way in which they did subsequently. In 1660 you were getting nearer to it, but up to those later days I should say that it is impossible to take the views of the Church at any one time as being anything except the views of the Protestant anti-Romish Church at that time.

39,481. You are aware, I suppose, that the bishops were Episcopally ordained, that the Service-book was revised by Archbishop Laud, and the canons of that time were revised by Archbishop Laud and Bishop Juxon?—The government and the administration of the Church during that period were Episcopal.

39,482. The Episcopal Church in Scotland at the present moment does not repudiate the views which were held between 1660 and 1690 as no part of its history?—No, certainly not; I agree with that.

39,483. At that time are you aware how things stood?—Between 1660 and 1690? The confession which was adopted in 1647 was the Westminster Confession. I do not know how things stood at that period.

39,484. You are aware at that time the judges of the Divorce Court upon questions of adultery and desertion were appointed by the bishops?—I know that. The Commissioners were appointed by the bishops under the Act of 1609 or 1610, but that is purely a matter of administration.

39,485. Are you aware how the canons stood at that time? You have said that the canons never until recently dealt with divorce?—I do not know that there were any canons at that time. There were some passed in 1636 by the King, but they never had any authority other than the King's authority.

39,486. They were probably by certain of the Scotch bishops, revised by Archbishop Laud and Bishop Juxon, and imposed by the King?—It is so supposed. There is nothing very certain about it. Those canons deal more with administrative matters than matters of doctrine.

39,487. Do you know how they dealt with divorce?—I looked it up to see, and my recollection is that what they say about marriage and divorce is that divorce for adultery, or other causes, is not to be granted on the evidence of the spouses alone uncorroborated by anybody else, and secondly in the case of divorce a mensa et thoro, that is to say what we call a separation, the judges are to insert in the decree a warning to the parties that they are not at liberty to marry again.

39,488. That is to say just what you have in canon 107 of the canons of 1603 in England?—I will take your Lordship's word for it.

39,489. Those canons did deal with divorce?—Yes, but from a judicial point of view entirely and nothing else.

39,490. When the later canons were enacted, in 1707 and afterwards, was that repeated?—No.

39,491. How do you account for that?—I account for it by what I said. The canons of 1636 were enacted by the King and were not recognised by the Church as representing the views of the Church on the matter. You will find that laid down, I think, by writers, Grub and others.

39,492. Your view is that in regard to that canon they did represent the views of the Church?—I think that canon, in 1636, is merely a direction to the judges who pronounced the decree of divorce, first, not to do it on uncorroborated evidence, and, secondly, to be careful to put a warning into their decrees. It is only a direction to the judges and nobody else.

39,493. Do you think, or do you not think, that at that time the Scotch Episcopal Church established by law was against divorce either for adultery or for desertion?—I cannot say as to divorce for adultery; I cannot say as to divorce for desertion. I do not think there is any evidence to show that the Episcopalians had adopted either of those grounds. If you look at the general history of the thing, what the Episcopal party was striving at was to purify the old Church which existed before the Reformation as they did in England. The Presbyterians were striving to erect a new church altogether.

39,494. That is your view?—Yes. I will not put it that way about the Presbyterian Church if you object to that, but what the Episcopalians were striving for was to purify the old Church, and if that is so, I think you would require very positive evidence to show that on a question of doctrine so firmly held by the old Church, the Episcopalians had repudiated the views of the old Church.

39,495. Your view is that the Scotch Episcopal Church all along has held the view that no divorce should be allowed either for adultery or desertion?—I prefer to put it this way. They have always held the view that desertion is not one of the grounds justified by scripture.

39,496. And, further, that there should be no divorce for adultery?—I think it follows in the case of a Church. If a Church regards this as not authorised by scripture the Church cannot approve of it.

39,497. Your view is that the Scotch Episcopal Church always took that view?—Yes.

39,498. If that is so. You said that the attitude of the Scottish Church has always been the same as the Church of England?—I say it is now. They have adopted the Lambeth Resolutions. I do not know what the attitude of the Church of England was originally, or 100 years ago.

39,499. You propose now to forbid marriage by a clergyman between persons who have been divorced for either adultery or desertion?—Yes.

39,500. Is that the present attitude of the Church of England?—I have the Lambeth Conference Resolution here, if I may refer to it.

39,501. You have been good enough to quote it. The Primus has quoted it in the appendix: "That, "inasmuch as our Lord's words expressly forbid divorce, "except in case of fornication or adultery, the Christian "Church cannot recognise divorce in any other than the "excepted case." It follows that the Christian Church can recognise, in the view of the Lambeth Conference, divorce in the case of adultery. You propose that the Scotch Episcopal Church should not recognise divorce in the case of adultery. How do you reconcile that?—I do not think the inference is that. The Primus only quotes the first paragraph of the Lambeth Resolution The next paragraph is, "That under no circumstances "ought the guilty party, in the case of a divorce for "fornication or adultery, to be regarded, during the "lifetime of the innocent party, as a fit recipient of the "blessing of the Church on marriage." Then No. 3, "That, recognising the fact that there always has been "a difference of opinion in the Church on the question "whether our Lord meant to forbid marriage to the "innocent party in a divorce for adultery, the Con-"ference recommends that the clergy should not be "instructed to refuse the Sacraments or other privileges "of the Church to those who, under civil sanction, are "thus married." Then the next article is, "When an "innocent person has, by means of a court of law, "divorced a spouse for adultery, and desires to enter "into another contract of marriage, it is undesirable "that such a contract should receive the blessing of "the Church." I take that to mean that it is undesirable that the marriage should be celebrated in the Church, and that is the view that the Episcopalian Consultative Council take in recommending this canon.

39,502. The Scotch Episcopal Council forbid a clergyman to do it?—Yes.

39,503. Where do you find anything to forbid a clergyman to marry the innocent person, who has been divorced, to some third party?—I find it there, that it is undesirable that such a contract should receive the blessing of the Church.

39,504. That is not a prohibition?—No, but the clergy of the Church of England are in a different position as they are the State Church. In Scotland we are a dissenting body.

39,505. To an extent you propose to forbid the clergyman, and you go further than the Lambeth Conference?—I do not think we go further than the feeling of the Church of England, but of course they are a little tied by this, they are the State Church, and possibly within themselves they cannot go the length they would otherwise wish to.

39,506. I was not talking of the feeling of the Church of England, but the terms of the Lambeth Conference. You go further than they did and would make it prohibitive?—Yes.

39,507. You do not propose to recognise divorce in the case of adultery: the Church will not recognise that in any way whatever?—The Church will not re-marry the parties.

39,508. Will they recognise it? The Lambeth Conference says it is not to be recognised except in other cases, by which I should assume it was to be recognised in the case of adultery. In what respect does the Scotch Church propose to recognise divorce in the case of adultery?—In the case of the innocent party. We adopt the third clause of the Lambeth Conference, and they would not be refused admission to the sacraments and other privileges of the Church.

39,509. In the case of the innocent party?—Yes.

39,510. You do not propose to impose any penalty on the innocent party so far as communion is concerned?—That is so. That is a necessary sequitur of the resolution.

39,511. But to forbid any clergyman to marry the innocent party?—Yes.

39,512. You said you are here in consequence of what Lord Salvesen said. Is there any statement that he made to which you object? Will you kindly take the Notes? I have marked the two passages. Is there any statement he made which you do not think is accurate? The first is on page 260, Q. 6355: "(A.) I "have this comment to make, that although the Church "of Scotland, since the Reformation, has been at times "Episcopal—at all events, for 30 years was Episcopal" —that is the 28 years we have mentioned—"and for "the rest of the period has been Presbyterian, and "though the Presbyterians have split into numerous "sects, there has never been any section of the "Reformed Church of Scotland which has objected "to the remedy of divorce for desertion." Do you object to that?—I wrote to Lord Salvesen and he said he meant a public objection, objecting openly and publicly, and I agree with that. There has been no public endeavour to get the Act removed.

39,513. So far as you know the Scotch Episcopal Church has never taken any action to have the Scotch law either rescinded or modified?—No, I do not see how they could. It would be most undesirable for them to endeavour to do so just now, from the point of view of the Church.

39,514. Why?—Politically. I do not know what business they have to interfere with the matter as a Church.

39,515. Do you say the same about 1660 to 1690, when they were in power?—What I say about them is this: they were busy about far more important matters than the question of divorce. The trouble going on at the time was to get the power of the Church, the administration and the government of the Church, and the form of worship.

39,516. They were persecuting the Presbyterians just as the Presbyterians did when they got the chance with them. In anything associated with Presbytery, having absolutely the upper hand, why did they not rescind the Act?—The Act, as your Lordship knows, was passed for the express purpose of enabling the Earl of Argyle at the time to get his divorce. That is the view taken by Lord Fraser in his book. The divorce of the Earl of Argyle was the causa causans of the passing of that Act. He was a great power in the land, and, considering the political state of matters at that time, for any Church to set themselves in opposition to persons possessing the power possessed at that time by great nobles in Scotland would have been politically very unwise and foolish. Probably that had a great deal to do with it.

39,517. The person in whose interests that had been passed had been dead for 100 years. In 1661 the existing holder of the title of Marquis of Argyle had his head taken off and his son went into exile. How did the influence of the Argyle family, who were in exile at the time—one had his head taken off and the other was in exile—prevent the Scotch Episcopal Church between 1660 and 1690 agitating for the repeal of the Act?—What I said about the Earl of Argyle referred to the time the Act was passed.

39,518. I was talking of the other period?—You applied that to a later period. You have to take into consideration the political condition of matters at the time.

39,519. You think that accounts for it?—Yes.

39,520. Will you look at the other passage in Lord Salvesen's evidence on page 265, Q. 6478. His Grace put some questions to Lord Salvesen, and Q. 6480 is specially dealing with this. "You would not wish to "argue that the Episcopalian Church had expressly "given their sanction to desertion being a ground for "divorce?" Notice the answer; it is this: "No, "but I say since 1690 the Episcopalian Church has "always existed in Scotland as a separate body and "there never has been, that I know of, by the "Episcopalian Church any protest against our law of "divorce for desertion, and I know Episcopalians "constantly resort to it." Is there anything there you object to, either in the one statement or the other?—I agree, but in all the reports I have seen (I have not seen the authentic version) that "No, but" has been left out.

39,521. If it is left out you go on to two statements, "It has always existed in Scotland as a separate body "and there never has been, that I know of, by the "Episcopalian Church, any protest against our law of "divorce for desertion." That is accurate?—Quite accurate.

39,522. "And I know Episcopalians constantly resort to it." That is accurate?—Quite accurate. As explained in the Primus's letter, you cannot control the action of individuals.

39,523. So that Lord Salvesen's statement is accurate in point of fact?—Quite accurate. I agree, and I said, to begin with, his answer as reported, except in regard to what I have pointed out, was hardly a fair answer to the question, but there is nothing inaccurate in it. May I call attention to the question previously put to Lord Salvesen, which I have not seen before. It is Q. 6479: "But you admit from 1660 to "1690, which is only 30 years, Scotland was only "loosely Episcopalian?—(A.) As I said, I do not think "there was much difference in creed; the creed remained "the same, and even their ritual remained much the "same." That is what I was saying to which your Lordship took exception. No matter what party was in power during that 100 years, the Church as a body consisted very much of the same people, who sometimes worshipped under Presbytery and sometimes under Episcopalians.

39,524. Not between 1660 and 1690?—I agree the extreme people on each side never came in, but the great bulk of the people of Scotland just changed over from Presbytery to Episcopacy or vice versâ. Scotland is a big place. The Church just changed hands, and the bulk of the congregation changed with the party in power. The extreme people were always out. They went into exile or openly took up arms.

39,525. At that time there had not been, as there is now, English clergy filling many of the most important positions in the Scotch Episcopal Church? That was unknown in those days?—I should think English clergymen in those days who came to the Scotch Episcopalian Church must have been hard up for a job.

39,526. Do you know of any cases?—No. Down to 1780 the Episcopal Church consisted mainly of a few bishops and a few very small congregations in Aberdeenshire.

39,527. Is it the case now the influence of the English Church is strong in the Episcopal Church in Scotland, through the number of eminent persons from England who fill a high office?—I should not say any more than the influence of the Scotch Episcopal Church is felt in England in respect of the number of eminent people from Scotland who hold high office in the English Church.

39,528. Take the Primus? Will you explain it? We have no archbishops in the Scotch Episcopal Church, but one of the bishops is appointed by the bishops as a whole?—He is elected by brother bishops as Primus.

39,529. The present Primus is Bishop Robberds; his predecessor was Bishop Wilkinson, and his predecessor was Bishop Kelly; his predecessor was Bishop Jermyn, and one of the first Primuses was Bishop Eden. I will take it they are all eminent persons, and they have all been English?—What about Bishop Robberds? He is a direct descendant of the Forbes of Corse, in Aberdeenshire, John Forbes was a prominent Episcopalian prior to 1690. The Primus's name is John Walter Forbes Robberds. His father may have been English.

39,530. He was born in India. Excepting him have they not all been English?—Bishop Wilkinson was. He came to Scotland for his health, and a great addition he was. Who was the next before him?

39,531. Bishop Kelly, of Inverness?—That sounds Welsh, or Irish.

(The Archbishop of York.) I do not want to interrupt your exceedingly interesting historical discussions, but are we not getting into rather unnecessary detail? I quite see your point.

(Lord Guthrie.) Your Grace will know in point of fact whether I am right or not about Bishop Kelly.

(The Archbishop of York.) I could not tell you.

(Witness.) I am afraid I cannot tell you. The office of Primus has existed since 1731.

39,532. (Lady Frances Balfour.) I notice in your proof you say, "The laws of the Episcopal Church of Scotland." That is a slip for "in Scotland"?—Yes. The title of the Church in the canons is "The Episcopal Church in Scotland.

39,533. The Episcopal Church is not the National Church?—Quite so.

39,534. One of the dissenting bodies in Scotland?—Yes; it is the Episcopal Church in Scotland.

39,535. Can you tell us the number of the Scotch Episcopalians?—I think about 150,000.

39,536. One hundred and fifty thousand communicants?—Not communicants, they number about 5£,000. The figure I gave is the membership all told.

39,537. I just wanted to make the point clear. Sitting in England as this Commission is, there is such a heap of ignorance about Scotland it is necessary to point that out, that the Scotch Episcopalian Church is not the National Church?—No.

39,538. (The Archbishop of York.) I want to get one point clear. You do not wish to convey that the Lambeth Conference is a conference of the Church of England particularly?—No.

39,539. It is a conference containing representatives of all the churches in different parts of the world, but who are in union with the Church of England?—Yes.

39,540. It would, therefore, contain a large number of bishops from the American Episcopal Church?—I believe it did.

39,541. So that the resolutions of the Lambeth Conference are not binding upon any single Church which sends its representatives?—I agree; I ought to have made that plain.

39,542. Do they only represent the opinion of a large number of bishops, dealing with churches, who have their own special problems in different parts of the world?—Yes.

39,543. It would be scarcely accurate to quote the Lambeth Conference as officially expressing what you call the attitude of the Church of England?—I agree.

39,544. Some figures have been prepared for us, and will shortly be laid before us, I think, as regards the number of divorces in Scotland, from which it appears that in the case of those who were married according to the rites of the Episcopalian Church there is one divorce for every 101 marriages, which shows that they are most frequent amongst those married according to the rites of the Episcopalian Church. Can you give any explanation of those figures, since you are here?—One would always like to see the figures. Does that include people who have been married in the English Church?

39,545. The figures are one in 101 of those married according to the rites of the Episcopalian Church, one in 180 of those married according the rites of the Established Church, one in 199 of the Free U.P. and U.F. combined—that can hardly be accurate, because the U.P. and the U.F. are the same—one in 155 in other congregations. Can you offer any explanation?—I cannot. I would like very much to know whether the marriages in the Episcopalian Church include the marriages in the Church of England of people who have come to Scotland.

39,546. Would you also say that might be partly explained by the fact that a large proportion of the members even of the Episcopal Church in Scotland are of the wealthier society by whom divorce is more easily obtained?—Your Grace is working from a different point of view from what I was. That is one explanation. I had in my mind this, if that includes all the people who are married in England or in Ireland and come to reside in Scotland and acquire a Scotch domicile, you might be getting down to one of the very lowest classes in Scotland, and it might be explained in that way. I should require to see the figures.

39,547. I should be interested to know?—I am surprised to hear it is so.

39,548. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You were asked about the canons of 1636, and you spoke about them with reference to the word "divorce." Is "divorce" used in those canons in the sense of divorce a vinculo? Is it not divorce a mensa et thoro, equivalent to separation?—It is used in both senses.

39,549. In the canons in 1636?—Yes; the expression is "divorce for adultery" in one canon and "divorce a mensa et thoro" in the other.

39,550. You said they were like the English canons of 1604?—Lord Guthrie said that.

39,551. In those canons it would be wrong to assume divorce a vinculo was spoken of at all except in the sense of nullity; they only dealt with divorce a mensa et thoro?—I am pretty sure in 1636 one paragraph deals with divorce for adultery and the other deals with divorce a mensa et thoro.

39,552. Divorce a vinculo for adultery?—I should have said ex vinculis, I think that is the ordinary expression.

39,553. I am accustomed to say "a vinculo," but we will not quarrel about the expression?—What is your question?

39,554. You spoke of divorce on the ground of adultery in the canon. Do you mean divorce a vinculo on the ground of adultery, or ex vinculis if you prefer it, or divorce a mensa et thoro?—Divorce a vinculo for adultery.

(The Archbishop of York.) We are much obliged to you for coming to give evidence and completing the information which we have received from Scotland.

Rev. EDWARD STEVENSON GORDON SAVILE called and examined.

39,555. (The Archbishop of York.) You are the secretary of the Church of England Men's Society?—Yes.

39,556. Will you kindly explain to the Commission the nature and objects of the society you represent? It will be convenient if you read the first paragraph of your proof?—The Church of England Men's Society is a movement established 10 years ago under the Archbishops of Canterbury and York for uniting churchmen on the basis of prayer and personal service. The society does not look for numbers, but only regards the earnestness of those who desire to be members, and it may now be looked upon as representing some of the most active and intelligent amongst the churchmen of all classes. In spite of thus limiting its numerical growth the movement now contains 100,000 churchmen. It has spread from the Church of England to the Church of Scotland and the Church of Ireland.

39,557. You mean the Episcopal Church in Scotland?—Yes. It has been adopted by the churchmen of Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, India, and the British West Indies. Many branches have also been established in the Army and the Merchant Service. Thus the movement represents the opinion of a large body of churchmen. But in regard to the issue before the Royal Commission the opinion of the members in England has alone been sought. A very large percentage, probably over 70 per cent., of the membership in England consists of what are popularly termed "working men," and my council believes that this evidence will be particularly valued by the Commission.

39,558. Am I right in supposing the evidence you wish to offer is a record of resolutions which have been sent to you?—Entirely. I am only here as the mouthpiece of others who have sent in resolutions.

39,559. Will you kindly explain shortly the method by which these petitions have been received?—The council of the Men's Society was approached by a great many of its branches and members asking them to take some action in regard to bringing the feeling of churchmen before the Commission, and after a long discussion it was decided that the best way of bringing any evidence would be for the members themselves to be able to send up to the council what were their own opinions and decisions, rather than that the council sitting in London, consisting of some 70 or 80 members, should speak in the name of the whole society. This decision was made known to the branches. No pressure was brought to bear. They were simply told that the council would be ready to collect, analyse, and submit any evidence that was volunteered, and so in what I am going to bring before the Commission I hope you will bear in mind that it is entirely voluntary evidence by men who feel strongly, who have taken the trouble to discuss the whole question and then forward the resolutions which they have passed. This evidence is extraordinarily unanimous. There are 317 branches which have sent signed and unsigned petitions against any extension of the facilities or grounds for divorce. When I speak of "a branch" it mostly represents a parish; in nearly every case a branch of the Men's Society is co-terminous with a parish. There are a few exceptions that I desire to bring before the Commission in a few minutes. We also have as a second step what are called federations, which is the grouping of branches in a particular area into a federation. Twenty-six federations have sent in these petitions against any extension of the facilities or grounds of divorce. The aggregate of the full number of men signing these petitions is 15,028. A very large number of branches, while protesting against any extension of the facilities or grounds, have also advocated the repeal of the Divorce Act, and have added this to their resolution. The number that has done this is 412 branches and 28 federations, making altogether about 17,450 members who have protested not only against the extension of facilities and grounds of divorce, but also appealed for the repeal of the Divorce Act. The signed petitions from branches, that is where they have asked all the members who desire to append their names, are 442, and the unsigned petitions 290. The number of signed petitions from federations is 13, and the unsigned petitions 41, making 786 petitions, signed and unsigned, which have been sent in. If we count up the number of branches represented by those groups or federations, we find that 732 were received direct from branches, and that the grouping of branches represented 555, totalling 1,287 altogether; 1,287 parishes have sent in petitions upon this question. The signed petitions, where we have been able to count each man's name—and when I say that I may mention that our membership only touches those who are over 18, nobody under the age of 18 is allowed to join the society—number 10,485 names. When we come to the groups, however, they are more difficult to deal with. We find 13 of them are signed, but on quite a different footing. Six of them have evidently been sent round to all the branches within the group, four of them have been signed by the committee in the name of the whole federation, and three of them have been signed apparently at some central meeting where they all met to discuss. That makes 667 signatures, so that the total number of signatures which we have received and which I have the honour to present, is 11,352. Then we have to count in a number of petitions sent in not signed. All the branches did not actually append signatures, but passed a resolution in the name of the branch. Upon the figures that we have at the office, there are on an average 25 members in each branch, and that would mean that the unsigned petitions from branches represent about 7,250. The unsigned petitions from federations would be 13,953, or if we think some of the branches within the federations have already sent in signatures, that would make 10,465, making a total of 17,715. The total number of members who have signed their names is 11,352, and the ones who have sent in unsigned petitions represent 17,715, making a total of 29,067. Then there are a few particular petitions which have been sent in which I should like to bring before the Commission, because they deal with various points outside the extension of facilities and grounds of divorce, and the repeal of the Divorce Act. I said in the preamble that we only appealed to our English branches, but we have a petition from a Scotch branch at Aberdeen. I thought it might interest the Commission to know that another petition was sent in by the undergraduates of Selwyn College, Cambridge; also one was sent in from Kirkmichael, in the Isle of Man, protesting against all proposals for making divorce easier. Although no special appeal was made to our soldier members it will be interesting to know that petitions to the same effect have been received from branches at Dover, Portsmouth, Bordon Camp, Alderney, Aldershot, Chatham, Gibraltar, and Northern India. They are all to the same effect. One branch makes a special point; it is St. Mary's, Hulme, Manchester. It is a point that is interesting, viz., that the action was unbiassed and was due to the lay members and not to the clergy. That holds good over a very large number of these petitions, and from what I have seen of various branches it is the layman's opinion you have before you. The membership is certainly about 20 laymen to one clergyman in our movement, so that the number of clergy is not very large. There are three which have come from abroad, although I do not know whether you accept them. It is rather touching to get one from Taltal in Chile, and they write to this effect: "Although far from its native land, we take the "keenest interest in the welfare of the old mother "country, and deeply deplore the suggested increased "facilities for divorce, feeling on the contrary that the "existing facilities should be diminished." There is another from Rawal Pindi in North India. Some branches have added something to the effect of the Church having its own discipline outside of the actual legislation of the State, and a branch in Paddington passed this resolution: "That this meeting . . . . "expresses the hope that any fresh legislation on the "subject will, in the same interests, impose some "punishment and disability of re-marriage on the "guilty party to a divorce, and will, in justice to the "Church, give her liberty as regards the refusing the "re-marriage of divorced parties in church and their "admission to the privileges of Church membership." Another is from Stoke Newington: "That any mar-"riage which receives the blessing of the Church "should be legally exempt from the operation of the "divorce law." I have a few here dealing with some other extraneous points; one from Wooburn: "The "branch feels that one way of guarding against the "cases of unhappy marriages which not infrequently "occur would be found in legislation which shall "prevent the contraction of undesirable and improvi-"dent marriages." Here is one from Ingatestone: "That marriage should not be refused to the innocent "party; that facilities be not granted for divorce in "county courts or any of the local courts." The branch of St. Mark's, Reading, is in favour of separation only. Woolston, near Southampton, "Dis-"tinctly advocates the extension of facilities in the "administration of the law of the land so as to treat "equally all, whether rich or poor, who do not submit "themselves to the guidance of the Church." All Saints', Northampton, says: "That in the opinion of "this branch if any increased facilities are given for "divorce it should only be in the direction of enabling "the poor to obtain divorce with an expense in the "same proportion to their income as for the rich; and "in allowing divorce from a marriage partner for "habitual criminality, habitual intemperance, or for "insanity. They would at the same time point out "that they do not wish to alter the Church's hands "in this matter." From Dorchester there is this resolution: "That this meeting regrets that there "should be one divorce law for the husband and "another for the wife." From Liscard, Cheshire: "That the members of this branch deprecate the "extension of facilities for obtaining divorce, and in "particular the extension of jurisdiction to county "court judges." From St. Chrysostom's, Manchester: "Believing that judicial separation should be main-"tained in the interests of the general morality of the

" nation; they further record their opinion that the " methods of granting the same stand in need of " amendment, especially on the following points:— " (a) an equal standard of purity for both sexes; " (b) payment through court or official, instead of " direct, as at present; (c) the compulsory suppression " in the public Press of details of cases liable to " corrupt the youth of the nation, the publication " of names only being necessary as a deterrent." From Heanor, in Derbyshire: "In view of (1) the " attacks which are being made on marriage as an " institution, (2) the fact that the possibility of divorce " tends to adultery and connivance, and enlarges the " peril of race-sterility; (3) the lowering of the whole " idea of marriage and of family life, brought about " by the operation of the present divorce laws; and, " above all, (4) the teaching of our Lord as set forth " in the Scriptures, and of the Church of our land " as set forth in the Prayer Book, we are convinced " that the maintenance of the principle of the indis- " solubility of marriage is essential to true family " life and to the highest interests of the State; and " we therefore urge the recognition of the principle " of the indissolubility of the marriage tie, and the " repeal of the present divorce laws." There are just two other points I should be glad of the opportunity of bringing forward. The first is that several branches mention a distinction under the present law between poor and rich, and the branch at St. Nicholas, Plumstead, sends in this resolution: "That if further " facilities for divorce should be granted by the State, " it would insist on equal rights for poor and rich, " for women and men, and on the evidence, but not " the names, being suppressed in the public Press." The other is from Pembroke Dock: "Rather than " make divorce easier for the poor man it is strongly " in favour of making it harder for the rich man." And lastly, a point which I believe the Commission will be glad to have evidence upon, is the opinion of those who state that they definitely represent the working classes. We have resolutions here from the Holy Trinity, Gray's Inn Road, Branch: "That in " the opinion of this meeting no further facilities in " the way of divorce are either generally desired or " needed by the working classes of this country." Then from Guisborough, in Yorkshire: "It is not " desired by the great mass of the working classes." St. Paul's, Worcester: "That the statements now being " circulated to the effect that such extension is desired " by the majority of the working class population is " not in accordance with the facts of the case." From Derby: "That we, as a body of working men, know " of no desire for such further facilities among the " members of our class, for whom these facilities are " specially asked." From Bristol: "The members of " this branch of the C.E.M.S. consider there is no " real demand on the part of the working classes, " as a whole, for increased facilities for divorce, and, " further, that we should deplore the granting of any, " as it would tend to weaken the sacredness of the " marriage bond, and is in direct antagonism to the " teaching of Christ." From Horbury, in Yorkshire: " In view of certain statements made by witnesses " before the Divorce Commission, we, as members of " a working-class parish, desire emphatically to deny " that the working classes as a whole do not care " whether people living together are married or not, " or that they desire increased facilities for divorce, " and we record our emphatic opinion that the publica- " tion of details of divorce cases is injurious to morals." From Norwich: "We are against the proposal now " being made for the extension of the grounds of, and " facilities for, dissolving the marriage tie, especially " having regard to the great moral danger to which " divorced women belonging to the working classes " will be exposed." From Bolton, Lancashire: "Expresses the opinion that the working men of the " Church of England have no desire whatever for any " loosening of the marriage tie." From South Leigh, in Oxfordshire: "Protest against any increase of the " facilities and grounds for divorce, considering that " such increase would endanger the sanctity of the " marriage tie, and is not generally desired by the " working classes." From Lilleshall, in Salop: "We " further wish to state that we believe that there is " no widespread demand for such an extension among " the poorer classes, and do not think that these classes " would avail themselves of the extension even if " granted." From Bristol: "There is no real demand " on the part of the working classes as a whole for in- " creased facilities," and, lastly, from Stepney, in East London: "That we members of the Church of England " Men's Society of St. Dunstan's and St. Faith's, Stepney, " living and working in the East End of London, feel " that there is no desire among those among whom we " live for the extension of facilities for divorce, and " that the only real remedy for the present state of " affairs is the repeal of the Act of 1857." That is shortly the evidence which I have here ready to present.

39,560. I understand your object in coming here is not to express your own opinion upon any of the matters before us, but simply to lay these petitions and resolutions before the Commission?—That is so.

39,561. You do not wish to be asked any questions on the merits of the various proposals which have been made before us?—No, because I could not answer for them. I simply give the evidence they have given me.

39,562. May I ask whether the resolutions and petitions you have presented include any that have been also possibly sent to our Secretary?—I do not remember any case in which they have told us that.

39,563. In all probability would they send to the Secretary without sending to you?—I am afraid I do not know.

39,564. Would you describe most of those who have either sent in resolutions or petitions as for the most part belonging to what we call the more respectable and intelligent working class?—I think so, certainly. The obligations which are laid upon them rather sift men, and only the best would join a movement like this.

39,565. You have, I think, put some resolutions before us in certain details taking a different line from the majority. Have you laid them before us in order that we may see that the matter has been fairly discussed by the different branches and accord with their opinions quite frankly?—Yes.

39,566. (Lord Guthrie.) Who are admissible to the society?—Only members of the Church of England who declare themselves as such; those who are communicants become full members: those who profess themselves members and are ready to take the obligation of daily prayer and readiness to work for their Church but are not yet communicants are accepted as associates, as a stepping-stone to full membership. The proportion is only 5 per cent. of associates to 95 per cent. of communicants.

39,567. You told us there were 11,252 signatures altogether. Have you at your hand the number of those who desire the repeal of the Divorce Act? You gave the number of the whole taking signed and unsigned at 17,000 odd who want repeal of the Divorce Act. Could you give the number of those who signed? You may not have it, perhaps: you can hand it in later on. Have you the copy of the letter that was sent to the branches asking them to consider the matter and express their opinion?—Yes.

39,569. Was the same sent to all?—Yes.

39,570. (The Archbishop of York.) Will you read it?—Read the resolution the council passed?

(The Archbishop of York.) Is that what Lord Guthrie means?

39,571. (Lord Guthrie.) Was that sent to each branch?—Yes.

39,572. With an accompanying letter?—It is included in the letter.

39,573. Will you read a copy of the whole letter?—Yes. "That the secretaries be instructed to com- " municate with the branches and give them the " opportunity to forward resolutions of protest against " the extension of the facilities and of the grounds of " divorce, in order that the secretaries may com- " municate with the Royal Commission and ask to " be allowed to give evidence before it." That was further elaborated later in another letter in which it was said that the council was willing to accept any other resolutions that they liked to add besides the one dealing with the extension of facilities and grounds of divorce.

39,574. (The Archbishop of York.) Was the object of that to give branches liberty to send any resolutions they liked?—Yes. When this resolution was first passed my council were under the idea that this Commission would not receive evidence about the repeal of the Divorce Act, but it was just about that time that the Mothers' Union gave evidence, and it became public that they were ready to receive evidence about the repeal of the Divorce Act, and we in a further letter said we would accept other points, besides the extension of facilities, which the branches liked to make.

39,575. (Lord Guthrie.) In both cases what was said was that they could send in resolutions of protest?—They could send in resolutions of protest.

39,576. No opportunity was given to send in anything but resolutions of protest?—I think we should have accepted them. I should have brought them.

39,577. You put in the letters?—Yes.

39,578. (Mrs. Tennant.) You have not the letter to the branches?—Yes, I have it in my hand.

39,579. (The Archbishop of York.) Will you read it?—I will only deal with that part of it which touches on this matter.

39,580. (Mrs. Tennant.) It is the terms of the invitation we want?—The letter deals with many subjects, and I will read the part that deals with this point: "In "accordance with the powers given in the byelaws, "the chairman then brought the question of divorce "before the Council. He stated that a number of "resolutions and letters upon the subject had been "received by himself and at headquarters, but that as "he was himself a member of the Commission it would "be fitting that he should leave the Council free to "discuss the matter. The Chaplain-General was then "voted to the chair, and after a considerable discussion "the following resolution was passed:—'That the "'secretaries be instructed to communicate with the "'branches and give them the opportunity to forward "'resolutions of protest against the extension of the "'facilities and of the grounds of divorce, in order "'that the secretaries may communicate with the "'Royal Commission and ask to be allowed to give "'evidence before it.' The Council also decided that "such protests should be signed by those members "who passed these resolutions. Those branches that "have already sent in resolutions are therefore asked "to forward their petitions over the signatures of "their members. We feel that there will be branches "that would wish to go beyond the wording of this "resolution, but we would remind them that in order "that the protest should come within the terms of "reference given to the Royal Commission and be "admissible as evidence before it, branches should "confine themselves to a protest dealing with the "extension of the facilities for and of the grounds "of divorce. We have been in communication with "the secretary of the Commission, and he has "courteously answered that he will bring the request "before the Commissioners." That is all that deals with it there. Then it was found that further evidence would be admissible, so in August this further paragraph deals with the same subject: "A large number "of resolutions regarding divorce have been received "by us. All these are being filed and analysed, so "that the evidence may be presented before the "Royal Commission. We notice that many branches "only state that the resolution forwarded was passed at "a meeting, and no record is furnished of the number "who voted. We would remind hon. secretaries that "the Council has suggested that the resolutions should "be signed by the members so that there may be "definite records to submit. As the Royal Commission will not sit again until October we would ask "such branches to collect the names of those who "desire to express their opinion between now and "then, so that they may be added to the resolution "already sent in. The Council decided not to stereotype any one form of protest, though they suggested "that all branches which sent resolutions should, for "the sake of uniformity, make their protest against "the extension of facilities and grounds of divorce. "Many branches have added further resolutions advocating the repeal of the 1857 Act, &c., and of all of "them a strict record is being kept for presentation "to the Commission."

39,581. The Norwich resolution speaks of the moral danger that divorced women belonging to the working classes would be exposed to. I am not sure whether I have it accurately. Is that your recollection? This was a meeting of men?—Yes.

39,582. Do you know if they took counsel with their wives or with any representative women?—They have not been asked to,

39,583. Before putting this forward?—I have nothing except the protest which has been sent in. The wording is "especially having regard to the great "moral danger to which divorced women belonging to "the working classes will be exposed."

39,584. As you do not know whether they took such counsel you would not know whether they considered the moral danger to which women are exposed who have been separated from their husbands?—I imagine it would come out in the discussion.

39,585. But they do not state it?—No.

39,586. We have had a good deal of evidence on that point before the Commission?—Yes.

39,587. (Lady Frances Balfour.) His Grace drew your attention to the sentence in which you said: "It "has spread from the Church of England to the Church "of Scotland and the Church of Ireland." Were you under the impression that the Episcopal Church was the established Church of Scotland?—No.

39,588. It was not an inaccuracy?—No.

39,589. I understand the whole of these directions were entirely upon the lines of a protest. It would not be consistent with the expression you used once: if they wished to send up resolutions for further extension they could hardly have done so under the direction that they were to protest?—I think the feeling was they were free to discuss the whole subject and send resolutions, which would be brought before the Commission.

39,590. How could they be free if they were directed throughout to send up protests? That is not a free word at all. The whole direction of everything was to sign protests?—Yes.

39,591. Could they, under that, sign a protest against the inequality of the laws between men and women at this moment?—Yes.

39,592. Could they have protested that they wanted further extensions?—Yes; we intended to present what they sent.

39,593. The expression used was they should submit themselves to the direction of the Church?—When was that expression used?

39,594. That is not in the letter, but in one of the petitions sent up?—It is only an individual expression from one branch.

39,595–6. The whole direction was that they should protest?—Yes. We were approached by so many asking that we should collect the evidence which was all in the form of protest and submit it to this Commission that we said we would.

(Lady Frances Balfour.) It would seem to have been of greater value if there had been a free discussion without the word "protest" used at all.

39,597. (Sir William Anson.) Are the 100,000 churchmen which you say the movement contains limited to England, or does that number comprise membership in the Episcopal Church of Scotland and Ireland?—Yes.

39,598. And the dominions beyond the seas?—The total number.

39,599. The numerical value of the protest must not be regarded as very great?—It is absolutely volunteered, that is the great value of it. It has not been engineered in any way, there has been no form sent out asking them to sign it. They have had to do it on their own initiative.

39,600. It was in response to an invitation to send protests?—Yes.

39,601. It could hardly be described as absolutely volunteered?—It was not necessary to answer the invitation, of course.

39,602. The invitation was to protest?—Yes.

39,603. Against any extension of the grounds of divorce?—Yes.

39,604. And it represents the men's view?—Entirely.

39,605. The question of the moral effects of separation orders was not under consideration?—It has been discussed by all these branches. None of these resolutions are passed until there has been a whole evening spent in discussion.

39,606. The protests are confined to the question of the extension or even the existence of divorce?—Yes, and these additions which I have read to you.

39,607. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Does this society represent any phase of opinion in the Church, high or low?—It is as inclusive as "the Church of England." We have all sorts, we make nothing of these divisions.

39,608. In the two circular letters which you have read the leading point is this: you do not ask for an opinion on the divorce laws, but seek rather to collect opinion on one side of it, that is to say the evidence of those who protest?—Yes.

39,609. That is quite clear. It is not an open invitation to express their opinion on the existing laws, but it is to collect and enumerate those who are on the side of protesting?—I think our branches quite understood that when they came together and discussed this subject, whatever conclusion they came to they could send up to us and we would bring it before the Commission.

39,610. Do you think that really comes out in both those circular letters, especially the second one?—I have had such an enormous amount of correspondence about it individually, outside of this, with branches, that I am sure I am right in saying all branches felt that if they came to a diametrically opposite opinion they would be able to send it, and it would have been brought forward.

39,611. The letters suggest what you are desirous of collecting are resolutions of protest?—Yes.

39,612. That expression is prominent in both of your letters, and that inference might be drawn from those documents?—Yes.

39,613. (Mr. Spender.) You are against the extension of facilities: do you mean that you would not extend the existing divorce laws without alterations to bring them within the reach of the poor by any changes in jurisdiction?—These last letters I read seem to bear that construction.

39,614. The law is to be left as it is, that is to say, confined to the High Court?—Yes; several of them have actually mentioned that.

39,615. You would not say that there was no minority against this opinion among the young men in the Church of England?—It has not been sent to us as evidence. May I make one slight alteration? We do not really represent young men. The average age of the members of this movement I should think was over 30. I said 18 was the limit going downwards, but the great bulk of men are from 25 to 60.

39,616. Your friends, I gather, are solid against any publication in the papers?—Those branches which have mentioned it have all said so, except the names; the names should be published, but not the accounts.

39,617. They do not see any objection to sealing up the Divorce Court?—I do not know. I simply present what I have.

39,618. (The Archbishop of York.) I would like to ask this, as clearing up the nature of your evidence. Did the council act on its own initiative in sending out the first letter, or under pressure from the branches themselves?—There was a great deal of pressure, both from the branches and individual members.

39,619. Would you describe, from your knowledge of the society and its ways of working, the letter as anything in the nature of a direction that persons should send up views of a particular kind?—My remembrance of what took place at the council is strongly that it was intended to be an invitation to branches that if they wished to pass resolutions instead of sending them individually, the council would collect them and present them.

39,620. From your knowledge of the nature of the branches in the federation would you say that any branches, who discussed the matter and came to a different opinion, would certainly have intimated that fact to the council?—I think so, certainly.

39,621. Would you say that these men are in any kind of way subject to clerical control or influence?—Subject, but by no means tyrannised over. The branches are very free; they do accept the leadership of their clergy, but the body of laymen within the branch hold their own opinions.

39,622. Do you find instances in which they assert their opinions freely apart from what the clergy may think?—Occasionally there are difficulties, the laymen expressing opinions so strongly that the clergy may take umbrage at it. The general rule we lay down in all things is that we hope this movement will bring about co-operation between clergy and laity, and it is doing so.

39,623. You said in answer to a question that the society is not confined to any single party in the Church; it represents all parties?—That is so.

(The Archbishop of York.) We are very much obliged to you for taking the trouble to collect this evidence and opinions and putting them before us.

Father Michael Kelly called and examined.

39,624. (The Archbishop of York.) In what part of London do your labours lie?—Hoxton Square, Shoreditch.

39,625. You are a parish priest?—Yes, and director of that mission.

39,626. You come here, if not at the request, certainly with the knowledge and approval of the Archbishop of Westminster?—He asked me to come and give evidence. I believe I am the oldest parish priest in London and the longest labourer in a place like it.

39,627. Is it his wish that you should represent the experience of practical working among the poor in the Roman Catholic congregation?—Yes.

39,628. Will you kindly read your proof?—I have a short statement here I should like to put before you.

39,629. Will you kindly read what you have amplifying the proof?—I have brought this short summary so that the Commission may clearly understand the position of Catholics. Matrimony is a sacrament by which the contract of marriage is blessed and sanctified. When a man and woman lawfully make an agreement for lifelong cohabitation we have marriage. If both parties are baptized we have Christian marriage: if one only is a member of the visible body of the Church and the other is baptized but not a member of that body, it is a mixed marriage. Christian marriage, when validly celebrated between qualified persons and consummated, makes a complete bond of matrimony, and they are two in one flesh (Mark x. 8). The unity of marriage means the rule by which polygamy in both senses of the word is forbidden to Christians. Married persons have mutual rights and duties, different entirely from those which bind the unmarried: (a) Marriage justifies cohabitation; (b) The spouses are bound to co-operate in the proper education and provision of food and necessaries for their offspring; (c) They have a special duty of mutual fidelity; (d) They must assist each other to lead Christian lives. The Catholic poor hold with a firm faith that consummated Christian marriage is indissoluble except by the death of one of the parties, and that no power of the State can render their marriage voidable. They consider any decree purporting to put an end to the matrimonial bond is absolutely valueless and not binding in conscience. In the exercise of my ministry for over 46 years I have baptized close upon 7,000 children. This speaks of an intimate and confidential touch with my people. I know them as only a priest can know them, and was trusted by them as only a priest is trusted. They came to me in real or fancied trouble. They told me in earnest words of sweated labour, exorbitant rent, uncertain employment, the curse of intemperance, the hurtful words and acts engendered by incompatibility of temper or other regrettable causes, and, however appalling or terrible their sufferings were, or exaggerated their notion of the outlook, in no single case was divorce mentioned as a remedy. With them the word "divorce" is a synonym for "adultery." I do not put that down offensively, but it is the word they make use of. The Catholic poor suffer severely and take angrily the law that compels them to pay the registrar for the publication of banns and his attendance at the ceremony. It is a grievance which causes the worst feelings against the law, and no species of reasoning can remove it. In my opinion the poor have a just cause of complaint. The fees without a certificate amount to 7*s.*, with a certificate to 9*s.* 7*d.* These for the very poor are an enormous tax. In preparation for the marriage deserving young people make a strenuous effort to save a small sum: the home, poor at its best, has to be furnished, extra clothing purchased, while to keep to a becoming custom a few friends are to be invited on the occasion. All this means expense, and at the same time he gets an independence worthy of encouragement. When the computation for outlay is made there stands out the mulct for the registrar. Can one be surprised to find at the moment feelings of anger and disappointment or a bitter lamentation that for performing a solemn act of religion they have to pay an odious fine? Too often, unfortunately, this relic of the penal days leads to an unwedded life and the consciousness of wrongdoing and unblessedness. I submit this legal ordinance is not only a hardship but fruitless and unnecessary. The civil registration, as with births and deaths, could otherwise be effectively secured. That an official of the State must be present, and the married couple be compelled to repeat an unnecessary form of words in his presence at a time so sacred and important to them, are undoubtedly, for the Catholic poor, causes for sore murmuring. They help to make a ridicule of religion, are a temptation to reject all by living together and thus lay the foundation of future misery and despair. Separation orders are not readily resorted to by our people. If frequently threatened, it is by way of reform rather than a desire to live apart. Their unhappy environment in a great measure accounts for these menaces. Naturally quick-tempered, they are easily touched and feel painfully the depression that comes from severe illness, home troubles and disappointments. If taken too seriously the separation that was applied for in an outburst of temper and had no radical meaning may become a permanent harm from bitter remorse and continual recrimination. Delay is a safe remedy. If accompanied with advice it soothes the unreasonable and obdurate, and restores the lost peace. Every effort should be made to prevent Separation. This questionable remedy for marital grievances means a loveless family and a broken home. separation leads to drunkenness, immorality, and other misfortunes of an outcast life. I deplore the pernicious freedom of the Press in publishing the details of divorce cases. These make unwholesome reading for all: for the young they are disastrous and dangerous in the extreme. If the reports of divorce cases may not be totally prohibited, at least they ought, in the interests of pure family and social life, to be confined to the names of the litigants and the decision of the Judge. Summary.—(1) That as the Catholic poor do not acknowledge any power in the State to nullify valid Christian marriages, they do not entertain the idea of greater facilities or of availing themselves of these so-called privileges. (2) That they regard the present marriage law as an abhorrent injustice, inasmuch as it is an impediment to the freedom of marriage, the solemnity of the ceremony, and an odious impost that leads to illicit cohabitation. (3) That separation be granted only when the counsels of the magistrate and priest have failed to reconcile the parties, and then temporarily, with the hope of the amendment of the guilty party. (4) That the publication by the Press of divorce proceedings be strictly prohibited, or, if decided to be necessary in the interests of justice, they be restricted to the names of the petitioner and respondent and the judgment of the court.

39,630. Do I gather that you make one definite suggestion as to the amendment of the marriage laws in regard to requiring the presence of the registrar at the marriage ceremony?—Yes, very strongly, because I cannot conceive that anyone would desire it if they knew the harm that comes of it from what I know.

39,631. Is the harm rather the fee which is charged than the presence of the official?—I would say both. The fees are enormous in the case of poor girls who are working for 5*s.* or 6*s.* a week. It is almost impossible for them to be able to spare that money, and when men and women put money together they find they must pay this. The priest often would be glad to pay for it, but there is a feeling that their fathers and mothers made an offering on some occasion, and they feel that they should do the same. We are forbidden by our Church to ask for anything on the occasion of the administration of the sacrament, but I have often paid these fees to have the marriage celebrated. These poor people feel that they are unable to make an offering as their parents did on a like occasion, and so to avoid the humiliation, they go elsewhere or live together unmarried. I think at that time it is a very important and solemn ceremony, and they feel when an official like the registrar, who is always very gentlemanly and polite, comes in that it is a desecration of what is a solemn and religious ceremony.

39,632. Do you not think the requiring of some fee, not a prohibitive fee, but a fee which represents a certain amount of forethought and self-sacrifice, may be a useful check against improvident and heedless marriages?—In some cases, but I do not see as a rule, from the way people regard it, that it can be other than a grievance. They scarcely ever have 2*s.* to spare; their life is a continual misery, hard labour, and poverty.

39,633. You said it was regarded as a relic of penal days?—Previously it was required by law that marriages should take place before the clergyman of the Church of England, and only these marriages were recognised. When exemption came, Nonconformists felt under the law that the registrar should go to their place of worship. Then followed another law brought in by the late Lord Russell, that the registrar need not go to the Church provided some other duties followed, and one was that the people should pay 4*s.* and the registrar would have a right to receive them. That was not taken advantage of by the Nonconformist bodies that I know of, for good or bad.

39,634. You are in favour of making all separation orders in the first instance temporary?—Yes. I think these people come in a passion and ask for a separation in court, and if the magistrate is hurried he gives it to them, and then later things are not so happy as they were before and they are sorry for it.

39,635. Is it your experience, after all these years, that in a great many instances those who have obtained separation orders from the magistrate become reconciled to one another?—I do not know a case where it has not taken place. We have very few cases of violated faith amongst our people. Most of these things arise from drunkenness, or the man has no work, or sweated work, or is not able to bring home anything, and he takes to drink and comes home without money, and there is a row with the wife and children. If he strikes her, which unfortunately he may do, or break the furniture, then she goes to the magistrate, and when he finds there is a separation order against him—the wife does not make use of it, but he does make use of it, and it causes the violence to continue. If the magistrates were to let it stand over for a week I think they would be reconciled if they would assent to the priest or clergyman or some friend helping them, and the result would be that the magistrate would hear no more of it.

39,636. You are in favour of recommending in all cases a postponement upon making the order?—Yes.

39,637. Would you go further and say if the order is made that it should in the first instance be only made for a time?—Yes, I would make it in that way for adultery or continual brutal behaviour of one party to the other. In an ordinary case I would not grant the order, but I would let it remain over for a week or a fortnight.

39,638. Do you find many of your people who do not resort either to separation or divorce?—I never heard divorce mentioned by one.

39,639. Do you find that in doing that they separate practically from one another?—No, not at all. There may be a case of a man who has some stain on his character, whose previous life has not been pure, and there is some trouble and he goes away. The people generally do not separate, as we understand the word, but there is a coolness of manner and habit for a time.

39,640. You are in favour of total prohibition of reports in the newspapers?—Certainly. I consider it the very worst reading people can possibly have. For one reason, they always draw an inference. They say, "If these things happen among better-class people why should we be blamed?" You will notice with these young girls who work in the morning poorly clad and fed, that each of them will find a halfpenny to read these proceedings, and I think they are very hurtful to them.

39,641. Do you think that a considerable number of the poor do read these things?—I think the majority of them do.

39,642. And that it does them harm?—Yes. They speak of it in the workroom, and they begin to think of things which would never have come their way otherwise. There is no possible good in them amongst the poor.

39,643. I think I am right in saying that you have worked in Hoxton for 46 years?—Over 46 years, and I may say that I have scarcely ever had a vacation or been out of the place. I am amongst them and know them well.

39,643*a*. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I do not understand what the grievance is about the registrar?—It is a grievance that some should pay for the marriage.

39,644. Is it that the fees are too high?—I do not see why the State should step in and be present at that ceremony when it can be obviated.

39,645. You realise that it is important that the State should see that the people are validly married?—Quite so.

39,646. What security has the State that that is done unless some public official is either present or engaged in the matter?—What is there to prevent an authorised priest from giving the certificate?

39,647. You have mentioned and are no doubt aware of the Act of 1898, which contemplated that being done. Are you an authorised officer under that Act?—No. Our bishops have never availed themselves of it.

39,648. If they had, your grievance would have been met?—Very little. I do not see that it would make any difference to us.

39,649. If you avail yourselves of the Act of 1898 the priests would become authorised officers, over whom the Government would have some hold, and if you did that the marriages would be celebrated without the attendance of any official?—I object to the fee being paid for that purpose.

39,650. Keep the fee separate. If your Church consented to the priests being authorised officers for that purpose under the Act of 1898, your grievance, so far as the attendance of the registrar was concerned, would be met?—Yes.

39,651. You object to that extra fee of 4*s*.?—Yes.

39,652. That was a compensation that was supposed to be due to the registrars for the loss which they would have by the ministers of the different religions being substituted for them as authorised officers?—Yes.

39,653. Are you aware that that enactment of 4*s*. on each marriage came to an end two years ago? It was only in operation for 10 years?—I am aware of it. The reason I make the point is because of what has happened amongst our people.

39,654. But there is no fee of 4*s*. payable now?—I do not know what the change is.

39,655. It was only put on for 10 years, from 1898, and we are now in 1910, so that it must have come to an end?—There was another grievance attached to that.

39,656. That has come to an end, has it not?—I believe it was to be for 10 years.

39,657. What is the other one?—The clerk of the union is the district registrar of every district, and in a poor district many of these people have to come and have relief. Suppose there is a mistake made, and they make a marriage late in life, which they will if the priest can arrange it, but then the clerks of the union are made acquainted with this, or one of the substitutes, who will say "These are people who have only just been married."

39,658. You think that the registrar for marriage should be a separate man from the clerk of the union?—Yes. It would save a great deal of hardship if there was some registrar appointed as for births and deaths.

39,659. Do you think it is an unreasonable thing that people who are marrying should have to pay a few shillings for the marriage? Do you think it ought to be an obstacle? If they are so poor are they in a position to marry?—That is not the point altogether. We hold that they are not disqualified for that reason.

39,660. Not legally disqualified?—No, by the Church.

39,661. Are there any fees charged in the Roman Church for marriage?—No; we are not allowed to ask for fees. Most of the Catholic people would make a small offering. A great many cannot do that.

39,662. There is generally some small offering made?—Yes.

39,663. You do not call it a fee?—No, it is not a fee. There is another advantage if that law was amended. You may find people living together, young people who have made a mistake, and the priest would marry them and send the certificate to the registrar to prevent them living in sin afterwards and causing a great deal of trouble. It is for the sake of morality and social good I speak of it.

39,664. Have you had any experience of sentences for divorce a mensa et thoro?—No, I have never had an application of that kind, but I know it exists. They take these cases to the Archbishop's Court.

39,665. You have no personal knowledge of them?—No.

39,666. (Lord Guthrie.) Why does not the Catholic Church allow priests to register under the 1898 Act?—I could not tell you that. They never accepted it. A great many of the Nonconformist bodies have not, in the same way.

39,667. Would you object to a law which made civil marriage compulsory on everybody, leaving the individuals to have any religious ceremony they choose thereafter?—I do not think the law has a right to interfere with marriage at all. I object to that entirely. It is a matter between themselves and a great deal of the future good depends, at least with Catholics, upon the marriage which they make.

39,668. You used the expression "valid Christian marriage"?—Yes.

39,669. Would that apply to marriage between Protestants?—No; we should get a dispensation from the mixed religion for the party that is not a member of the Church.

39,670. When you talk of a "valid Christian marriage" do you include in that the Protestant marriages or only the Catholic marriages?—We make a distinction between a contract and when the sacrament is administered. Until such time as they live together and that marriage is consummated it is only a ratified marriage, but after that it is a valid Christian marriage.

39,671. When you are referring to the sacrament being administered, that is by a Catholic priest?—I am speaking of Catholics, of course. I am not speaking of Protestants.

39,672. In using the expression "a valid Christian marriage," you are referring to Catholics only?—Yes, and those that have complied with all the laws of the Church.

39,673. Would you have any objection to the law allowing divorce for non-Catholics within its dominions?—No, we do not acknowledge divorce at all.

39,674. Do you go so far as to hold that the State is not entitled to allow divorce for anybody, or do you limit it to Catholics?—I do not think the State has any power to annul what I call a valid marriage. If two people make a contract to live together and consummate it, it is marriage; but if they have not consummated it by living together it would be a ratified marriage, and for certain reasons that could be annulled like any other contract.

39,675. For what reasons?—We hold when two baptized persons agree to a life-long cohabitation, and the marriage has not been consummated, it can be dissolved by the authority of the Church.

39,676. Whether a Christian marriage or not?—I am speaking of Christian marriage.

39,677. You exclude divorce for all marriages?—Yes, we hold it is contrary to the law of God.

39,678. Supposing Catholics go to the Divorce Court, what happens to them?—If they go to the Divorce Court we hold they are married still. If a man had a proper reason for going to the Divorce Court and putting away his wife for adultery or anything of that kind, or the wife putting away her husband, then we hold that they live in that divorce your Lordship mentioned a short time ago, a mensa et thoro.

39,679. You do not object to Catholics going to the Divorce Court for separation a mensa et thoro?—No. Catholics must have the sanction of their Bishops' Court for going. They have no other means of having that made valid in the eyes of the law.

39,680. Supposing Catholics go further and get divorced and re-marry, what do you do with them?—We hold they are not married. The Church could not interfere with them.

39,681. If they persist in it?—They woould remain outside the laws of the Church.

39,682. Would they be turned out?—They would remain outside the Church.

39,683. Have you known any such cases?—I never had a case in my life.

39,684. You have known cases of Catholics, contrary to the law of their Church, obtaining divorce and re-marrying?—I do not know of one. If they re-married they would not be Catholics any longer.

39,685. Have you found many cases in your large experience among the poor of deserted wives?—Yes. Men go away sometimes when work is very bad: they mix up with some societies or things of that sort and go away. As a rule most of these people return.

39,686. You have found some cases where they do not return?—Yes.

39,687. And some cases where they do return?—Yes; in the majority of cases they return.

39,688. (Mrs. Tennant.) Your length of parish service is exceptional, and therefore you are in particularly close touch with your people?—Yes.

39,689. It is true the Catholic priest is always in close touch with his people?—He is always in close touch with his people.

39,690. There are few Catholics living out of communion with their Church?—Very few. There may be some who get into habits which take them away from it. If a girl makes a mistake and is not able to get married, has not the means, and the priest can find her, and that girl can be married without the presence of any person outside, quietly, we pay for that and have it registered, and it saves the girl for life as a rule.

39,691. The priest is usually successful in arranging a marriage in those cases?—Yes.

39,692. Have you ever advised separation?—No. I always try to reconcile them by talking to the man, waiting first of all till such time as I can find him sober, or taking the woman down to the house and speaking to her and trying to make things better. I have found that a good thing.

39,693. You never thought it might help your case if they could be separated for a little time?—I do not think so. There is always a danger in that.

39,694. It is your experience that almost always reconciliation is effected?—Yes.

39,695. In the interval during the estrangement you think there is a danger?—Yes; there is always a feeling with a man that he has done something he had no right to do, and he goes into bad company, into the public-houses, and places of that sort, and does worse things. That man may have months of a bad life. We know them all as a rule, but sometimes they escape us and go right off.

39,696. Do you take any steps to safeguard the two persons during their period of separation?—Of course, we see them and try to make friends with them and bring them to the Church. If we can get them to go to the sacraments they do very well.

39,697. Can you generally keep in touch with both people?—Yes, we know where they go to, and they always feel wherever there are the priests there is secrecy.

39,698. What steps are you able to take in the case of the man who is separated from his wife and who is likely to live with another woman?—A man that was doing that I would try to bring back.

39,699. Before he does it how do you help him? Is there any way in which you are able to help him?—He would have to give up that intercourse.

39,700. But I mean before he has fallen into it?—We try to get these people to move away to another portion of the district, or to some other district, and so avoid the woman that was the cause of it.

39,701. I am not thinking of the time after the fall; I am thinking of any preventive measures you can take. Have you any club or institution you are able to take him to, temporarily?—I never found a case when I could not reconcile them as a rule when the man gives up the woman. The first thing is to give up the cause of the sin.

39,702. That is not my point. My point is if a wife comes to you and tells you that she has got a separation order you know there is danger to both persons?—Yes.

39,703. Are you able to do anything to save either or both of them from falling into the evil which you dread? They have a separation order for certain of the causes you have stated, such as incompatibility of temper; there is not another woman in the case then. Are you able to protect that man from going to live with one?—We take great care of that. We make a special case of that. The sisters of charity go about amongst them and take charge of the woman, and we take charge of the man and find work for him and make him see what he has done.

39,704. Your system is really very complete?—Yes, it has been very workable, taking the class of people we have to deal with and the many temptations they have—so many public-houses.

39,705. Catholics stand in a peculiarly happy position if they are so well looked after?—I do not draw comparisons between the Catholic and any other denomination. In Hoxton if anyone wishes to do good he has to work hard, and it is very depressing work.

39,706. You said you thought the period during which a separation order lasted should be temporary. Have you any period in mind? Would you suggest three months?—I would not suggest anything. The best way I think would be to see what improvement the man would make and then bring him to the magistrate. You could show how he had conducted himself. I think that would be a help to the man to improve. He would feel he had not lost his character.

39,707. To whom would you give that supervision? To whom would you give that power?—I am only speaking of the Catholic poor in the district. I could not say with respect to others. I certainly think that a visit to the magistrate would be useful and help them in that way. During the years I have been there, over and over again the magistrates have written or sent the warrant officer to ask if they could do anything in the case.

39,708. (Mr. Spender.) Is it necessary that the registrar should be in the Church?—It is necessary by the law.

39,709. Is he not in the vestry, or the sacristry?—It is not necessary for him to be there. He comes in and repeats these words after they are married. He repeats the form of marriage.

39,710. Taking the legislation of 1898 and the possibilities of getting rid of this trouble?——I am only speaking of what has occurred and what has been the cause of so much trouble.

39,711. You would say in its requirements as to civil marriage this country is as moderate as any country in Europe?—I do not complain of that. I complain of the effect it has on the people. Every marriage ought to be registered and taken care of independent of the Church. The church might be burnt down, or many other things might happen. I think that could be effectively done and not hurt the poor people, who are very susceptible.

39,712. I was suggesting that a way is provided for that?—I only put that down to be discussed.

39,713. (The Archbishop of York.) Would the offering at the time of marriage ever be refused by any of your people?—We never refuse the smallest offering that is made to us.

39,714. Would they decline to make an offering?—They always wish to make an offering, and if they have no offering as a rule they will keep away or go elsewhere and not be married. They feel that is part and parcel of their existence to make the offering, even if you give it back to them half an hour afterwards.

39,715. Is there any suggestion made as to what would be a suitable offering?—No. We are forbidden strictly before or after marriage to speak of an offering when the sacrament has been administered.

39,716. It is left to them to make what offering they please?—Yes. They may put it in the offertory box if they like.

(The Archbishop of York.) We are much obliged to you for your attendance and for the evidence which you have given us.

Rev. JOHN SCOTT LIDGETT, M.A., D.D., called and examined.

39,717. (The Archbishop of York.) You are ex-President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference and warden of the Bermondsey Settlement?—Yes.

39,718. You appear on behalf of the Wesleyan Methodist Committee of Privileges, but not as a delegate to express any official views?—The position is this: the Wesleyan Methodist Conference has never expressed a formal opinion on the subject. There was a notice of motion at the recent Conference, but notices of motion come at the end of the proceedings, and unfortunately the Conference came to an end without it being discussed; therefore I am simply selected to appear here because the committee has been good enough to suppose on the whole in this informal way I may represent, not in any formal way the Church, but informally a large trend of opinion.

39,719. Is the Committee of Privileges a committee of the Conference?—It is the committee of the Conference charged with dealing with public affairs as they arise during the intervals of the Conference.

39,720. Would you prefer to follow your proof and amplify it as you go along?—I should like to say in the first place that Wesleyan Methodists as a whole have remarkably little direct experience of these questions which are now occupying the attention of the Commission. In the whole of my long experience, for example, I have never known a single case of divorce or separation between Wesleyan Methodists, nor have I heard of one. No doubt occasionally such cases arise, but they are very infrequent indeed. Moreover, I have never heard, although I believe occasionally cases have arisen, of divorced people, innocent or guilty, applying to Wesleyan ministers for a re-marriage ceremony. The Wesleyan Methodist Church does avail itself of the provisions of the 1898 Act, and I am not in a complete position to say whether that has affected the situation, but I take it that divorced people seldom, if ever, have recourse to our ministers. Rather by reason of the fact we have very large missions and some settlements in the heart of poor districts in great cities, we are brought in touch with the people, and the views which I express here I have reason to believe are the views taken by the most experienced missioners in charge of these central missions. I should like to say that the Wesleyan Methodist Church as a whole shares the anxiety of all branches of the Christian Church that the sanctity of the marriage tie should be upheld. If any changes in the law are to be made we feel it should be with a view to strengthening throughout the community, and not weakening, the reverence for the marriage contract. At the same time I cannot help thinking that any facilities which are given to the well-to-do for securing divorce on grounds laid down by the State should, as a matter of justice, be extended to the very poor, and that no considerations of cost should stand in the way of the poor having the same facilities that are accorded to the rich. Even though I might feel that the law had erred in certain directions in extending facilities, on the ground of equal justice I should hold we had no right to interpose for even benevolent reasons in what I should consider to be an act of equal justice, on the ground that there should be no differentiation between rich and poor on the ground of poverty, and that such inability of the poor to secure their rights under the law should not be used for the most beneficent reasons. That would be a dangerous course of policy, I think. I feel strongly, and I represent a large body of opinion, that the only recognised ground of divorce should be as at present, adultery. It is quite true that certain amongst us are influenced by the new and very recent critical conclusions which tend towards upholding the view of the absolute indissolubility of marriage for all reasons, but I do not think that would be the view that would be taken by any very large number. If I may dwell for a moment on the critical question so far as our Lord's teaching is concerned, it hardly follows, even supposing the conditional words, "except for the cause of adultery," have been introduced from another source, that they are spurious or have been simply introduced by reason of the infirmity of the flesh for what I may call unworthy motives. The whole critical problem as to their place seems to me uncertain. Moreover, after the long usage and the long understanding of the Gospels it seems to me at the present time impracticable to turn aside from what has been so long the textus receptus for popular purposes as well as for scholarly purposes everywhere. Moreover, there is the extremely difficult problem for us how far the principles laid down by our Lord in His teaching were intended to be by Him the absolute guide to legislators: for example, He Himself explains to His hearers that Moses for the hardness of their hearts laid down, as a legislator, certain inferior principles which were the best that under the circumstances could be administered. Therefore, I think I am still expressing the common opinion of those for whom I speak when I say we are perfectly satisfied on religious grounds with the existing qualification admitted on the subject by the law, but our general object would be to get the law into as close accord as we possibly could with what we regard as the authoritative teaching of our Lord. I should say that not merely because of our submission to what we understand to be His authority, but because we believe that that authority does uphold principles which are absolutely vital to the spiritual and moral and even to the physical well-being of the community. We should therefore have a two-fold ground, not only our acceptance of His authority, but our practical and utilitarian belief that His authority does in this matter safeguard the most important interests of the community. So far as the one exception, the case of adultery, is concerned, we should distinguish that from any other cause for the dissolution of marriage that could possibly be adduced, on the ground that it strikes directly at the marital bond in a way that no other cause or alleged cause for divorce does. Of course those of us who work among the poor are constantly brought into contact with exceedingly hard cases. There are cases of lunacy, criminality, cruelty, and of desertion, but those whom I am representing would look with grave dislike upon any extension of the causes of divorce on these grounds, and for various reasons: first of all, because we should fear that once you begin to multiply the causes you will accelerate a tendency to multiply them in the future. In the next place, so far as many of these suggested causes are concerned, they are very difficult of precise definition and of absolute certainty. I think at once to give the right of divorce in regard to any one of them, and particularly to criminality or even to cruelty, is absolutely to rule out from our modern conception of marriage, that it ought to have, if I may say so, some kind of redemptive grace in it, that the standard before an offended partner to a marriage should be that in cases of offence there is not to be a light resorting to legal rights, but that the unexhausted stores of original affection should be commanded to try to restore the bond which has been threatened or even broken. For that reason I should think that, although hard cases are fairly frequent, yet hard cases should not make the law, because the more the hard cases break down the existing practical acceptance of the indissoluble contract of marriage the more you will weaken the general sanctions of marriage, and that would be an evil far more serious than the mitigation of particular hard cases. Then I am here to represent that there should be complete equality of the sexes as to the grounds of divorce. I, and those for whom I can speak, believe that the best way to raise the moral standard of men is to call upon them for a higher degree of self-discipline by making the conditions of divorce absolutely equal between the sexes. It is quite the case that infidelity on the part of a wife has more serious consequences to the home than that of the father, probably in most cases, but at the same time I think that is a question that will solve itself by the ordinary processes of practical life. We have long felt, and feel strongly, the only way to raise the moral standard is to make it equal between the sexes. I should like to add that all those with whom I have to do are greatly opposed to the disability of the poor with regard to obtaining divorce on the ground of the immoral consequences of separation orders. Our experience is that separations lead to the formation of irregular unions, and that it will be far better where the cause of divorce exists, which is allowed in the case of the rich, and in the interest of morals that the poor should have the relief of divorce rather than of mere separation. I am very strongly of opinion that much greater care should be exercised in giving the ordinary separation orders where incompatibility of temper or other causes of that kind are established, and that every influence should be used, including the occasional revision of the order, the intervention at intervals of the magistrate in order, if possible, to bring the parties together, because, after all, most of these cases are cases of young, immature, and undisciplined people who have got married perhaps thoughtlessly. I hold, again, you want first of all the moral influence of friendship, if possible, brought to bear upon them, but also side by side with it the sanction which is the only sanction that will keep young and thoughtless people from getting married, that it is very difficult to escape the bonds they contract. So far as publication is concerned I agree with those who have urged the evil that is done by a certain section of the Press, which gives inordinate space to the details of divorce cases, and unfortunately sometimes reports that which is the most harmful to prurient imaginations. At the same time I feel very strongly that publicity is required, and I am not at all sure of any remedy that has been suggested, except our reliance upon the general sense of restraint of the Press and the general influences that go to raise the moral standard of the community.

39,721. May I ask one or two questions to get your evidence clear. I gather you, and those whose opinions you know, look upon adultery as standing on a special ground, not only because it is an exception in certain reported words of our Lord, but because of its own intrinsic character?—Yes.

39,722. You would regard that as standing in a different relation to the rupture of the marriage bond from any of the other causes?—Totally.

39,723. With regard to what you said about the recourse to divorce and separation on the part of the Wesleyan Methodists, how far would you say that was due to the fact that the majority of definite members of the Wesleyan Methodist Church would belong either to the middle class or the very respectable working class?—Of course the preponderance of our members throughout the country belong to the working classes; no doubt they are the respectable classes. In most cases their religious convictions made their respectability.

39,724. You would say among that class the question of divorce or the desire for divorce hardly ever occurs?—As far as our experience goes.

39,725. You speak of the effect of separation orders at the present time, that they are apt to lead to immorality. You say in your proof that permanent separation under such conditions generally leads to immorality. You would not feel the same about separation orders not in the first instance made permanent?—No, certainly not.

39,726. You would agree they had some advantage?—I should like to see the magistrates continued in the general powers they exercise, but put under stricter rules so far as the using of almost a paternal influence in bringing parties together and assisting them to look over the trivial causes which with young people lead to permanent estrangement.

39,727. Would you be prepared to advocate that separation orders in the first instance should be made only for a time?—I should be quite prepared, I think.

39,728. You would advise in any case there should be as a rule postponement of decision except in cases of immediate urgent necessity?—Yes.

39,729. Even before the order was granted?—Yes.

39,730. In expressing the opinions you have about publication, do you feel that you are representing the view which would be likely to be taken by your Wesleyan Conference?—I think so.

39,731. You speak of leaving a selection of the details to the general good sense of the Press. How far, in your opinion, is it likely that that general good sense we all admit may be affected by the competition of less desirable journals who think more of making money than of exercising restraint?—That, of course, is a difficulty not only in this matter but in so many other matters, and I frankly confess I hardly see a solution.

39,732. (Mr. Spender.) Your view is briefly that you wish to see the present law made accessible to the poor, and that you would like to see the ground of adultery equalised as between the sexes?—That is so.

39,733. You would not go beyond that even, say, to desertion?—No. I think the case of desertion is probably, on the whole, the strongest case of those that are brought forward for an increase of facilities, but, when I consider the possibilities of collusion, going no further, I think it would be a highly dangerous thing to grant. I have been a Poor Law guardian for many years in a very poor union, and I know the great difficulty we have in all these cases of desertion, and the immense amount of collusion that takes place.

39,734. You say as regards separations that in your opinion they lead to further immorality on both sides and to the formation of irregular unions, and that divorce would be more conducive to morality and general well-being than separations. Does that argument not apply exactly as it stands to the enforced separations which are caused by desertions?—That apparent conflict has been present to my mind, but I look upon it that the greater harm is the harm of weakening the marriage bond throughout the community by giving extended causes of divorce, and that you would do more harm to the community as a whole and eventually to every class by such extensions than you would by upholding the restriction, even although such separations do lead from time to time to immoral connections.

39,735. Would you say that the marriage law had been weakened in Scotland where desertion is permitted as a ground of divorce?—I have not sufficient experience of the working of the marriage laws in Scotland to offer any opinion.

39,736. Apparently no evidence of any considerable disproportion of divorces consequent upon it has been given?—Apparently.

39,737. It is thought possible in Scotland to prevent collusive desertions?—Yes.

39,738. You used a phrase, a good phrase if I may say so, about the relations of the parties in marriage, the element of redemptive grace, and you use that as an argument against adding to the grounds of divorce. Would you not say the value of the redemptive grace might be diminished if it is always compulsory?—I want the whole community to recognise that when people enter the bond of marriage it is not something which they are to be allowed to, or which they are to contemplate, lightly giving up, but it does call for all the resources of mutual forbearance, or may call, and that is part of the anticipation which they should have in contracting the marriage tie.

39,739. Would you say that motive was weakened supposing in extreme cases there was a possibility of relief from an intolerable situation?—I am afraid of extreme cases, not only in this, but because of the certain effect which has taken place in other countries than Scotland from the admission of new grounds of divorce. I am afraid I am hopelessly conservative on this subject.

39,740. (Sir William Anson.) You say, to begin with, your experience of the demand for divorce among members of your Church is extremely small?—Yes.

39,741. You would wish in any alteration of the law that it should be with the object of securing a strengthening of adherence to the marriage tie. One step you would take would be to make adultery the sole ground for divorce, equalizing the position of men and women?—Yes.

39,742. And incidentally make the cost and the procedure accessible to rich and poor. You might get over certain causes of continuous immorality amongst the poor?—Yes.

39,743. As regards the grounds of divorce, you think there may be cases of desertion or cruelty, or others, which you call hard cases?—Certainly.

39,744. On the whole, in the interests of the community, apart from the questions of scriptural interpretation, you think the interest of the community would be better served by limiting the ground of divorce to adultery?—That is my position.

39,745. On the ground it is so difficult to keep within the limits of the very hard cases?—That is so.

39,746. With regard to separation orders, do you think as at present administered they are conducive to morality?—I cannot resist the evidence which constantly meets me of the way in which people in poor populations who are separated do form irregular ties.

39,747. Can you suggest any changes in the law or the administration with regard to separation orders which would get over that difficulty? Are they granted too readily, or for too long or too short a time, or are the grounds unsuitable?—I should imagine there is a great variation in administration as to the ease with which they are granted, but I dislike their being unconditional at the first, and I am anxious in the case of poor people, not poor people only but these undisciplined people who are ready to have a tiff and leave one another, that there should be brought to bear the kind influence of friendship before any separation is made finally. I think that friendship and friendly influence, if it is possible to exercise it, may be in many cases almost omnipotent in composing such differences. I know cases where it has been permanently successful.

39,748. That being brought to bear before the order was granted, or in the interval?—Both before and after.

39,749. As regards the publication of news about divorce cases, you think a certain amount of publicity is required as a protection to the public. In what sense would publicity be a protection to the public?—I think the public is entitled to know these things. I have known administrative cases of scandal. There are vast numbers of people who are in confidential positions of all sorts, and I think any attempt to hush up divorce proceedings would be thoroughly bad in the public interest for that reason.

39,750. The bare fact that divorce proceedings had taken place, and that the issue had been one way or the other, is what you think ought to be recorded?—Certainly.

39,751. I was not sure whether you were referring to the innocent party who might be brought into divorce proceedings and whose reputation would be at stake?—I was thinking of the guilty party, but it does tell the other way also, and I should be glad that it should tell the other way also.

39,752. (Lord Guthrie.) What parts of England have you worked in?—I have been 20 years in the South of London as the head of the settlement which I formed there nearly 20 years ago. Before that time I had ministerial appointments under the short service system of the Wesleyan Methodists in the Potteries, in Southport, in Cardiff, in Wolverhampton, and in Cambridge.

39,753. Is the Wesleyan Methodist Committee of Privileges, on behalf of whom you appear, appointed by the Conference?—Yes.

39,754. Does it consist of ministers and laity?—Both.

39,755. In what proportion?—Practically equal proportions.

39,756. You said the subject had never been discussed in the Conference?—As far as my knowledge goes, that is so. The Wesleyan Methodist Conference is an administrative body. We are a highly centralised denomination, and the time we spend, a fortnight every summer, is absolutely taken up, or almost absolutely, with the administrative affairs of the Church, and we have, some think, too little time to give to the great questions of public and religious importance.

39,757. When one talks of the subject itself that applies equally to divorce and to separation?—Equally.

39,758. Have you known amongst the Wesleyans any cases of judicial separation?—Not one.

39,759. Have you any information as to what action, if any, the Wesleyans took in 1857 when the Act was passed?—I am sorry to say I have not, but my strong belief, without referring, is that they acquiesced.

39,760. There would be differences of opinion among them at that time just as there are now?—I think so.

39,761. You think as a whole they acquiesced?—As a whole they have been satisfied with the existing state of the law.

39,762. At the present moment you cannot have any notion as to the extent of difference of opinion in regard to other causes among the Wesleyans?—I may say I submitted the proof to a number of influential people before I sent it in here, men who were generally representative, and I have also taken counsel with the most responsible missioners who have to do with very great activities in Manchester, Birmingham, and elsewhere, to be sure I was expressing not only my opinion, but in general theirs as well.

39,763. No doubt amongst the Wesleyans, as among other denominations, there are those who advocate extended grounds?—There may be, but I have never met them.

39,764. You think your view represents the general view?—I may say that the motion which was put down at the recent Conference was in the general terms of my proof. It was not fully discussed. The Conference ended by saying that there was no time to discuss it.

The only speeches that were heard against it during the short interval before that resolution, when there was no time to discuss it, were in favour of the absolute indissolubleness of marriage, and not any further extensions.

39,765. The absolute indissolubleness of marriage, subject to the one exception?—No, without it.

39,766. Were those the terms of the motion?—No, the terms of the motion were on the lines of my proof. The only dissent from the motion was an appeal that no resolution should be passed owing to the lack of time, on the ground of belief that marriage should be absolutely indissoluble, and not on the ground of any desire to extend facilities. There may have been some persons who desired to extend it, but they were not heard.

39,767. There are three views, keep things as they are, abolish the recognised exception, or extend?—Yes. As far as my belief goes, although I am not entitled to cite any formal resolution, the great majority desire to keep things as they are. I have not met with any who desire the causes of divorce extended. I think I heard one somewhat influential man express, or know of his expressing, some suggestion about desertion or cruelty, and there are some, although I believe them to be a small and yet influential minority, who would uphold the entire indissolubility of marriage.

39,768. That would be in the direction of repealing the Act of 1857?—Yes, but I believe them to be a small minority.

39,769. Do they exist both among the clergy and the laity?—I have only heard it from ministers.

39,770. You thought desertion was the strongest case for extension although you do not advocate it. Why do you say that as compared with other grounds?—I think permanent desertion goes nearer to destroy the whole bond of marriage, as it can be understood from any standpoint, than incompatibility of temper or cruelty, or the fact that one partner to the bond has been subject to a criminal sentence.

39,771. Is that on the view that the two essentials in the marriage relations are first, fidelity, and secondly, adherence?—That is so.

39,772. The others not going to the essence of the matter?—Yes.

39,773. In regard to what Mr. Spender asked, suppose that in Scotland it has been found that the four fears, which you quite naturally have, have not been realised: namely, first that the marriage bond has not been weakened; secondly, that there has been no practical difficulty found from collusion; thirdly, that there has been no agitation for further extension, and, fourthly, that there is no practical difficulty in ascertaining what is desertion. What do you say if that has been the case in Scotland over a very long period of years? Do you think these fears might come to pass in England although they have not in Scotland?—I do not want in any way to express mistrust of Englishmen or to pay a compliment to Scotchmen, but I have an idea in my own mind that there is a certain power of moderation in Scotland which enables them to do dangerous things sometimes with impunity which to the multitudes of an English city might be perhaps more dangerous.

39,774. (The Archbishop of York.) You came here on the nomination of your Committee of Privileges and at the request of our secretary?—That is so.

39,775. In that sense you are representative?—That is so. My proof was seen by a sub-committee appointed to read it before it was sent here, and they took no exception to it.

39,776. We may take it as representing a very representative body of opinion in the Wesleyan Methodist Church?—I hope so.

39,777. With regard to the question of courts your view was, that the mere cost should not be a reason why a citizen should be prevented from availing himself of remedies his State has allowed?—That is so.

39,778. How far would you couple with that the view that the standard of the court should be as high as possible?—I should feel that very strongly indeed. I think special arrangements would have to be made.

39,779. Have you any opinion to express on the suggestion made that it would promote the cause of morality if the guilty parties in any divorce case were forbidden to re-marry?—I altogether doubt the practicability of advising such a course.

39,780. You have formed no strong opinion about it?—I can form no strong opinion. I sympathise with the position of those who refuse to give them the advantage of Christian marriage.

(The Archbishop of York.) We thank you very much for your interesting and valuable evidence.

Rev. Herbert Williams called and examined.

39,781. (The Archbishop of York.) You are rector of Horselydown?—Yes.

39,782. I understand you wish to come before us in order to make a personal explanation in connection with some mention of your name, or certain facts which you would like to have an opportunity of dealing with, referred to by Mr. Cecil Chapman, of the Tower Bridge police court, in his evidence before the Commission?—That is so.

39,783. I think you asked to be allowed to give that personal explanation?—I did.

39,784. I think you may take it from me that the Commission only wishes to hear you on the particular point about which you wish to give a personal explanation. We have had a great deal of evidence from all kinds of people, and a great deal more is to follow on the other matters. As you were good enough to volunteer to give evidence upon that particular matter, we should wish you to confine your remarks to that point. Will you kindly tell us what is the explanation you wish to make?—Yes. I would like to say that Mr. Cecil Chapman is a very great personal friend of mine, and that we work very much together, endeavouring to do our best for the people of that particular neighbourhood, and we were discussing several points connected with what we see so very frequently, breaches of the marriage bond on the part of the poor people, and in particular I ventured to suggest that it was our duty to elevate rather than degrade that ceremony which is held in our parish churches; that the present system of encouraging all sorts and descriptions of people to come to our churches to be married is much to be deprecated, and in our conversations together we instanced the fact, and I draw attention particularly to that fact, that there were one or two churches in London where it was the custom on certain days in the year to invite anybody and everybody to come forward and get married at a very low cost, I believe it was the sum of one shilling. That fact Mr. Cecil Chapman, I think, brought to your notice, and it was spoken about afterwards in the public papers. There were two questions really that we were discussing. The first was that such practice of inviting people in that way to come was very wrong, and then afterwards we discussed the way in which marriages were sought after by the clergy, in a way that he felt, and I felt, very much, was quite contrary to the practice and directions of the book of common prayer; that the bann system had entirely failed in the vast number of the boroughs of London, and that people were coming to get married, sometimes living nearly a mile away from the church in which they were married, and were entered into the book as belonging to this parish, whereas the term parish really referred to the borough rather than to the parish. These two questions I discussed with him, and when he was before you I believe he brought forward the first, and when asked to give authority for that statement he said that it was from the lips of the Rev. Herbert Williams. The churches that we are referring to are one in Whitechapel, I think commonly called the Red Church, and another in Walworth, where I think, on Easter Monday, or some other day, they were accustomed to draw great crowds of people to be married in a way, to my mind, which is very detrimental to the future prosperity of their lives. I have been charged with bringing an accusation against my brothers in the particular neighbourhood in which I live, of going out of their way to undersell one another so as to get custom for this marriage market, but that was not ever in my mind, although at the same time I very much deprecate and speak against, and will continue to speak very strongly against the practice of putting the price of marriage outside the church walls, as if it were some article to be sold cheap. I know that my brothers in that particular neighbourhood in which I live are accustomed to charge exactly the same as the registrar in his office, the Registry Office. The whole fact of drawing people to get married, when they have not been accustomed to enter into the spirit of the solemnity of the service in which they take part, is to my mind one of the chief causes of that misery and wretchedness we come so commonly into contact with in the poorer parts. Mr. Chapman and myself were agreed upon this point, which I put forward as one of the most necessary things to be done with regard to the question of matrimony amongst the poor, and that is, that they should be all carried out at the Town Hall by the civil officers of the State, and then those who had the desire for holy matrimony in the church should have the Church's blessing given to them. I want to make perfectly clear before the Commission that my remarks to Mr. Chapman which were afterwards reported to yourselves had no reference whatever to any local church, although at the same time, I do feel and still feel, and ever shall feel that it is quite contrary to the spirit of the Church's teaching to put forward matrimony as one of the things that can be obtained at a certain price at a particular church. The way in which arrangements have been made amongst some of the clergy to call their parish as if it were including the whole of the borough, I think is likely to lead to what has happened to myself. After the most careful enquiry on one occasion I united a girl, or went through the form of uniting the girl, to a man who had another wife living. He assured me most fully that his wife was dead, and I made the mistake of not requiring to see his former marriage certificate and the certificate of her death. I married him, he was living in the parish some weeks before-hand, and I afterwards found that he was married really to someone else. In my own case I investigate every notice of banns that is given, and I should never dream of marrying anybody that one was not perfectly satisfied about as living in the ecclesiastical parish over which it has pleased God to set me.

39,785. Thank you, I think that makes the point quite clear. I would just like to ask you this question, do I understand you to say that, in your opinion, it is still the custom of some churches to offer marriages at a fee as low as 1*s.* in any part of London?—I do not know whether it is still the custom, it was the custom till quite lately.

39,786. You do not allege that the custom is to your knowledge appertaining anywhere now?—No, I am thankful to say I have no knowledge of that fact.

39,787. In your opinion the best safeguard of the sanctity of the marriage tie among the poor, would be to insist in all cases upon a civil marriage and to leave the religious marriage to the option of the parties?—I am quite decided in my own opinion upon that point, because I believe the civil marriage would impress them much more than a crowd of young people coming on Christmas Day or at any other time, to get married, and we should not have to go through what is one of the most terrible parts of our duty, to say words that, to my mind, are nearly blasphemous, over the heads of people who are not in a position to receive the blessings we are asking God to give them.

39,788. You mean the fact that words are spoken over the heads of such people makes them almost blasphemous?—Yes.

39,789. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Did you tell Mr. Chapman that you knew of churches which were advertising the cheapening of marriage fees?—I did.

39,790. What churches did you refer to?—I referred to the Red Church in Whitechapel.

39,791. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) That is one?—And a church in Walworth.

39,792. Did you also draw his attention to an advertisement that the fees at a particular church were to be lower than at another?—Not at all.

39,793. That is a mistake?—Yes.

39,794. When Mr. Chapman said that he misunderstood you?—He misunderstood in this way, he was referring to those cheap days if I may so call it.

39,795. What I have been referring to is at questions 13,429 and 13,430 of the Minutes of Evidence, and what I am going to refer to is at question 13,490. Did you draw attention to an actual advertisement in this form, as well as he could remember, "The fees for marriage at this church will be reduced "from so-and-so to so-and-so and marriages will "take place," giving a list of the dates?—No, I did not say that. Mr. Chapman had received that information from someone else.

39,796. He was in error when he said his attention had been called to it by one of the prominent clergymen in his district, which he afterwards explained meant you?—I think he was under a misapprehension.

39,797. Did you tell him that the particular church in question was close to him, that is Mr. Chapman, in Bermondsey?—No, I did not.

39,798. That is a mistake?—Quite a mistake.

39,799. Did you also tell him that this question of advertising the reduction of marriage fees, the competing point—you understand what I mean?—Yes.

39,800. That that was not only done in the particular case but that it was a practice?—No, not in that way.

39,801. So that in all those matters Mr. Chapman was under some misapprehension?—I think he was confusing the two points we were making.

39,802. You mentioned the Red Church, that is St. James the Great, Bethnal Green. Are you aware that the scandal which undoubtedly was created by the clergyman there, ended in 1898 when that clergyman died?—I believe so, but I am not sure of the date.

39,803. You did not give us that impression just now, that it had passed away 12 years ago?—I did not know the date. We were referring to the fact that that was done.

39,804. Are you aware that since that date the marriages in that church have been confined, as, of course, they ought to be confined in every case to persons resident in the parish?—I have not looked into the matter at all.

39,805. Are you aware of any other churches besides this Red Church that I have just mentioned, and this case at Walworth?—No, I do not know any at all, not where there is a fee of 1*s.*

39,806. Or anything like competition with other clergymen in regard to fees?—No.

39,807. As a matter of fact you have told us that the fees in the churches in Bermondsey are of the same amount as the registrar's fees?—Yes.

39,808. Your own are a good deal lower?—I found them, I do not know how to alter them.

39,809. I am asking you the fact?—Mine are 7*s.* 1*d.*

39,810. Instead of 9*s.* 7*d.*?—Yes.

39,811. I think you were going to add that you found that system going on when you came?—Yes.

39,812. You have been unable to alter it or perhaps unwilling to alter it?—I should like to do away with fees altogether.

39,813. On the question of one church competing with another it is a matter of observation that your fees are lower than your neighbours?—Quite so, but I do not put mine forward.

39,814. I understand that you are not personally responsible for it. I want to ask you another question. You are not only entitled to an opinion but your opinion is of weight as to the wisdom or unwisdom of advertising the amount of the fees on the church boards. Are you aware that that is so common a practice as to be almost general in towns?—No, I should not call it general.

39,815. You would call it a common practice?—It is common but I should not call it a general practice.

39,816. It has at least this advantage that none of these poor people—— ?—I cannot see any advantage at all.

39,817. Does it not occur to you that these poor people cannot be cheated and deceived by being charged more for the marriage than they ought to be. It is before their eyes outside the church?—I do not think the clergy would cheat them.

39,818. There are other people involved in matrimony. I am making no charges against anybody, but it is conceivable that someone who was interested in the fees might tell people that they must pay so much, when in fact the legal fee was less. Is not that chance rendered impossible by the actual amount of the fees and whom they are paid to being published quite plainly, painted on a board outside the church?—I do not agree with the line of argument you are taking. I object most strongly to the idea of a person——

39,819. Will you just apply your mind to the question. The publication of the fees does prevent the possibility of fraud on poor people coming to be married?—I would not like to say so.

39,820. Surely it does?—No, I do not like to bring in the word fraud in connection with my brother clergy.

39,821. I am not suggesting anything against anybody. I have said before that there are other people besides clergymen involved in the arrangements for marriage. It is possible in that as in anything else for one man to cheat another?—No, I do not think so.

39,822. You do not think it possible?—No, not in those cases.

39,823. At any rate if it were possible the possibility would be removed by the board outside the church stating the amount of the fee, would it not?—I do not follow what you are driving at.

39,824. You are not doing justice to yourself. A poor person who is going to be married wants to know how much it will cost. If it is published in this way outside the church it is impossible for some person behind to say you must pay so much, which is more than the legal fee?—It is quite possible if such a thing were likely to happen.

39,825. We will not discuss that. It is rendered impossible by the publication of the fees?—I quite grant you that.

39,826. (Sir William Anson.) Is your objection to the charge of fees at all?—I do not say that, but I do object very strongly to a system that I know is in practice in a particular borough, in which the clergy, with one or two exceptions, have combined together to agree that they can marry anybody out of the borough and put in the register book the fact that they belong to this parish. I think such a system is likely to lead to many evils.

39,827. (The Archbishop of York.) Forgive me, that is not the point you have put in your proof?—It has been brought out by the cross-examination of Sir Lewis Dibdin.

39,828. (Sir William Anson.) I understand what was told us in the summer was that there are churches which bid against one another for custom by underselling one another in fees. Is there any foundation for that statement?—There is no foundation for that at present.

39,829. It was made by you?—No, it was not made in that connection.

39,830. It was made to us on your authority?—It was made in connection with two churches in particular of which we were speaking.

39,831. Which were you speaking of?—We were speaking of the Red Church, Bethnal Green, and also of a church at Walworth.

39,832. Do you say these churches were bidding for custom against one another?—Why do they put up the notice?

39,833. You do not object to fees being charged?—I object very strongly to the fact of trying to draw people to come to a particular church.

39,834. That is not my point. The fees are chargeable?—They are by law.

39,835. Is it not desirable that those who are to pay fees should have the fullest notice of what has to be paid?—I should not say that it is wise to put them as a prominent feature outside the church, the fact that marriages can be obtained at a price of so-and-so.

39,836. It is not a question of obtaining marriage at a price. It is the legitimate payment which people have to make?—Quite so.

39,837. Is there any objection that they should be informed of that in the fullest way?—There is an objection in one way in which I feel, but which cannot be applied as a matter of allowability; it is allowable for the clergy to do that.

39,838. I am sorry I was not here at the beginning of your evidence. Do I understand that you withdraw the charge which we understand was made by you that your clerical brethren bid against one another?—I withdraw it in the fact it was understood to apply to my clerical brethren living in close proximity to myself.

39,839. Anyone of whom you know?—I was speaking of certain churches in a far distant position from the particular parish in which I work.

39,840. Were you in any way qualified to speak of those churches?—Yes. I have known of it from time to time. It has been brought to my notice, and I have heard the clergyman of one boast of the many thousands he had married.

39,841. In consequence of the low fees?—I am afraid people do a great deal in South London for a shilling, or to save a shilling.

39,842. I understand the scale of fees is very fairly uniform in Bermondsey?—It has been agreed upon.

39,843. I do not understand, so far as Bermondsey is concerned, that there is any foundation for the charge?—None whatever.

39,844. Is it not rather unfortunate it was ever made?—I was not here to hear what Mr. Chapman said, but from what I have been told by Sir Lewis Dibdin and others by reference to what he said, I think he mixed up the two questions that we were discussing.

39,845. What were they?—The two questions were these.

(The Archbishop of York.) It was rather a long point, and you will find it in the evidence. The witness went over it at great length when he began.

(Sir William Anson.) It was my misfortune I was not here. I will not ask you anything further.

39,846. (The Archbishop of York.) I gather in reply to Sir William Anson you said that anything you mentioned about competing churches referred to two distant churches?—Yes.

39,847. Both have ceased to use the practice so that your words have no reference to any existing facts?—No. We did discuss the question of putting up notice boards, and I think that must have been very much in Mr. Chapman's mind at the time.

(The Archbishop of York.) We are very much obliged to you for coming here to say what you have said.

Rev. Canon HENRY LEWIS called and examined.

39,848. (The Archbishop of York.) You are Rector and Rural Dean, Bermondsey?—Yes.

39,849. You desire to give an explanation to us of the matters which we have just had before us, namely, certain remarks made by Mr. Cecil Chapman on authority which he put before us, and I understand that you wish to give evidence on that point?—Yes.

39,850. May I say I think it would be well that you should confine your evidence to that point because we have had a very great deal on some other points you have brought before us. I do not think that it will be necessary to trouble you about those. I do not think it is necessary to read the whole of your proof because we have nothing to do with personal questions between you and any of your clergy. We want to get the facts. Perhaps you might address yourself to the two questions, namely, whether there are any churches in your deanery or neighbourhood which would justify the words that were used by Mr. Chapman, and secondly, whether there is any justification for the suggestion that the publishing of fees on notice boards leads to any undesirable competition in marriages?—With regard to our fees, 16 years ago there was a uniform fee of 12*s.* 6*d.* for marriage. About 15 years ago the clergy met and agreed that the fees should be lowered to 9*s.* 7*d.*, which is the local registrar's fee. They have continued to do that ever since, and the fees are the same now. There is only one church in Bermondsey which is an exception and that charges 1*s.* less. We are most particular about insisting on these fees in the cases of people who can afford to pay them. Of course there are charity marriages where we do not charge anything, but we rather pride ourselves on being careful in this matter. That is one question your Grace wished me to deal with, and then with regard to advertising, the only approach to that is the notice board outside our churches, which we put up for the information of people who are very poor and uneducated in these matters, as to what they have to pay, so much for banns, so much for marriages, so much for the certificate and the total at the bottom. I may say, as a rural dean, it is one of the questions I am expected to ask of every church I visit, "Is the scale of fees " charged at this church put in a prominent position " where the parties affected can see it?" Therefore it seems to me right and proper that these notice boards should be there. I wish the Commissioners had allowed me to have said one word about what Mr. Williams said and I wish he could have been present.

39,851. Will you please say anything that arises out of the matter before us or the evidence you have just given?—I should like Mr. Williams to have been asked why he went out of his way to give opportunities to interviewers of various London papers to come to him to pick his brains and to get his views, and then put them out in all the attraction of bold type. Mr. Chapman gave evidence here on the 26th May; I wrote to Mr. Chapman on the 27th. I also wrote to Mr. Williams for his explanation on the 27th, and on the same day there came out a very florid interview in the "Westminster Gazette," in which the man says, after various things told him by Mr. Williams, "Although " there is no longer any notice of the kind affixed to " the church fabric my predecessor's advertised charge " has become a tradition with respect to this parish, " and the fee for the performance of the marriage " ceremony is on the same footing now as formerly." Then at the bottom the interviewer says "Within half " a mile of St. John's Rectory striking proof was " afforded of the custom to which Mr. Williams had " been alluding. On the walls of Bermondsey Old " Parish Church of St. Mary Magdalen there is " exhibited this notice." And then we have the particulars I have given the Commissioners. It seems to me that Mr. Williams has not been quite fair, he not only led Mr. Chapman astray—— I charged Mr. Chapman with that and he said he got the information from Mr. Williams, but after Mr. Williams had finished with Mr. Chapman he goes to the interviewers, and that is where we feel we have been ill-treated.

39,892. I do not think we need trouble you with regard to the matters between you and Mr. Williams?—I am most grateful to the Commissioners for allowing me to come here.

39,853. I think it is quite sufficient, I understand you have assured us with your special knowledge and authority as Rural Dean that there are no churches in the neighbourhood of Horselydown, or as far as you know anywhere in that district which justify the remarks that were made by Mr. Chapman?—No.

39,854. And secondly you entirely justify the publication of the fees on the notice boards, both because it is expected in every church that the fees shall be put in a prominent place so that the parishioners can see them, and because it is only fair to those who wish to avail themselves of the services of the church, to know what the fees are exactly?—That is so.

39,855. You wish us to understand that in the publication of these fees there can be no shadow of a suggestion that there is any competition?—None whatever.

39,856. May I ask one question which arises out of your evidence. I think we should like your opinion, as one who has great experience among the working classes in Bermondsey, as to whether you think the universal requirement of civil marriage would be for the advantage of the community or not?—This is a point on which I have been speaking at our own diocesan conference during the past week. It is a point about which we, at the Mother Church of Bermondsey, feel very strongly. We have had three thousand marriages during the time I have been there in 15 years, and therefore we feel that we have some touch with our people in that respect. We view the opportunity presented to the churches of means of reaching the people in the matter of marriage as a magnificent one, I mean from a Christian point of view. We feel that although they may be uneducated and even degraded, yet it is a great opportunity to be able to get these people near to the higher things that we represent. It is a grand opportunity to call upon the better nature in them and to lift them up to the higher levels of thought and feeling, and we do find in our experience that marriage, in the case of men and women who have not thought of religion has often been the means of making them live a religious life. At any rate we press that always, and if the church lost that opportunity, and still worse if she flung it away, then it would be a very disastrous thing indeed for the church and also for the nation.

39,857. Do you think that if civil marriage was made compulsory people would cease to ask for marriage in church, or do you think that the custom of liking to be married in church would really continue?—For a time it would, but I think the secular feeling would prevail.

Adjourned.

FORTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Wednesday, 30th November 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

His Grace The LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir WILLIAM ANSON, Bart., M.P.
Sir LEWIS DIBDIN, D.C.L.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).

J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY, Esq. (Assistant Secretary).

The Right Rev. PEARSON M'ADAM MUIR, D.D., called and examined.

39,858. (Chairman.) You are a doctor of divinity and minister of Glasgow Cathedral?—Yes.

39,859. You are also moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland?—Yes.

39,860. Is that office held for the year?—Yes.

39,861. You have been for 40 years a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, and this year you are the moderator of the General Assembly?—Yes.

39,862. During those 40 years you have had parish minister experience as well, I take it?—Yes.

39,863. You say first in Catrine, then in Polmont in Stirlingshire, a rural parish with a considerable agricultural population and several mining villages, then in Morningside, a suburb of Edinburgh, and your present charge is in the original parish of Glasgow, in the heart of the city?—Yes.

39,864. I take it Glasgow is the place where you have a very large experience of social conditions in Scotland?—Yes. I have been in Glasgow between 14 and 15 years now.

39,865. May I take it from the experience you have had, you consider you have had a great opportunity of becoming acquainted with the habits and opinions of people of all classes?—I should think I have seen the general opinion as much as one could do in that time.

39,866. In your memorandum you say divorce is a matter which has been very seldom brought to your notice amongst your parishioners?—Scarcely ever.

39,867. They are probably a well-behaved, moral set, who attend your ministrations?—Yes. I am speaking not only of the congregation, but of the parishioners at large, and my present charge contains a large proportion of people who do not belong to the congregation and are of the humblest classes.

39,868. As far as your experience goes, do you conclude your present system in Scotland would meet with much opposition, or is it acquiesced in generally?—I think it is. I do not think there is any desire to change it.

39,869. We know the Scotch law well, and I will not elaborate it. You think it meets with general approval?—Yes.

39,870. You find everywhere in your experience respect for the marriage tie, which is highly esteemed in Scotland?—Yes.

39,871. You say you can only recall one instance of a couple in the lower classes living together for years as man and wife in defiance of public opinion?—Yes that is a solitary instance.

39,872. They were eventually married, finding their position untenable?—Yes. Of course, I am speaking solely of what came under my own personal observation.

39,873. That is what makes it valuable. Have you seen the statistics of marriage and divorce in Scotland?—I do not think I have.

39,874. They will be put in in due course. We have had them supplied to us. In the Established Church, under the head of "Number of marriages in which there is one divorce" the figure is 180?—Indeed.

39,875. That is not within your knowledge?—I have not seen the statistics.

39,876. You have had some information supplied to you by Mr. Gillie, the chief criminal officer of Glasgow?—Yes.

39,877. He has stated that "it is, with few exceptions, "considered highly discreditable for parties to be "living in cohabitation without marriage, and in such "cases they invariably pass themselves off to neighbours as married persons. This is easily contrived "in Glasgow, by reason of the fact that there are "numerous 'farmed-out houses' (i.e., houses which "the tenant sub-lets in sets of one or more furnished "rooms) where they can put up, and in these places "not thirty per cent. of the parties living in cohabitation are lawfully married." That is what he informed you?—That is his information, and nobody knows the conditions of the lowest classes better than he does.

39,878. He further says: "I do not think there is "any falling off in the feeling of desirability on the "part of the woman to be married, rather than live in "cohabitation, and in this the money consideration has "but little bearing"?—Yes.

39,879. In your next sentence you are dealing with what you gather was an assertion, that in Scotland the marriage service does not distinctly bind couples together for life, and you say that assertion is utterly misleading?—Utterly misleading.

39,880. What is the marriage service in your Church?—In the Church of Scotland and in the Presbyterian churches generally there is no liturgy, and, as one might say, there is no form of service actually prescribed, but invariably there is some such phrase—the actual wording may differ—as till death do part the couple. That is invariably used. I have never been at a marriage and never heard one celebrated without that phrase being used.

39,881. Impressing on the two parties that it is a binding union for life?—Yes.

39,882. You say, further on, separations have not been frequent in your experience, and you mention two cases. What do they show?—I mention the fact of so few having happened to show that, after all, divorce as a rule is very seldom sought for, comparatively, I mean.

39,883. You mention one case in Glasgow, in which the husband and wife each returned to the parental roof, living close together, and are living now, after 35 years, still unreconciled?—Yes.

39,884. In the other case you mention the husband disappeared?—Yes.

39,885. Those are the only two within your own knowledge?—Within my own personal observation.

39,886. You deal in the next paragraph with the forgiveness which is shown by wives to husbands?—Yes.

39,887. Perhaps you will read that yourself, and see if that is what you wish to convey?—"That there are many unhappy marriages is undeniable, but, as a rule, the unhappiness is carefully concealed. And the way in which wives screen their husbands' faults and make no complaint of neglect and cruelty, usually arising from dissipation, is most touching and beautiful." This is my own observation. I have known numbers of cases where certainly the marriage has not been happy, and where as a general rule the husband has been unreasonable and cruel in most cases, but, on the other hand, the wife has screened the husband, and has borne with it in a very remarkable manner.

39,888. Will you kindly read on?—"But in the slums of Glasgow, according to the chief criminal officer, separation and desertion "exist to an appalling 'extent.' In one half year, 895 deserted wives applied for help. The same authority states that there is 'little or no sign of any decrease in the 'number of cases.' In his opinion this is 'one of the most serious questions of the day,' and what renders it specially serious is 'the utter unconcern of the general public.'"

39,889. What remedy do either you or he suggest for that?—I do not know that there is any particular remedy beyond the raising of the standard of good feeling. The lodging-houses in Glasgow, the farmed-out houses, and even the model lodging-houses have become, according to the statement of the inspector of the poor, Mr. Motion, who is an extremely competent man, too much used by men deserting their wives and families, and there is difficulty in tracing them. Of course, the remedy in the eye of the law would be to get hold of these men if possible, to trace them and seek them out, and force them to maintain their wives and families, 39,890. Perhaps you will kindly continue your proof?—I believe Mr. Motion's report upon desertion has been forwarded to your lordship.

39,891. I am not sure?—I have not a copy with me, but it is a very important document.

39,892. I will enquire of the secretary?—He has in a recent memorandum indicated that, while the causes of desertion of wives and children by husbands and fathers are many and complex, there are seven causes conspicuous. I am simply stating Mr. Motion's views, but I believe they will be found to be correct on the whole. The causes are: "1. Pernicious home "influence in childhood and youth. 2. Drunkenness, "immorality, infidelity, and gross neglect of parental "duty. 3. Aversion to work in general, and to settled "employment in particular (casual labour). 4. "Ignorance of household management on the part of "the wives. 5. Mixed marriages (i.e., between Pro-"testants and Roman Catholics). 6. Early marriages. "7. Total absence of religious influences."

39,893. The secretary tells me he is not sure whether he has had that or not. If not, will it be possible for you to send us a copy of the pamphlet?—I shall be glad to send it.*

39,894. Will you kindly read on?—"Cases are not unknown to me in which, after long separation and estrangement, reconciliation has taken place and has been followed by a singularly happy life. Irregular marriages, marriages without the benediction of the Church, are not regarded with general approval. People may have ceased to attend church, may by preference have banns published at the registrar's office rather than in church, but the wedding itself is not regarded as perfectly respectable unless it is performed by a minister. The fact that in Scotland the mere acknowledgment of each other before witnesses as man and wife constitutes a legal union makes it remarkable that such marriages are exceedingly uncommon." I mean comparatively uncommon, of course. "I am inclined to think that the recognition of such marriages, contrary to what might be supposed, is an evidence of the reverence with which marriage is regarded. The solemn words, 'I take thee to be my wife or husband,' are not to be uttered lightly. That, if uttered at all, even in jest, they must be held as binding, is a prevalent belief. I am, perhaps, scarcely qualified to speak regarding the national sentiment on the subject of divorce in general, but so far as I can ascertain, the rightness of divorce for desertion is accepted without demur, and any attempt to abolish it would be met with a strong opposition, although there is certainly no desire for the introduction of a system of divorce on lighter grounds. It is conceivable that there may be a feeling, more widely spread than has found expression, as to the propriety of permitting divorce in certain cases, such as incurable insanity, where it might be argued that death, virtual if not actual, has taken place." I am here giving what I believe to be the views of other people, but I think this view is probably held by a minority; at the same time, some do hold that incurable insanity should be a ground, but the very utmost rigour would be exercised, as I believe in Scotland always is the case, in making certain that it was incurable.

39,895. On the other point, take the two cases that are allowed by the Scotch law, adultery and malicious desertion. Is it your view that is in general accordance with the Scotch feeling?—Entirely. I am on surer ground when I say that the Scottish rule whereby unfaithfulness in the husband is treated as severely as unfaithfulness in the wife is supported by public opinion, and that there is a growing feeling that, while divorce should be difficult for every class, it ought not to be easier for the rich than for the poor to obtain it. It is true that the sum for which a poor person may obtain divorce is in itself small, but it is not likely to be less than 10*l.*, and however little that may seem to many, it is a practical impossibility for many others to raise it. "There are hundreds," to quote again the chief criminal officer of Glasgow, Mr. Gillie, "of poor "persons irrevocably tied to the most profligate, "wanton, and degraded spouses, simply because they "cannot, and have no prospect of ever being able to "gather together the sum of 10*l.* to get their legal "remedy."

39,896. That is a very strong and emphatic statement, but we have had a good deal of evidence as to the advantages of the poor's roll system in Scotland. Apparently that does not seem to meet these cases?—My own impression was that it was somewhat easier than the chief criminal officer represents it, but I am stating his view, and he is thoroughly acquainted with the condition of affairs in Glasgow and amongst the people.

39,897. Does that mean, according to what you understand him to have said, that even with the poor's roll the people must collect 10*l.* or so to get their cases through?—The 10*l.* must come from somewhere or other, and I do not know—I am not qualified to state—whether it is given from the public funds.

39,898. Perhaps it is for witnesses, and so on?—I could not answer that question.

39,899. That is Mr. Gillie's statement?—Yes. It is also borne out by what the inspector told me.

39,900. Even with that system?—It is a difficult thing for anyone to obtain divorce. Of course I have occasionally, very seldom, but perhaps three or four times, signed papers, the wife indicating that she was unable to pay herself, in order to get on to the poor's roll.

39,901. On those occasions have you gathered what expense it would put them to?—I could not answer that question, but this is upon the authority of one who knows. It may be different in other cities, of course.

39,902. You said that there was a growing feeling as to something?—There is a growing feeling that while divorce should be difficult for every class it ought not be easier for the rich than for the poor to obtain it.

39,903. What indications of that growing feeling have come before you?—Merely in conversation I have heard the opinion expressed pretty frequently, and I believe that it is the feeling of those who think about such matters in general.

39,904. Will you read your last paragraph?—"I am of opinion that in Scotland the propriety of the innocent partner marrying again in the lifetime of the divorced spouse is questioned only by a few. Whether the guilty should be allowed to marry again, would be held doubtful by many."

* "Memorandum and Report by the Inspector of Poor with reference to Desertion Cases."—H. G. B.

39,905. (Mr. Brierley.) You say that the chief criminal officer in Glasgow tells you in one half year 895 deserted wives applied for help. Do you know whether that means they applied to the sheriff's court for maintenance orders or for poor relief?—I should think for poor relief, but I cannot say.

39,906. Is it your experience that the result of those frequent desertions is that these wives live with other men?—That may happen in some cases, but I am not prepared to say that it is general by any means.

39,907. Is that the opinion of Mr. Gillie?—I did not put that question to him, but from conversations I have had with the inspector I should think that it is occasional only. As a general rule I think it is the husband.

39,908. Mr. Gillie thinks the expense of obtaining divorce does sometimes lead to that?—Yes.

39,909. (Lord Guthrie.) Although a parish minister, I suppose you have come into contact with all denominations?—Yes.

39,910. Visiting in the course of your parish work?—Yes.

39,911. Both Protestant and Catholic?—I cannot say so much about the Roman Catholics in Glasgow especially, but in country parishes I knew them just as well as I knew my own people.

39,912. And many Protestants, both State Church and dissenters?—Yes.

39,913. We have had statistics which Lord Gorell asked you about which you did not know. They seem to show that to some extent the divorces are higher amongst those who profess to belong to the Church of Scotland than amongst those who profess to belong to the dissenters. There is nothing in that, is there, because there are a certain number of people who for the sake of respectability return themselves as belonging to the Established Church but have no church connection at all?—I suppose there are some who do so. I have not seen the statistics and cannot enter into them.

39,914. One would not attach any importance to a mere difference of that kind?—Personally I should not be inclined to.

39,915–6. The law of the Church of Scotland on this matter as laid down in the standards is in unison with the law of the State entirely. So that no practical difficulty arises as the law is now between Church and State in regard to this matter?—There is nothing in regard to divorce that I am aware of that causes any difficulty whatever.

39,917. So far as you are aware, has there been any proposal at any time or now in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland to alter the law of the Church?—None whatever that I am aware of. I suppose you mean with reference to desertion especially?

39,918. To desertion and to divorce generally?—I have never heard of any proposal of the kind.

39,919. If any such alteration were to be made by the Church, that would involve an Act of Parliament as well as an Act of the General Assembly?—Yes.

39,920. The General Assembly is a legislative body as well as judicial and administrative?—Yes.

39,921. Which represents and speaks for the Church as a whole?—Yes.

39,922. Composed half of laity and half of clergy?—Yes.

39,923. In practice what is done in the case of the innocent person, who has divorced the guilty spouse, proposing to re-marry?—So far as I am aware there would be no opposition made to that in any quarter. There are some, of course, who would object. As I understand, it is in accordance with custom and the general feeling.

39,924. In Scotland what is the practice in regard to marrying in the Church and marrying in private houses?—As a matter of fact, the law of the Church, and I believe the law of the land, is that marriages should take place in church. In the time of John Knox it was very clearly laid down that marriages should be there, in the face of the congregation, and, indeed, it was to be upon Sunday, and the contracting couple were to receive the Communion. That was the theory of John Knox. How long that was acted on I am not sure. It was only about the beginning of the 18th century that for fashion's sake marriages in church began to grow less frequent and were performed in private houses. It is within living memory that marriages had become almost unknown in church and were performed in private houses, but now, for the last 30 or 40 years, marriages have again come to be celebrated in church, and many people at first were inclined to think it was imitating the practice of other countries and communions, whereas it was merely a return to the actual law.

39,925. Like some other reforms?—Yes.

39,926. In the case of an innocent person re-marrying, would there be any objection to being married in church any more than in a private house?—That has never come before my observation, but I should not think there would be.

39,927. Is there any element of that kind entering into the question, whether it is church or private house?—We regard house marriage quite as sacred.

39,928. It is often a matter of convenience and sometimes a matter of fashion?—Yes. I regret to say, a great many marriages are now performed in hotels, which is, perhaps, a lower depth than private houses.

39,929. You attach importance to there being a ceremony of some solemnity?—I do, certainly.

39,930. What is that founded on—experience that it does produce a good effect?—I believe that in this case, just as in any other case, a solemn ceremony is of great importance, affecting the friends of those who take part in it.

39,931. What do you say to the proposal that all marriages should be civil marriages, leaving the parties to have any religious ceremony they choose? What do you think would be the effect of that?—I am scarcely prepared to answer that question.

39,932. Do you think it would lead to a great many who now have a religious ceremony and are benefited thereby, contenting themselves with a civil ceremony only?—I do not think so to a great extent. I understand that what are called irregular marriages have somewhat increased of late years.

39,933. Before the registrar?—Yes, before the registrar only; it is a matter purely of convenience, I think. As I have said here, I believe, perhaps not in the very lowest class, but pretty far down, the feeling is that such a marriage is irregular, and is barely respectable unless it has the benediction of the Church.

39,934. You think practically the great mass of marriages with religious ceremony would still continue?—I believe so.

39,935. What about the guilty person? Supposing the guilty person proposes to re-marry, not the paramour, but a third person, and comes to the minister, what happens? I will also add this, that he comes to the minister and shows evidence of contrition for what he had done. What does the minister do?—The case has never come before me, and I am not prepared to say what I might personally do. I have indicated that the general feeling is much more doubtful in regard to that than in regard to the innocent party, where practically there would be little difficulty at all, but I can conceive reasons even in the case of the guilty party—I think it would depend on circumstances—and, personally, I think I should be in some cases inclined at once to refuse, but in other cases I should be inclined to perform the ceremony.

39,936. When you say it depends on circumstances, does it not come to this, that the question is generally considered apart from repentance. Supposing a guilty person satisfies you he is genuinely penitent and says he is not so constituted that he can live alone, and you come to be convinced that to keep him in the straight path re-marriage is the only course, is that the kind of case where you would be inclined to allow it?—There certainly would be some reason in such a case as that.

39,937. But for a guilty person to merely come to ask you to re-marry him, it would be refused?—He would be refused at once. There is one point, perhaps; I do not know whether it has been stated here before; others are much more competent to show the strictness of the law of divorce in Scotland and the difficulty of obtaining it; it is only from the Court of Session that it can be obtained. I have heard it has been stated here—I do not know whether I am right in saying so—that it could be obtained in other courts, the sheriffs' courts, but I understand it is only in cases of separation, and that divorce must be obtained from the Court of Session itself.

39,938. You approve of that?—I approve of it.

39,939. Suppose the guilty person proposes to marry the paramour, what would be done then?—I know of a case—I do not know the parties personally—but there is a case which is in my mind in which that has happened, and I have been thinking a good deal about it, and I confess in that particular case I suspect that most people would think it was almost an advantage; at the same time, it is very questionable, but the thing has been done. I do not know by whom they were married; I do not know whether they were married in England or Scotland.

39,940. When you say "an advantage," that means in relation to the particular case?—Yes, and in relation to morality.

39,941. In the particular case?—Yes.

39,942 On the other hand, you see, it has been said to be a serious possibility because it encourages immorality. Many married women who fall would not fall unless in the expectation that things would be made right by the paramour?—I see that difficulty, and that is what makes it so extremely important, I think, that it should be very rare indeed, but there are special cases where probably it might be allowed.

39,943. There, again, would it depend upon whether the guilty spouse proposing marriage showed evidence of contrition?—I think it should depend somewhat upon that.

39,944. In Scotland men and women are on an equality on the question of divorce?—So I am informed.

39,945. Do you approve of that?—Yes.

39,946. Is that also in accordance with Scotch feeling and opinion?—As far as I know.

39,947. Of course, in Scotland, as everywhere else, you have the population divided into three classes: first, those who have a real Church connection; second, those who have a nominal Church connection; and, third, those who have none at all. In regard to the first class, there is no question of divorce or separation at all?—As a general rule I think that is so.

39,948. It is the rarest thing in the world?—In my experience I have scarcely ever come across it, in fact never.

39,949. The question arises in the case of those who have a merely nominal Church connection, for the sake of respectability, or who have none at all?—Yes.

39,950. In regard to the poor, you referred to the certificate which the minister grants. That relates to the circumstances of the parties, and also, so far as the minister knows, they are of a respectable character?—I do not think it says much about their personal character. So far as I am aware, it is simply that they are in reduced circumstances, or unable to bear the expenses of the action.

39,951. There is also a very general statement that, so far as is known, they are respectable?—I had forgotten that at the moment. The certificates do bear that, but I had not thought of that in this case.

39,952. If that be so necessarily, I suppose there are a certain number of poor persons, the criminal poor, for instance, who could not get on the Poor's Roll because they could not get the certificate?—Yes. Certainly never anyone of the criminal classes has applied to me so far as I can remember. In every case that I can remember the people have been themselves what one would call respectable.

39,953. I do not know whether you have formed any opinion upon this. There is a proposal before us that the details of divorce cases should not be published in the papers. Have you any opinion on that?—I think it would be a very great advantage if they were not published?

39,954. Do you think, in saying that, you represent a general feeling?—So far as I have had any opportunity, I should say I am representing the general feeling.

39,955. You referred to the marriage service and the words that it was for life. Is it the practice also in your experience that the Scriptural words are always used, "Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder"?—I have invariably heard those words. They invariably use them, and I never was at a marriage in all my life in which such a phrase was not employed, and the Scriptural words, certainly.

39,956. (Lady Frances Balfour.) With regard to the question of the words in the marriage service, "Till death do us part," it has been suggested that they are not compatible with divorce for desertion, but I suppose there the feeling is that death has ended the contract if there is a separation: it is the same as death?—It is the same as death practically. I understand if a man disappears for seven years by the Scotch law he is regarded as virtually dead, and it is after four years' desertion that divorce is granted. Even then it is after strict investigation. The mere fact of a person appearing and saying that the husband has disappeared for four years is not allowed unless a very strict examination indeed has been made and proof brought, but in this matter, of course, my legal friends can say more than I can.

39,957. In using the words over a married couple with all solemnity you feel in the background it is consistent with divorce for desertion?—Perfectly so. The ideal and intention is that marriage is indissoluble, but when it is dissolved in that particular way, by death or by desertion, naturally it is consistent.

39,958. I want to ask about the class in the slums of Glasgow. We know they are not the most elevated, and we know they are not Scottish, most of them: they are Irish?—Very largely.

39,959. When the officer, Mr. Gillie, the inspector of the poor, speaks of their habits and the lowness of their homes, he does not distinguish between the two nations?—No.

39,960. We do know as a matter of fact they are chiefly Irish?—Yes. It did not occur to me to ask him that question. I am not aware whether he would be able to answer it or not.

39,961. I think any of us who know Glasgow, know the worst slums are inhabited by the Irish?—There is a new work coming out just now in a good many volumes, the Catholic Encyclopædia, and the article on Scotland, or Glasgow, states that there are 380,000 Roman Catholics in Glasgow. Personally, I believe, that is considerably exaggerated, but such a huge figure would not be given unless there were a very great many. I believe myself—of course I am only speaking from conjecture and observation—there can be no doubt whatever that a very large proportion of that 380,000 or 250,000, whatever the figure is, live in the very lowest quarters of the town.

39,962. Glasgow should not be the town to take as representing even the type of morals which we do not like in our Scottish people, because it is not a Scottish type?—In the slums there are certainly a very great many.

39,963. Of the Irish?—There are districts even in Edinburgh where a great many of the population are Irish.

39,964. (The Archbishop of York.) You would make a distinction, following on what Lady Frances Balfour has said, between the type of people you have dealt with in the congregation and parish of the cathedral in Glasgow and what are generally called the slums?—Yes.

39,965. You say that the slums are inhabited by Irish Roman Catholics; but we have had evidence from London and elsewhere that the Irish Roman Catholics very seldom, in the experience of their clergy, apply for separation, and never, of course, contemplate divorce. Would you think, therefore, that because a very large number of the very poor in Glasgow or elsewhere are Irish Roman Catholics, it follows that these are the people who are applying continually for separation or divorce?—Of course I cannot say.

I have not examined the statistics. We come across the individuals, but the facts are, as Lady Frances has said, there is a huge number of Irish in Glasgow, and they mostly live in these quarters, and if a very large proportion of cases of divorce come from these quarters, I should naturally assume a very large proportion must be from the Irish, but that is merely an inference.

39,966. You know any such proposal on their part would practically separate them from their religion?—So it is said.

39,967. Would you not agree that, even in religious Scotland, there is a very large and possibly growing mass, even of Scottish people, who have slipped away from any kind of connection with religion?—I should say it is very like England in that respect. I do not know that there is any special difference in that respect. I think statistics show—I have seen these, at any rate—that in London, for example, the proportion of those who have drifted away from all church attendance is very much larger than in Glasgow or Edinburgh, or any Scottish town I am acquainted with.

39,968. I should say that is true. Would it not follow from that that there is a much more widely diffused respect for religion among the working poor in Scotland than possibly in England or other countries?—I do not like to make invidious comparisons, but amongst the poor in Scotland I have come across very frequently those who do not attend church, but certainly do show great reverence for sacred things, and would be wounded unutterably in their feelings if they were thought to be separated from the Church.

39,969. That would account largely for the fact that it is so universal a custom even to require a religious ceremony of marriage as almost necessarily to make it respectable?—That prevails very largely even where one would not expect it among the people, as far as I have found out. One great reason in Scotland more than in other countries why people drift away from the Church is that simply they have not clothes good enough to go to church in. To a most extraordinary extent that feeling prevails amongst the poor.

39,970. That fortifies what you said in answer to Lord Guthrie. You think even if civil marriage was made in all cases compulsory, the Scottish poor would still feel it was right to have a religious service at their marriages?—I think to a great extent it would be so.

39,971. With regard to the grounds of divorce in Scotland, has it been usual in the ordinary teaching of the people to base the marriage laws on Scriptural grounds, on the grounds of our Lord's words?—I do not know that it is frequently the subject of discourses. I think it has been always taken for granted that our Lord's words are the basis. I do not think anybody questions that.

39,972. Has there been in your knowledge any considerable attempt to justify divorce for desertion upon similar Scriptural grounds?—That has been invariably the rule in Scotland ever since the Reformation, and I do not think it has been under discussion at all.

39,973. Is it accepted rather as the result of the Reformation than based on Scriptural grounds?—It is supposed to be the Scriptural inference, at any rate, and it is regarded as in accordance with the spirit of the New Testament.

39,974. How far do you think that would apply to any extension such as you indicate the possibility of—to insanity, and so forth?—It would be upon the same ground, but, personally, I am not indicating the slightest desire for a change in that respect. I only say I have heard the opinion expressed that the same rule would apply in that case if it were ever to become law. It would be simply on the ground that the person should be regarded as virtually dead. It would be one of extreme difficulty.

39,975. You would say that the principle limiting any possible ground should be that one of the parties should be regarded as practically dead?—Yes.

39,976. Do you think there would be any opinion in Scotland which would go beyond that?—I do not think there would be, as a general rule. I may say, personally, I was very much struck the other day when I saw a brief notice of Sir James Crichton Browne's evidence here, in which he stated, if one granted divorce for insanity, one would probably need to go further and grant it for other diseases. I do not think that that would be accepted, but it showed me an additional difficulty, and, personally, I should be less inclined than ever to support such a proposition.

39,977. With your very great knowledge of public opinion in Scotland, have you come across any widespread feeling that there ought to be an extension of these grounds of divorce beyond adultery and desertion in Scotland?—I do not think there is any desire for any change whatever in the present law.

39,978. I want to ask you another question which I think will be of interest to us. In answer to Lord Guthrie you anticipated a question I would like to have asked you, possibly with the same interest in the matter. In speaking about discipline I should like to ask, is the responsibility for taking part in the marriage of any couple left entirely in the hands of the individual minister?—That is to say, there is no form of words actually prescribed.

39,979. I did not mean that; but is it left entirely to the discretion of the minister in each case whether he shall or shall not be present and take part in the religious ceremony of a marriage?—Whether the minister must be present?

39,980. No. Is it left to the discretion of the minister whether or not he shall in the case of any couple marry them or not?—I have heard the statement made that any couple coming, producing due credentials, the minister is obliged to marry them, but I never heard of it being put to the test. Personally, if I was convinced there was anything wrong, I would refuse at once.

39,981. So far as you know, you would not be subject to any penalties from the State for so doing?—Not so far as I am aware, unless it was a mere vexatious refusal on my part. If I had a proper ground for refusing, I do not think the State, or anybody, would interfere.

39,982. Still more so, supposing a couple, one of whom was a guilty party in a divorce suit, asked to be allowed to be married at the cathedral in Glasgow, you would consider that you were entirely within your rights in deciding whether or not you would allow the church to be so used?—I think I should be quite within my rights in refusing.

39,983. Would you regard it as an undue interference on the part of the State if you were in any case compelled to marry a couple at the cathedral?—I should not like to be compelled to do anything by the State.

39,984. I think we all appreciate that. With regard to the exercise of discipline, in the Church of Scotland it would be left entirely to the minister and kirk session to decide in each case whether a person ought or ought not to receive Holy Communion?—It might, but it never came before me, and I never consulted the kirk session about such a matter.

39,985. I am asking you: as a matter of fact it is left entirely with the minister and kirk session to decide as to who should or should not be admitted to Communion?—I beg your pardon; to the Communion, certainly.

39,986. It is absolutely at their discretion?—Yes.

39,987. Should I be right in saying that the Church of Scotland would greatly resent the idea that any mere law of Parliament should dictate to the minister and kirk session who they should or should not admit to Communion?—Most emphatically, I do not think the State would have anything to do with that. I have never heard of it interfering.

39,988. Although the Church of Scotland is an Established Church, it would not consider it belonged to Establishment that the State should tell the ministers and kirk session who they should or should not admit to Holy Communion?—Certainly. We claim, rightly or wrongly, to be absolutely free.

39,989. (Sir William Anson.) I understand that the Scotch law in respect of grounds of divorce differs from the English law in two ways, the equality of men and women in respect of infidelity, and the power of obtaining divorce on the ground of desertion?—I believe so.

39,990. Both those are in accord with public opinion in Scotland?—Quite.

39,991. That is to say, the Scotch people would resent the withdrawal of the right on the ground of desertion?—I think that they would.

39,992. Supposing the grounds to be limited to adultery?—I think there would probably be opposition, perhaps widespread opposition. On the other hand, there is not the slightest desire, as far as I am aware, for any extension, unless, as I have indicated, it might do on the ground of incurable insanity.

39,993. Desertion is not mere absence, but absence with evident intent not to resume cohabitation?—Yes, and where the man has deliberately ——

39,994. Maliciously?—Or deliberately, at any rate, gone away.

39,995. You would not yourself advocate extension on the grounds of divorce?—Certainly not.

39,996. You are not aware of any feeling in favour of it?—I do not know of any widespread feeling; there may be a feeling on the part of some.

39,997. I observe you say that there is a feeling that access to the remedy of divorce is not the same for rich and poor, owing to expense?—They have access, but it is very difficult. It is, as a matter of fact, more difficult, I think, although they have these advantages and these opportunities.

39,998. You would be in favour of putting it within the power of a poor person to obtain the same remedy as a rich person?—I think there should be equality.

39,999. You also would be in favour of retaining the jurisdiction in the Court of Session?—Certainly.

40,000. How would you redress the inequality?—I am not prepared to offer any suggestion.

40,001. You are not altering the jurisdiction?—I do not know that there is any need of any particular alteration, because the idea is that there is really equality in the opportunity of finding relief in Scotland, at least, more than elsewhere, but at the time, there is no desire that divorce should be made easier anywhere.

40,002. In order to bring the law within the reach of the poor, which, as you say, it is not always now, could you offer any suggestion?—It is within the reach of the poor, the poor's roll. I am quoting the words of Mr. Gillie, there as to the amount that is needed, but, of course, I have been speaking also of the poor's roll in which people may be able to ——

40,003. I was referring rather to your proof. You say "It is true that the sum for which a poor person may obtain divorce is in itself small, but it is not likely to be less than 10*l.*, and however little that may seem to many, it is a practical impossibility for many others to raise it."

(Chairman.) I think the witness is only the moderator, and a barrister will help us a little more.

40,004. (Sir William Anson.) I wanted to know whether the witness had any suggestion to offer, inasmuch as he was anxious to retain the jurisdiction of the Court of Session?—The legal authorities would be more able to deal with that.

40,005. With regard to the last sentence, "Whether the guilty should be allowed to marry again would be held doubtful by many"; that is to say, a guilty party may not with the other guilty party, but with some third person?—I mean marrying some third party.

40,006. When you say "should be allowed to marry again," do you mean whether that marriage should be lawful, or whether he should be entitled to the blessing of the Church?—I was not taking that practically into consideration; but that they should be allowed to marry, I say "it is doubtful." I am not expressing my own opinion, but what I have heard expressed by others.

40,007. When you say "allowed to marry," do you mean whether the marriage should be lawful?—Certainly. I do not think there is any unlawful marriage. When one says they are allowed to marry, I presume that it would be a lawful marriage.

40,008. You were not thinking of the service?—No.

40,009. But of the legality of it?—Yes.

40,010. Is a marriage in a house always attended with a religious ceremony?—Certainly, always, unless it may be one of those extremely uncommon marriages where one declares the other to be husband or wife. That in itself, before witnesses, is, according to Scottish law, accepted as a contract according to the law of contract, I believe. My legal friends would answer that.

40,011. As a rule the religious ceremony takes place, whether the marriage is in a house or church?—Always.

40,012. And the minister would have a right to refuse if he thought there was anything wrong?—Certainly; as a general rule he asks. That is not invariable, but as a general rule it is asked if there is anyone who has any objection to offer.

40,013. As regards the re-marriage of the two guilty parties, have you any opinion whether public morality might not be improved if that were rendered impossible?—There is a good deal to be said on both sides as it is, but I have not made up my mind.

40,014. You spoke of an individual case in which you thought it would be the best thing for the parties?—It seemed to me in that particular case that it perhaps tended more to morality than a refusal would have done, but I would not make it general.

40,015. Is it not perilous to legislate on individual cases?—Very perilous indeed.

40,016. (Chairman.) Following up a point the Archbishop of York asked you about, with regard to the discretion that rests in the minister to admit a person to Communion, I suppose that is a discretion based on what would be considered evil living in some form?—Yes. On one occasion I have refused to admit a man to Communion.

40,017. Would there be any right of appeal on his part to any higher authority than the minister who dealt with the matter?—He could appeal to a higher Church court. I am not sure whether it has been appealed to the law courts.

40,018. (Chairman.) In what court would that appeal lie?—He would have a right of appeal to the presbytery.

40,019. Of the whole Church?—No, the presbytery corresponds, roughly speaking, to a diocese in England.

40,020. The presbytery of the district?—Yes.

40,021. Would there be an appeal to the general assembly?—There would be an appeal from that to the synod.

40,022. And from that to the assembly?—To the General Assembly.

40,023. There might be a dispute about facts, apart from the exercise of the discretion. A minister might take a view of facts which might be open to criticism?—It might be open to criticism.

40,024. In that way there would be a right of appeal on facts and discretion?—There would be an appeal, because it is conceivable a minister might, on some untrue gossip or otherwise, refuse to admit a man. It would be unreasonable if he had not a right to justify his character.

40,025. (The Archbishop of York.) Of course you would emphasize the point that all the way through from kirk session to presbytery, and presbytery to synod and synod to general assembly, the appeal is to a spiritual court?—Yes.

40,026. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Just as in England?—I am not qualified to speak about that.

40,027. (Sir William Anson.) Is it not a condition of membership of the Church in Scotland that the right to Communion is dependent on the discretion or permission of the minister?—Admitted by the minister and kirk session. It is the minister and kirk session who have the right of admitting or rejecting. In practice it is the minister alone.

40,028. It is part of the condition of membership of the Church that the right to Communion should be so dependent?—It is so, but we admit anyone at our own discretion as a matter of fact.

40,029. (Lord Guthie.) You were not quoting your own experience, you quoted the Roman Catholic statement with regard to that 380,000. I think by "Glasgow" there must have been included the rest of Scotland—Lanark, and all those places—because there are only about 450,000 Roman Catholics in Scotland altogether?—I merely saw this statement; it was purely accidental.

40,030. "Glasgow" may have been used in a wider sense?—Nor have I seen the volume. I merely saw it mentioned in a review of the book.

(Chairman.) Let me thank you very much for your evidence and the assistance you have given us; I am sure it will be of great advantage to us.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER NICHOLSON JOHNSTON, K.C., LL.D., called and examined.

40,031. (Chairman.) You are one of His Majesty's counsel in Scotland and an LL.D., and you are sheriff principal of the county of Perth, and have been a sheriff in successive sheriffdoms for nearly 10 years?—Yes.

40,032. You make a note that "a sheriff principal "continues to be a practising advocate in Edinburgh, "and holds courts only occasionally in his sheriffdom, "the sheriff substitute being the resident local judge"?—Yes.

40,033. You are also procurator of the Church of Scotland, that is, the standing counsel and legal assessor of the Church. You have been a member of the General Assembly of the Church since 1892, and I take it you are familiar with ecclesiastical law and practice?—I think so.

40,034. You have taken considerable interest in questions of consistorial law?—Yes.

40,035. I do not think you need trouble to tell us anything about the present state of the law in Scotland; we have had that very fully; but I should like to ask you, passing to the next paragraph, in Scotland the law has recognised adultery and desertion as grounds of divorce for a very long time. Has that recognition by the State been in harmony with the general law of the Church?—It has been in harmony with the law of the Church.

40,037. Which was ratified in 1690?—Yes.

40,038. I think we have the text of the Westminster Confession on the note. I will pass to a later portion of your proof. Do you consider that that confessional doctrine is still in accordance, not only with the law, but also with the prevalent sentiment in the Church?—I do.

40,039. To what extent do you think there is any opinion in Scotland going beyond those two cases?—I do not think there is any general opinion. You will find individual opinions which suggest some one cause and some another; but I do not think there is any general opinion in favour of any extension of the grounds of divorce.

40,040. You say you reserve your opinion upon the case of incurable insanity. To what extent has that subject been brought up to enable you to form a view or to express the views which have been formed about it?—Except in a merely theoretical, and occasionally speculative conversation, I do not think it has been seriously considered till this Commission called attention to it.

40,041. Since then?—It has been discussed, and different opinions one way or the other have been expressed; but I cannot say that there is any general concensus one way or the other. I should say there would be a considerable volume of opinion in favour of it if the public could be satisfied of the possibility of establishing insanity as quite equivalent to intellectual death.

40,041*a*. That, put in other words, would mean if it was a perfectly hopeless case, and it was reasonably sure it was so, of incarceration?—Yes. Even then I should not say opinion would be unanimously in favour of it.

40,042. Passing on a little further, you have views to express as to the sentences of penal servitude?—Yes. I think penal servitude is an illustration of what might strike the popular mind in the first moment as being a good case for divorce, but such a rule would involve inextricable difficulties, and marriage would be dissoluble or not according as a judge in his discretion deemed three years or five years the appropriate sentence in a case, say, of embezzlement. Great difficulties would arise in the cases of pardon, release for special good conduct, discharge for ill health, &c., which all go to show how inconsistent it would be with the marriage relationship that there should be any such possibility of relaxation. I have already had a considerable experience of criminals, as Crown counsel, and there are very few convicts who have wives who are anxious to be released from them. They are either a low criminal class, or else men who have got in for embezzlement, whose wives do not desire release, and are glad to welcome them back.

40,043. Will you kindly pass on to the difference between the English and the Scotch law. Perhaps you will read that paragraph, because it is important?—"The most important difference between the divorce law of England and that of Scotland is the recognition of desertion as a ground of divorce in Scotland. I do not propose to argue this question in its ecclesiastical or religious aspect, but I may point out that in my view there is in England very often a misunderstanding upon this question. The doctrine that it is unlawful to put away a spouse for any cause other than adultery was not denied, but it was accepted by those who gave ecclesiastical sanction to divorce for desertion. The Scriptural condemnation of the putting an end to marriage by desertion was recognised, but it is the deserting not the deserted spouse who is condemned. It is the deserter who puts away the spouse and brings the marriage relationship to an end. The decree of divorce is the official recognition and registration of the fact that the deserting spouse has departed from the marriage, and that the marriage relationship no longer subsists. Be this as it may, however, divorce for desertion has obtained in Scotland ever since the Reformation, and is supported by both popular and ecclesiastical opinion. There is no desire to depart from it. On the whole the system works well, and is not often abused for the purpose of obtaining with some delay what is really a divorce by mutual consent. No doubt, however, there are sometimes cases where one spouse in effect says to the other: 'We are not 'hitting it off. It would be better for both of us to 'part, and in four years you will get your divorce.' This does not, however, often happen, and the great majority of divorces for desertion are cases where one spouse has maliciously abandoned the other. The attempt to find a justification for divorce for desertion in the theory that the deserting spouse generally commits adultery, does not appear to me to be successful. It is illogical, and in the case at all events of women of all but the lowest class who desert, it is not in accordance with fact."

40,044. You say there on the whole the system works well. Do you think that the fact that there is a ground of divorce for four years' malicious desertion in any way tends to lessen the regard for the marriage tie?—I think not. Whether it might have that effect in a country introducing it for the first time I do not know; but it has been long established and accepted in Scotland, and at a time when the marriage vow was, perhaps, regarded generally as more sacred even than at present, and I do not think in these circumstances that it tends to relax the sanctity with which marriage is regarded.

40,045. You put it on the previous page that the deserting spouse brings the marriage to a termination, and all the court does in effect is to recognise the fact?—Yes, that is my view.

40,046. The next point in your evidence is with regard to the equality of the sexes. Perhaps you will read that, too?—"In regard to the question of what is called 'equality between the sexes,' I do not think that there is any desire for change in Scotland, or indeed that any change would be assented to. I appreciate the theory of the distinction which the law of England draws, and I do not conceive it to be based upon any principle of inequality. There may undoubtedly be cases in which what has been described as a casual act of adultery on the part of a husband who is otherwise a good husband and father is an insufficient ground for the disruption of a family, whereas on the other hand when a married woman goes astray it generally indicates a perversion of the domestic affections which is fatal to family life. A woman is protected much more than a man both by natural modesty and by social conventions. The defiance of these indicates a greater degradation and perversion of affection on the part of a married woman than does similar conduct on the part of a man. The quality of the act may be the same in both cases, but the obstacle to be overcome in the case of a woman is such as to infer turpitude if she yields. But whilst this is so, in my view no satisfactory general rule can be devised to discriminate the class of case in which adultery on the part of the husband should not by itself warrant a divorce. Certain evils have, I understand, been found to attend the attempt to do so in England. In practice, too, the inequality which is involved in the treating of every case of adultery on the part of a husband as on the same footing with adultery on the part of a wife is redressed by the circumstances that casual infidelity on the part of the husband is seldom found out, and when it is found out it is very often forgiven." I will explain that, if I may illustrate it in this way. If you find that a man is once or twice seen the worse for drink, there is no reason why you should infer from that that he is an habitual drunkard; but if you find a woman of any social position once or twice the worse for drink it is a fair inference that she is an habitual drunkard, and whilst I regard a single or isolated fall due to sudden passion as not an adequate ground for putting an end to the marriage tie and breaking up a family, whether the husband or the wife be the offender, I think it is impossible to discriminate these cases from other cases, and that in the case of a woman it is extremely improbable that her misconduct is of this casual character and is not associated with a divorce of real affection from her husband. I do not think it possible to discriminate.

40,047. That has been the law in Scotland for over 300 years?—Yes.

40,048. What is your view of its practical working?—I do not think it works any mischief in the way of breaking up families unnecessarily. The late Lord Fraser was our greatest authority on consistorial law, and I remember him telling me—he had a very large experience—that he never knew a case where a wife divorced her husband who was an affectionate husband and father simply because he had gone wrong on a chance occasion. There was always something else, cruelty to her or the children, or desertion, or some other grave element in the case.

40,049. That is to say, in your view, if that is right, you might leave it safely to the working out of the discretionary right of the party to apply, whether it is husband or wife?—Yes.

40,050. Rather than differentiate by an express enactment of the law?—Yes. I think that differentiation does great harm, because it is very much misconceived and gives rise to what I think an unjust reproach against the law.

40,051. Your next point is with regard to the question of recrimination. In Scotland there is no power to refuse divorce, even though the petitioner has himself been guilty of an offence?—That is so.

40,052. Do you find that that is a law which should be changed in Scotland?—No, I do not think so. There is no demand for it, and I do not think any evil has arisen from it.

40,053. You know in England, although it is nominally discretionary, it has been so restricted as to be practically useless?—I am aware of that.

40,054. You think the Scottish rule is right?—I do.

40,055. Has it led to any abuse in your experience?—I do not think so. I have not known a case where it has led to any abuse.

40,056. As I understand the suggestion that is made in answer to it, it is that it removes any check upon the conduct of the petitioner?—Yes.

40,057. They may be guilty as they please, and yet come forward with a suit?—Yes.

40,058. The suggestion is we ought to look further back and put a check on it. That is the point that is rather indicated as a drawback to there being no power of recrimination. What do you say about that?—I see the theoretical force of that. I have known a fair number of cases in which there has been misconduct on both sides, but I cannot say I know a case where the present state of the law has been an operative element in bringing about the misconduct. I think, in any view (although in England, as your Lordship has explained, the rule of this plea being discretionary has been very nearly made obsolete), that where the system of granting divorce in cases of mutual misconduct exists as in Scotland, if it is altered it must be subject to a discretion. I strongly dislike discretions on the part of an individual judge as to whether he shall divorce people or not. I think it should be governed by the law as applied to the facts.

40,059. Whether right or wrong in theory, you do not think it has led to abuse in Scotland?—No, I do not know that I would introduce it if it did not exist.

40,060. You say at the end of that paragraph: "English law, however, seems to regard divorce as an equitable remedy to an injured spouse much more than does the law of Scotland, which treats it rather as the solemn annulling of a union of which the vows have been broken." That is rather looking at it from the State point of view, that it is no good continuing it if it cannot practically endure, whereas in England it is treated as if it was looked at too much from the point of view of the petitioner?—Yes.

40,061. The next is a point of practice. You regard the English system of giving discretionary power as to pecuniary consequences as better than the Scotch?—I do.

40,062. You want a wider power to reform settlements and meet the general justice of the case by wider powers?—Yes. Such powers are in the interest of morality, so that women although they have gone astray should not be left penniless.

40,063. The next point is a question about the tribunal. You maintain the desirability of exclusive jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and give these reasons: lessened solemnity, confusion as regards domicile, absence of uniformity of practice, only local publicity, no counsel to intervene between the solicitor who is in contact with the agent and the court. That summarises practically the disadvantages of an inferior court as compared with a superior court?—Yes.

40,064. You think divorce should be pecuniarily within the reach of the poor, but it should not be made easy. Will you kindly state in what particular you do not think it should be too easy?—In particular I do not think that divorce should be easy in the following respects:—(1) The procedure should be deliberate—slow if you please—divorce ought not to be obtainable a fortnight after the initiation of the proceedings. (2) Divorce should not be obtainable without the fullest publicity. (3) The information before the court in regard to the whole matrimonial relations of parties should be full and the scrutiny of the evidence should be rigid. (4) The court should be one of the highest authority, and should not be a court where ordinary jurisdiction is limited to minor matters.

40,065. You think that provided no insuperable financial difficulties are placed in the way of the poor, it is an advantage that the obtaining of divorce should involve anxious and irksome procedure?—I do.

40,066. Does the actual working out of your poor's roll system in Scotland enable the poor to get to the Supreme Court with their cases?—I have made inquiry into that matter within the last week or two, and I have a very short statement if you will allow me to read it.

40,067. Yes. A little confusion rests in my mind about it. In theory the poor's roll seems to enable the party to get to the court, but we had a witness who pointed out certain figure of expense which would practically be prohibitive to a poor person. If it will help us to appreciate how that is to be solved it will be of assistance?—I have made particular inquiry in regard to the expense to which poor litigants are put in connection with divorce proceedings in the Court of Session. There are four agents for the poor in civil causes, two writers to the Signet and two solicitors before the Supreme Court. I have obtained particulars from them all, covering some 80 cases. Three of these gentlemen have acted for nearly a year, and the fourth for nearly two years. The experience of all four is to a like effect. If the litigant is able to pay anything they ask for something to cover outlays, such as the fee to officers to serve the summons, the fee for the extract of the marriage, &c., and they frequently get a small sum, 2*l.* or 3*l.* 5*l.* is the maximum, and only one case was mentioned where so much was obtained. If the litigant is in poverty and can pay nothing the agent gets nothing to cover the outlays, and bears the expense himself. In no case has the agent declined to act because he got nothing. One agent who has had 23 cases has paid all the outlays in six. As regards witnesses, the practice is to tell the litigant he must bring his or her witnesses and arrange with them. The witnesses are generally relatives or friends of the litigant, and come gratuitously, or on easy terms. In an ordinary case where the litigant pays from two or three pounds to the agent and brings his or her own witnesses, say from Glasgow or Dundee, in the opinion of the poor's agents the case does not cost the litigant more than 5*l.* If an unwilling witness has to be brought the agent cites, that is, subpœnaes him, and in this case he has generally to pay the witness out of his own pocket unless the pound or two he has got from the litigant covers it. In some cases of extreme poverty the agents have paid the expenses even of the friendly witnesses whom the litigant has arranged to bring. In the only two cases in which, to the knowledge of the present poor's agents, considerably more than 5*l.* was paid by a poor litigant to a solicitor, the money was paid not to the Edinburgh agent, but to an agent in the country. This tends to confirm my opinion that poor litigants would not fare better as regards outlay if divorce cases were disposed of in the local courts. Work for this class of people on a business footing is part of the daily round of local solicitors who are employed by the poor, and much of whose forensic work is in the small debt court. Their incomes are small, and they could not live if they did not press poor clients to pay, or incurred any outlay which they did not see their way to recover. The same idea may be illustrated in the medical profession, for example, if you compare the Royal Infirmary to the Court of Session. A person is sent by a country doctor and gets every attention and comfort and it costs nothing, but that country doctor must charge that person, although in humble circumstances, if he remains in the country. It is no discredit to him. In the same way local agents in the country are accustomed to do this small class of work for humble people, and they think nothing of pressing for all such payment as they can get, whereas when the litigant comes to Edinburgh matters are on a somewhat different footing. I was also assured by the poor's agents, and my own experience fully confirms it, that in the case of a person who was a little above the line which qualifies for admission to the poor's roll, if that person was respectable and had an introduction, say from a clergyman or an employer, there would not be the least difficulty in obtaining the gratuitous conduct of the case as regards legal charges, either to counsel or agents. As regards the Bar I can speak with absolute confidence. In a long experience I have never heard of a case where a deserving person of small means was shut out from the Consistorial Court through inability to pay counsel's fees, and I do not believe such a case ever occurs. If I got a letter from a clergyman, or any person whom I knew, mentioning a person with 70*l.* or 80*l.* a year, a teacher or something of that kind, who could not pay counsel's fees, I could get 50 counsel in Parliament House who would do it for nothing, not because of a favour to me, but because of esprit de corps in the profession.

40,068. Who is the informant from whom you have got that paper?—The four gentlemen who act as agents for the poor at present.

40,069. I thought that paper was prepared by one gentleman?—No, it was prepared by myself from their information.

40,070. What is the general result of it? There appears to be for those who can get to Edinburgh some expense which they find themselves to begin with, 2*l.* or 3*l.*?—Yes, subject to this, that all the poor's agents assured me if they could not find it they did it themselves for nothing.

40,071. What is that 2*l.* or 3*l.* for, if there are no court fees?—The officers of court are required to be paid in order to serve the summons which must be served personally.

40,072. And get a certificate of the marriage?—Yes. There may be postages and minor outlays. If the poor person has a few pounds, the agent thinks himself entitled to be paid for actual copying as being outlays.

40,073. The end of it is that for a very small sum the poor persons can get their cases brought?—Yes.

40,074. Five pounds seems as if it would generally be sufficient?—So I am informed.

40,075. Of course the witnesses' expenses are a separate matter. It depends where they come from?—2*l.* or 3*l.* are paid to the Edinburgh agent, and in addition to that, there are the expenses of witnesses. The estimate in an ordinary case, witnesses and all, paid directly by the person, does not bring the case up to more than 5*l.*

40,076. (Lord Guthrie.) The total charge?—Yes. It may be a slight under-estimate, because the agents do not see what the witnesses are paid.

40,077. (Chairman.) I think we will return to your proof now. You have views to express about the reporting of cases?—Yes. "In Scotland the great proportion of divorce cases come from the humbler walks of life. Divorce for adultery among the upper and upper middle classes is rare. Accordingly the great majority of cases being of a squalid character are briefly and not offensively reported. Cases which attract much general attention and are fully reported are rare—not one in the year. But the reports of 'society scandals' in the English courts appear in the Scottish papers, and English papers with even fuller details circulate largely in Scotland. These reports are highly mischievous, and any scheme for their curtailment or total suppression by the exercise of a wide discretion on the part of the judge or otherwise would be welcomed. On the other hand, it is not desirable that facilities should be given for the huddling through of divorce cases quickly, as this would encourage collusion and diminish the stigma attached to divorce."

40,078. The next is an important part: I have read it through, and it seems to express itself so well that if you will read it I shall be glad?—"Marriage of divorced persons. By the Act of 1600 c. 20 of the Scottish Parliament the marriage of a divorced person with the paramour with whom adultery is found to have been committed is null. Such marriages are also forbidden by the Church (General Assembly, 1567, Sess. 3). The confession of faith declares that the innocent spouse is free to marry again. As to whether the guilty spouse might marry a third party the church appears to have hesitated. In 1566 Sess. 3 the General Assembly incidentally described such marriages as contrary to God's law. In the following year, however, the following passage occurs in the minute (Sess. 3):

—'Ane man being divorced for adulterie—Quaeritur 'whether he may marry again or not?—The kirk will 'not resolve herein shortly'—I think, shortly' means 'summarily'—'but presently inhibits all ministers to 'meddle with sic marriages whill (until) full decision of 'the question.' So far as I am aware consideration of the question has never been resumed, and no case has arisen in the Ecclesiastical Courts. I am of opinion that if a case did arise the Church Courts would neither compel a minister to celebrate such a marriage nor visit him with discipline if he thought right to do so."

40,080. What about the marriage of the two guilty parties?—That marriage would be null by the civil law if the parties had been declared by the court to be guilty.

40,081. I was thinking of the case where the name was left out, as it is done; what would be the attitude of the Church with regard to such a case?—If the name is left out there might be a difficulty in seeing what warrant a clergymen who was applied to had, unless he was told, in holding these parties were the two guilty parties, and in respect of whose adultery the divorce had been declared. If the thing was notorious the clergyman would probably decline to marry them, but some clergymen would marry them.

40,082. It would still come within that opinion, that the Church Courts would neither compel a minister to celebrate such a marriage nor visit him with discipline if he thought right to do so?—Yes. They probably would get out of it by saying if it was not in the decree of divorce they could not look beyond the decree. I do not know that they would allow it if the two people said, "We have done this and want to be married." "The statutory provision is frequently (but not invariably) evaded by the non-insertion of the paramour's name in the decree of divorce. I humbly confess that I have some doubts as to the legitimacy of judges thus constituting themselves judges not merely of the law but of the policy of the law. The Act of 1600 says that parties who have been found to have committed adultery by decree of the court are not to marry. It was not intended by those who framed the Act that the judge was not to put the name, according to his discretion. They assumed the name would go in. It was worked out in this way, judges taking a lenient view refrained from putting in the name. In my view there is an immense deal to be said for the statutory rule upon grounds of public policy. As regards the well-to-do classes, both in England and in Scotland, I believe that cases of conjugal misconduct would be enormously diminished in number if such a rule obtained and was enforced. The cases are rare in which a woman of respectable surroundings will go off with a man with no prospect of ever being more than his mistress. There even exists a spurious code of honour in the matter. This was illustrated in a recent case where a divorced lady raised an action of breach of promise of marriage against her paramour, and stated in court that what she sought was not damages but the vindication of her 'honour.' She could face the reproach of infidelity to her husband and desertion of her children, but not the reproach of having yielded to a man who did not promise afterwards to marry her. I quite admit that in the particular case where the offence has been committed and the marriage has been dissolved, it will often be in the interests of the guilty party that he or she should be allowed to marry the paramour. But the prevention of conjugal infidelity is much more important than the adjustment of the relations of parties when infidelity has been committed. The state of the law, too, which makes the injured spouse the arbiter of the fate of the spouse who has absconded with a paramour, and sets revenge on one side against pity or self-interest on the other is not satisfactory."

40,083. What does that mean exactly?—Where a wife goes off with a paramour, the husband may be so extremely indignant that he thinks he will punish her by not suing for divorce. It is in his discretion either to permit or forbid her to marry, according as he is influenced by pity on the one hand or revenge on the other. I do not think that is desirable.

40,084. How would you remedy that, because the petitioner is the only person who can start the suit?—I would remedy it by making such marriages illegal. I use this as an argument against the illegality of these marriages—it results in that.

40,085. You would declare a guilty spouse should not be allowed to marry the paramour, independent of whether there was a decree or not?—Yes.

40,086. They could not marry without a decree. I do not follow the point?—They could not marry without a decree, and therefore the husband nowadays, if he is indignant or thinks they ought not to be married, can prevent them by not suing for divorce.

40,087. How would you remedy that?—If you make such a marriage null, then the husband is not put to the option that he shall be tied for life to the woman or allow her to marry the paramour. He can divorce her and she cannot marry the paramour.

40,088. He would bring his suit free from the consideration that he was either giving them an opportunity or not?—Yes. I saw in yesterday's paper an illustration. I speak of revenge, but cupidity may come in. It was a case where the paramour paid so much to the husband on the condition that he should raise an action for divorce. The husband did not do it, and the paramour raised an action to get the money back.

40,089. If you prohibited marriage between these people, it frees the position of the husband to act without the question of whether he was acting for revenge or not. It eliminates that?—Yes. "Nobody I think can have studied the history of divorce cases and the correspondences which have passed without realising that many of these cases would never have occurred if the law did not leave the door open to rehabilitation of the guilty parties. If the warning to the guilty which Dante puts over the door of the infernal regions were inscribed over the door of the Divorce Court—All hope abandon ye who enter here—the lot of those who entered might be harder, but the number who entered would be enormously diminished."

40,090. Is that paragraph about the correspondence that has passed written from your own practical experience?—My own experience to a certain limited extent, in actual cases occurring in which I have been counsel, but to a much larger extent reported cases I have read, cases reported in the newspapers and the law reports.

40,091. I regard that as a very important point. That correspondence has led you to the conclusion that there is an invitation practically to commit a guilty act because there will be an opportunity of re-establishment afterwards?—Yes.

40,092. If the divorce is granted?—If the divorce is granted.

40,093. I do not know to what extent the next point has already been covered. Perhaps you will read it?—"The suggestion has been made that the difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland, particularly in regard to desertion, is attributable to the fact that the law of Scotland regards marriage simply as a consensual civil contract. There is a measure of the truth in attributing this attitude to the law so far as regards the actual contracting of the marriage. (It may be noted, however, that down to a very recent date the only lawful manner of contracting marriage was in facie ecclesiæ, and although a clandestine marriage was binding, the parties to it were guilty of a criminal offence.) But though it might be easy to make a binding marriage, when once a marriage was contracted the Scottish law took a most strict view of its obligations and was far from treating the relation of marriage as one merely of civil contract. Adultery was a criminal offence, and in the seventeenth century the death penalty was more than once inflicted upon notorious adulterers. Intercourse with the near of blood of the other spouse was treated as incest and was punishable with death. There is here no savour of the mere civil contract. The strict view of the law has always been and still is supported by public opinion. I have made particular inquiry into this matter among those who work among the poor, and their testimony is, that except in the very lowest strata, the married state is held in great respect and conjugal infidelity and cohabitation without marrying are reprobated. It is remarkable that in the agricultural counties great respect for marriage co-exists with a low tone of sexual morality. In this connection it has been remarked that whilst in many, if not indeed the majority of, cases, a ploughman's wife is pregnant when he marries her, infidelity on the part of a ploughman's wife is almost unknown." So far as I speak of the respect in which the married state is held amongst the poor, I have made particular inquiry. I got a list of clergymen and others who are specially conversant with the matter, and I corresponded with them before writing this paragraph.

40,094. Will you kindly read the next paragraph?—"Judicial separation can be obtained in Scotland in either the Supreme Court or the sheriff court. The grounds are adultery, cruelty, and habitual drunkenness, and perhaps desertion, though the law on this point is doubtful. In practice it is not resorted to in cases of desertion, indeed this remedy for desertion is an anomalous one, as it stereotypes and legalises the separation which the law deprecates. I regard judicial separation generally as a necessary but unsatisfactory remedy for marital wrongs. The present system in Scotland which authorises only a decree of permanent separation is unsatisfactory. It is unreasonable, for example, that where a man who has been separated for habitual drunkenness or for an act of drunken violence has become a permanent abstainer a decree of judicial separation should be binding against him for life. But even short of such extreme cases, I think that there should be room for reconsideration particularly in view of the narrow grounds upon which such decrees sometimes proceed where there have been faults on both sides, of the chastening influence of the experience of enforced separation, and of the moral evil of permanent separation of persons under disability lawfully to marry another. The court ought, I think, to be empowered to make temporary orders which would leave the matter open for reconsideration after a certain interval. I think too that there is room for more benevolent and ameliorative procedure in the less serious class of cases, as by the judge seeing the parties in chambers when he deems it expedient. I have known cases of reconciliation when the parties were brought face to face even in the public courts. In this view it is of interest to note that according to the Confession of Faith and the early theory and practice of the law, it is the duty both of the civil magistrate and of the Church to endeavour to bring spouses together."

40,095. You say, "the moral evil of permanent separation of persons under disability lawfully to marry another." I take that to mean immoral connections that they are likely to form?—That is so.

40,096. I appreciate the point about the temporary character, if I may call it the disciplinary work of the magistrate, but suppose it ends in no reconciliation and there is a permanent state of separation, what is the proposal you would make then?—When a reconciliation becomes impossible?

40,097. Yes?—I do not think you can make it other than it is at present, if the grounds are not such as warrant divorce. I would not on account of the evils of separation extend the grounds of divorce, because I think that these individual cases of hardship, whilst they might be remedied, would far from compensate for the general unsettlement of the public conception of the marriage tie. I would rather let these people suffer than make a general change in the law.

40,098. Then will you read the last paragraph?—"According to my experience, confirmed by inquiries which I have made of others, the question of judicial remedies for marital wrongs is one which does not touch very deeply the daily life of the people of Scotland. Closely as the marriage relationship affects almost every household in every section of community, there has never since popular government was introduced been a trace of agitation of these matters. In my long experience of Scottish politics, out of the innumerable questions put to candidates, I can only recall two having relation to marriage, one about the deceased wife's sister and the other by an indignant suffragette who was burning to see redressed the non-existent 'sex inequality' in Scotland. Among the well-to-do classes the conditions which lead to judicial interposition are fortunately comparatively rare. Among the humbler classes there is a wonderful disposition to endure. The wife who meets at the prison gate the drunken husband who has been incarcerated for thrashing her is a representative of her class, as is the hard-working husband who will not separate from the drunken wife who pawns the blankets. On the whole, I do not think that any drastic change in our divorce laws or any wide extension of judicial interference in matrimonial matters is desired, and I am of opinion that it is not desirable."

40,099. (The Archbishop of York.) You quote the Westminster Confession at the beginning of your very interesting evidence, and make it plain, I think, from the quotation that the standard of the Church in Scotland recognises no ground of divorce except adultery and desertion?—That is so.

40,100. The words of the Confession are quite plain, that nothing but adultery or such wilful desertion, &c., is a cause sufficient for dissolving the bond of marriage?—Yes, and I think the latter, the desertion, was at that date admitted with some hesitation.

40,101. That being so, the extension of divorce for any further grounds, however natural or justifiable they may be, would be inconsistent with the standards of the Church?—That is so.

40,102. Therefore, is not that a matter which would necessarily come before the General Assembly? If the State were to authorise divorce for these other grounds it would immediately become a question for the Assembly to determine how far it should adhere to or alter the standard?—Yes.

40,103. Therefore, in Scotland, quite as much as in England, any civil extension by the State of the grounds of divorce beyond desertion and adultery might very likely result in some conflict between the law of the Church and the law of the State?—It might. The only possible extension which I think might not lead to such conflict would be such an extension as this: where a separation had occurred as the result of gross cruelty or constant drunkenness, it might be regarded as an element in considering whether the husband or his wife was really the deserting party. I think some judicially introduced modification of the rule in that way might not be disapproved of by the Church, but that is simply determining what is desertion. I do not think the Church would accept other grounds than desertion and adultery.

40,104. Supposing that the State did make a law extending the grounds of divorce beyond adultery or desertion, even if desertion received some such judicial interpretation as you speak of, then also difficulties which have hitherto hardly occurred in Scotland would arise about persons marrying under these changed conditions?—That is so.

40,105. So that in Scotland as well as in England, would you say that a change of the law, unless it were very urgently demanded by public opinion, might very likely bring about a difficult situation both in the General Assembly and in the administration of discipline in parishes?—I think it might, subject to this, the constitution of the Church of Scotland being so democratic, if a change were supported by the great body of public opinion in Scotland the chances are that it would be approved of by the clergy and elders who rule the Church; but if it were not supported by the concensus of public opinion I do not think the Church would accept it.

40,106. Your opinion is, that in Scotland there is no such demand by public opinion?—That is my opinion.

40,107. Therefore, if anything of this kind were done now it would not be supported probably by the General Assembly?—I think not.

40,108. Your opinion was succinctly expressed in your proof. I do not know that it was actually read by you when you were giving your evidence. I would just like to have it down on the notes: "In my view, which I believe to be in accordance with well-informed public opinion, though there may be hard cases, it is better that the hardship should remain than that there should be any disturbance of the law which, since the Reformation, has governed the domestic relations in this regard, and has protected the sanctity of marriage"?—That is my view.

40,109. You think that an extension beyond the present admitted grounds in Scotland might very seriously disturb that general respect for the marriage tie which you feel marks the people of Scotland now?—Yes, I think it might.

40,110. With regard to the courts, have you come across any expression of dissatisfaction or grievance on the part of the poorer or working classes in Scotland about their being compelled to take their cases to the High Court in Edinburgh?—No. The only criticism or suggestions on the matter I have heard are on the part of country solicitors.

40,111. Has there been, so far as you know, any serious demand, beyond the country solicitors, either on the part of the profession or of the public, that the sheriff courts should be used for this purpose?—No, I think not.

40,112. Would you say that the sheriff courts enjoy, on the whole, a very high reputation amongst Scottish people?—As I am a sheriff myself, I am bound to say they do, and I think they do; but I think there is a very general concensus of opinion that this special matter should be dealt with not by a local, but by a national court.

40,113. With regard to an interesting point you have mentioned, I gather you are not aware, so far, happily, of any case of dispute as to the right of clergymen in Scotland to refuse marriage or refuse Communion to any couples having been brought before any of the Ecclesiastical Courts?—Not quite that. I did not know of a case on this question of remarrying divorced persons having been brought up in that way.

40,114. That is what I meant?—There have been cases which have gone to General Assembly, not many, in recent years; but there were a number in old days as to refusing Communion to persons living in certain immoral relations, or who had contracted marriages the Church did not allow.

40,115. Your opinion is that, supposing a minister were to say, "I have every reason to believe you were "the guilty party in divorce proceedings, and you "are now asking me to marry you and I decline to "do so"—supposing a minister were to say that, there would be an appeal on the part of that guilty party to the Presbytery?—There might be. I think it is more likely he would go to another minister of the Church of Scotland or some other denomination. He might appeal.

40,116. In your judgment no civil or ecclesiastical penalty would be inflicted upon that minister for coming to that decision?—I think that no civil penalty could possibly be inflicted, and I do not think—I am sure—the Assembly would inflict no ecclesiastical penalty.

40,117. The Church opinion of Scotland would not tolerate the suggestion that a minister for conscientiously refusing to celebrate such a marriage should be punished?—I do not think Church opinion would tolerate it, nor do I think the judges of the Court of Session would regard it as the law.

40,118. Supposing a minister, after consulting with his Kirk session, were to say to two persons presenting themselves for the Holy Communion, "I have reason "to know that one of you was a guilty party in divorce "proceedings, I cannot admit you," I think we had it that these parties would be entitled to appeal to the Presbytery?—Yes.

40,119. Do you think that on a ground of that kind the Presbytery would be likely to interfere with the discretion of the minister?—The general rule is not lightly to interfere with the discretion of the minister. Are you figuring the case of two people who have actually been married?

40,120. Yes, one of them having been a guilty party in divorce proceedings. I gather that happily in Scotland these difficulties have not largely occured, but I put it to you again, coming back to what I asked before, supposing there was any further extension of grounds, beyond what Scotland has accepted for 300 years, these difficulties might become rather acute?—I think they might. Perhaps you will allow me, with reference to the question you put about the Civil Courts, to explain my view. I had occasion to put it down elsewhere recently. I think any parishioner has a right to demand of the parish minister any religious service, such as baptism or marriage, that the law of the Church allows to that man, but if the minister in his discretion refuses, the man who is aggrieved has no civil remedy. It is a spiritual right, and the Church Courts are the spiritual courts of the land, and they only can give the remedy. It is a legal right the man has to the service, but it can be enforced only in the spiritual courts.

40,121. (Lord Guthrie.) Have you been a Prison Commissioner?—I am at present.

40,122. How long have you been so?—Five years.

40,123. In the course of your duties have you to visit the prisons and come in contact with prisoners making complaints and otherwise?—Yes.

40,124. Have you been a Lunacy Commissioner?—No, but I am director of an asylum.

40,125. How long have you been so?—Nearly six years.

40,126. Therefore you have had special experience both in connection with prisoners and lunatics?—Yes.

40,127. In connection with prisoners is it found that even depraved persons still preserve to a marvellous extent domestic affections?—Yes, I think so. There are exceptions.

40,128. I notice, for instance, recently in the Peterhead convict settlement in some of the cells they are allowing photographs of the relatives to be put up?—Yes.

40,129. I notice even in cases of very bad criminals they seem to like to have their children's and their wives' pictures in their cells?—Yes.

40,130. That is in accordance with your experience?—It is, and it is also in accordance with my experience that apart altogether from the lawful communication that is allowed, they find means in some subterranean way to keep in more frequent communication with their wives and families, and know what is going on.

40,131. Then, in reference to those questions of crime and insanity, whose interests do you think the State should have primarily in view, the spouses' or the children's?—I think the children are of more importance to the nation than the spouses. There is a stain on the spouse, and we hope there may be no stain on the children. A good life is better than a damaged one, but I do not think the primary consideration as regards the change of the law should be either the spouses or the children in the particular class of cases. It should be the bearing of this change upon the general conception of the law.

40,132. If you do take as the primary consideration in the case of crime the criminal, in the case of insanity the insane person, you will be opposed in their interests to including either crime or insanity as a ground for divorce?—Yes.

40,133. If you look, on the other hand, to the primary interest of the children, what would you say then, even for penal servitude for life, or a man certified to be incurably insane. Consider the interest of the children as a primary consideration, what do you say then?—Children who were living with the other party?

40,134. Yes?—I do not think you can lay down any general rule that would be applicable to such children as a body, because if these children were left to the beneficent care—it is becoming more and more beneficent—of the Poor Authorities, their lot would probably be much better, and they would be better cared for than if left to such a person as the wife of a convict, who had perhaps been associated with him in his crime. In some cases perhaps the woman might marry a good husband. I do not think you could lay down a general rule as to what would be the bearing of such a change of the law on the children.

40,135. In Scotland from the earliest times in regard to divorce—in fact you indicated it—has the theory of punishment entered into the conception of the law?—You mean adultery was punishable?

40,136. Take adultery?—Punishable as a crime?

40,137. Yes. Is it not the fact it did not last long, but I think Lord Fraser shows at a very early period divorces were at the instance of the Crown and prosecutor?—Yes.

40,138. At all events has it been the view in Scotland, which would arise in a question of insanity, that divorce should be only allowed in a case of moral wrong?—Yes, certainly.

40,139. Do you think that feeling would militate strongly against divorce for insanity where there may be moral wrong but is not necessarily so?—Yes. I think that according to the Scotch conception there is a very great stigma in divorce, and many people would revolt against putting this stigma on a person suffering under the hand of God.

40,140. Is the view the stigma is such in the case of the innocent spouse and children that while there may be advantages for the children in getting a new head of the house, there is a great drawback in being the children of divorced persons?—There is no doubt about that. It is remarkable in the case of women who have divorced their husbands that really many people do not seem to draw much distinction between the innocent and the guilty, and regard her as having a stigma upon her.

40,141. That is not confined to her, but also casts a shadow on the children?—That is so.

40,142. Is it a fact in your experience, both in the case of husbands and wives who have ample ground for divorce and who would be benefited by it themselves enormously, that they have refrained from it for the sake of the children?—Yes, I have known such cases.

40,143. In regard to adultery you said you thought the expectation of marriage was a temptation to commit adultery, and you referred to your own experience in the way of correspondence that you had seen or read. Have you known of any correspondence written before the adultery had been committed from which it appeared that the adultery would not have been committed but for the expectation of marriage with the paramour, or has it rather been after the adultery has been committed, references to hopes that the husband will divorce the guilty person and enable her to re-marry the paramour?—I would not like to charge my memory definitely upon the matter. I think the correspondence that has come out in court would naturally be correspondence after the offence had begun, but I think that correspondence threw an important light on the attitude of parties before the offence was committed, and in a number of cases I have heard oral evidence of what went on before any actual offence, which showed clearly that the man vowed he would stick to the woman before she yielded.

40,144. I quite see the force of all that. Suppose that is true, and that that enactment of law preventing marriage between the paramours would create a definite barrier against adultery, must you not apply the same principle in the case of unmarried persons? It is the fact that many women yield on a promise of marriage, and would not have yielded but for the expectation of marriage. If your reasoning is sound in the one case would it not lead to a law declaring that wherever the event showed, by the date of the birth of the child, that there had been sexual intercourse before marriage, that marriage should be null and void?—It would lead to this, that if there were such a law there would be many cases of a fall averted: that is to say, if it were the law that parties who had been guilty of fornication should not be allowed to marry, I have no doubt there would be less fornication, in country districts especially: but that is one of the cases where logic perhaps fails a little. In the one case I think the evil that is suffered by keeping the offenders unmarried is slight compared with the benefit that would result from the prohibition of such marriages by way of restraining people from immorality. In the other case I think that the benefit is not sufficient to compensate for the very great evil and hardship, especially to children, that would result if you did not allow these marriages.

40,145. You have a very interesting suggestion that to allow desertion does not increase the cases in which the innocent spouse puts away, because it is the deserter who puts himself away?—Yes.

40,146. Is that really sound? Is not the essence in both cases that the guilty person has rendered continued cohabitation impossible—in one case morally, because no self-respecting man or woman can live with an adulterous spouse, and in the other case physically by taking himself off. In both cases is not the essential element that of malice, for instance, that a married woman has connection with a man other than her husband is not necessarily adultery. We all know cases of personation. That a man leaves his wife is not necessarily desertion: he may be in penal servitude for life. In both cases is there not some essential element, that of malice, and is there a difference between the two cases?—I do not know that there is where the adultery is deliberate and repeated. In both cases it may be said that it is the guilty person who departs from the marriage. Many people have great difficulty on account of the prohibition by our Lord of putting away, and it appeared to me that an answer to that might be found in the fact that it was the deserter who put away, and not the person who was deserted. On the other hand where one spouse divorces the other for a single act of misconduct it may fairly, I think, be said that he or she puts that spouse away.

40,147. It is extremely ingenious and subtle and delightful, but I am not sure there is much substance in it. However, we have your views. Will you tell me what you say to this, from your experience. You know the opinion was expressed by Lord Salvesen that in connection with divorce he had most satisfaction, if he had any, in giving judgment in favour of the pursuer or plaintiff in cases of desertion, the view being this, that where a man had abandoned his whole duties and taken himself off permanently and refused to contribute anything to support his wife and children, Lord Salvesen felt more satisfaction there, and sense of doing justice, than in cases of adultery, where the judge thinks, for the sake of the children, the man or woman should have forgiven the spouse. What do you say to that?—People have different opinions as to the ultimate propriety of the ground, but if you lay that aside, there is, no doubt in my view, very strongly, that divorce may be much too severe a penalty for the mere adultery, but it is not too severe a penalty for malicious desertion for four years.

40,148. What do you say to our Scotch practice of allowing persons to re-marry the moment the decree is pronounced, as against the English practice of the decree nisi?—I do not know that I have very specially considered it. It always appeared to me that there was somewhat of an indecent haste in some of our Scotch marriages the day after the divorce, and it would not be undesirable, especially in view of the right of the Lord Advocate to intervene, that there should be a certain period of suspense.

40,149. You have told us how the poor's agents do work for poor people and pay the money out of their own pockets. How do you account for that?—For them doing it?

40,150. Yes?—Partly, no doubt, on account of the esprit de corps which I think they share with the members of the Bar, partly because they are men who are accustomed generally to deal with people of more means, and who feel it presses hardly on humble people, and also because an agent of the poor has no option but to undertake the case submitted to him. It may be he could not be compelled to make out lays in a case, but if the case was to stop because he refused to pay a few shillings it would be unpleasant for him.

40,151. Is it not that the experience they gain in being brought before the court is to their good?—No doubt.

40,152. Can you explain the evidence which Mr. Gillie, the chief criminal officer of Glasgow, gave, which Canon Muir was good enough to report to us? He says, "There are hundreds of poor persons tied to "the most profligate, wanton, and degraded spouses" —this is with reference to Glasgow—"simply because "they cannot, and have no prospect of ever being able to, "gather together the sum of 10*l.* to get their legal "remedy"? There must be some mistake there?—I think so. I think he knows that number of cases of people are united to wanton neglectful husbands and left destitude, but it is an entire mistake to assume those people desire divorce. A great many do not because of the stigma, many more do not because of the hope of getting something out of the husband, and others because they are Roman Catholics. If any of these people are people of respectability and came to a clergyman like Dr. M'Adam Muir for 5*l.* or 10*l.*, the money would be got somehow.

40,153. You said "respectability"; you do not mean a high standard of respectability?—No.

40,154. Non-criminal, in short?—Yes.

40,155. Do you think if it is the case that criminals cannot get divorce that there is much hardship that the law should take cognizance of?—I do not think so.

40,156. The poor's roll in Scotland is not only for divorce cases, but for all cases?—Yes.

40,157. So that you do not suggest any improvement of the Scotch system there?—No. It is a small matter, but I do not know if it has been mentioned in a consistorial case, although it is not a poor's case you can get off all fees in the Court of Session.

40,158. Do you suggest any improvement of our method for administering the law otherwise, particularly in regard to what was said by Dr. Cooper about there being no intimation to the guilty person, and about the whole procedure in desertion cases not being now gone through? These two points were mentioned to us?—As regards intimation to the guilty person, you mean the person who would be co-defender if he were sued?

40,159. Yes?—There was an Act of Sederunt requiring that lately.

40,160. The Court is always particularly careful to say the defender and co-defender are to be acquainted with what is to be done against them?—There was a difficulty suggested if you did not take any action against the co-defender he might be stigmatised with adultery, and the Court passed an Act of Sederunt requiring that he should get notice.

40,161. The abolition of the Rolls proceedings by the Act of 1861; Dr. Cooper seemed to regret that, and thought there was a substantial loss?—Theoretically so, but they died a natural death, and I do not think they could be resuscitated.

40,162. There is no opinion proposing to resuscitate it?—No.

40,163. What do you say in regard to publication?—I am against publishing details, but strongly in favour of publicity.

40,164. What do you think about the proposal to shut the Court in all divorce cases as is done in the discretion of the Court now in a certain very extreme class of case, to hear all divorce cases in camera?—I should be against that if it meant the exclusion of the Press, to the effect that the cause of divorce with the offending party's name should not appear in the paper the next day.

40,165. You think the Press should be present, but subject to a law as to no details?—Even that with a certain qualification, that certain classes of details ought to be excluded; there ought to be sufficient so that it would not be a mere register, but that the general public would look at it and read it and the stigma would remain.

40,166. Do you think it important that in this island the laws of the two countries with regard to divorce should be similar?—I do not think it is practicable to make them identical in view of tradition in all details. I think it would be expedient, if possible, that the substantive grounds should be the same in both countries.

40,167. At the present moment it is the fact, a practical difficulty does arise through English people trying to make themselves out Scotch, and get the benefit of the law of desertion?—That is so.

40,168. In your view the Scotch practice of allowing divorce only for adultery and desertion, while it may not remove the whole hardship, practically meets the necessities of life?—That is my view.

40,169. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) When you say that similar laws should be made in England and Scotland, that means if the English laws were made like the Scotch laws?—I did not put it that way. I said it would be desirable that they should be the same, but in a theoretical sense: I do not mean for that reason to alter the law of England or the law of Scotland. On the whole it would be desirable.

40,170. You realise there would be great difficulty in making the two laws identical?—Great difficulty.

40,171. I understood you to say that there was an obligation on the part of the parochial clergy in Scotland to marry their own parishioners?—I think so.

40,172. Does that obligation arise from common law or from statute? I am asking for information?—It arises not from any express statutory provision, but from the settlement of the Church and State under a territorial ministry, whereby a minister is provided for each separate parish, who is bound to discharge all the religious functions of the parish. That was done at a time when there was one Church in Scotland, and the inference deduced by the law is that he is under an obligation to supply the spiritual wants of all who desire to come to him.

40,173. That is very like the obligation of English incumbents?—Yes.

40,174. It rests on something I may call a common ecclesiastical law rather than any statutory law?—Yes.

40,175. Did I hear you rightly that you have never known a case of that law being enforced in the case of a clergyman who has refused to marry parishioners for reasons which he thought adequate? You have never known a case of his having been compelled to marry them, notwithstanding his refusal?—On the ground that they were divorced?

40,176. On any ground. I am not for the moment on divorce at all, but on parochial clergymen in Scotland refusing to marry parishioners for reasons which they considered satisfactory. As a matter of fact I thought you said you knew of no case where that legal obligation had been enforced on him?—I think there have been one or two cases, not in recent years, where the General Assembly has found that the parties ought to have been married. I do not know that they ordered the minister to do it, but they found that they, having manifested penitence, should be married.

40,177. That obligation would be enforced, if at all, in your spiritual courts, not in the civil courts?—That is so: the civil courts could not touch it.

40,178. In England there is no case that I am aware of in which the obligation has been practically enforced, and it is at least doubtful whether there is any civil obligation on a clergyman to marry at all. There is no doubt an ecclesiastical obligation enforceable in the Church courts, but it is open to doubt whether there is any civil obligation. With regard to refusal of communion, what is the test? Again I am not specifically on divorce, but on disability in the Scotch Church. If I may illustrate it, in our Church a man must be an open and notorious evil-liver, whatever that may mean. What is the test in Scotland?—A young person about 17 or 18, against whose character there is nothing, comes forward, and that person after a period of private training by the clergyman is admitted as a communicant, and after that as a member of the Church. If that person has an illegitimate child or is convicted of theft, that person is debarred from communion.

40,180. You have no document you can refer to? It does not rest upon written law, but upon again a sort of common law?—No written law enumerating the class of offence; but certainly there are written rules of the Church which regulate the procedure in these cases. They are called cases of discipline, and the person may be restored. In the old days they did public penance. That is not required. They come before the Session, and say they are sorry and they are re-admitted.

40,181. It depends more upon case law than anything else?—Yes.

40,182. Precedent?—Yes.

40,183. I wanted to ask you about your evidence with regard to poor people. I gather since 1905 you have had a system of separation orders just as we have in England?—Yes.

40,184. Made by the sheriffs?—Yes. Since 1907 the sheriff can grant separation a mensa et thoro which was formerly reserved to the Supreme Court.

40,185. Is recourse had to that system largely, and are many orders made?—To a considerable extent in Glasgow, but I do not think to a very large extent elsewhere.

40,186. You were asked your view as to those orders continuing permanently, whether it would not be wise that they should be developed into divorce. Your view is that they should not?—No, unless there are grounds for divorce, the present grounds.

40,187. Take a case where a separation order has been made on the ground of desertion under your law as it is now, that will mature into a case of divorce at the end of four years. There will then have been malicious desertion for four years?—You could not get separation for desertion unless the desertion had lasted for four years.

40,188. It would mature into it. The fact that they had a separation order would not make it impossible for them afterwards to use desertion as a ground of divorce?—They could not get the separation order until the desertion had lasted four years, the same as divorce. It is doubtful whether even then mere desertion is a ground of separation.

40,189. It is not as in England; a woman deserted by her husband cannot get a separation order at once, or within a very short period ——

40,190. (Chairman.) Are you sure that is so?—She can get maintenance, but not separation, unless there is cruelty or adultery.

40,191. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I am in Mr. Johnston's hands. He knows; I do not. You think not? However, that may be, there is no reason under your law, where desertion is already a ground of divorce, why a separation order should not mature, as it were, into a divorce by the desertion becoming the ground of a divorce suit under your existing law?—Under the existing law suppose everyone could get a separation for desertion, I do not think it is an appropriate remedy for desertion; a woman could not afterwards get a divorce because the husband ceases to be in desertion—he is forbidden to come near her.

40,192. That is like our English law. Lord Guthrie read an extract from Dr. Muir's proof, in which he quotes Mr. Gillie's evidence to the effect that in the slums of Glasgow "separation and desertion exist to "an appalling extent. In one half-year 895 deserted "wives applied for help. The same authority states "that there is little or no sign of any decrease in the "number of cases." I understood you to say in answer to Lord Guthrie that you do not think that many of those are people who would apply, but that they, if they liked, could get help for a divorce suit on the poor's roll?—Yes.

40,194. Does that not look rather as if the existence of a great number of these poor people who have been deserted by their husbands would not be ameliorated by an alteration of the law of divorce as to desertion in England, because in Scotland, where you have already got it that they could get divorce for desertion, they do not seek it?—That is so, assuming the sentiment would be the same in England as in Scotland.

40,195. Assuming the conditions are the same, it looks as if the argument greatly pressed before us that the existence of these people deserted by their husbands is a ground for widening our law, is not a sound argument, because in Scotland you have the same phenomenon of a great crowd of people deserted by their spouses, the law allowing divorce for desertion, and yet divorce is not applied for under a system by which it could be applied for if they liked?—The question is one of degree. If you had divorce for desertion, it certainly would not sweep away the body of people who are deserted and seek no remedy. There would still be numbers of such.

40,196. It shows that the existence of a great mass of suffering from desertion is not necessarily due to the condition of the law of divorce?—That is so.

40,197. I listened with very great attention to your evidence as to indissolubility, at any rate the argument in favour of not allowing the guilty spouse to marry his paramour. I was not sure whether you went further and suggested that he or she should not be allowed to marry at all, that the guilty partner should not be allowed to marry at all?—I did not suggest that.

40,198. That is going a great deal further?—Yes.

40,199. What strikes one is that if you put a concrete case, here is a man who, first of all, has been unfaithful to his wife and then betrayed another woman and then goes and marries a third. Does not that sound rather unjust?—It is the lookout of the third, I think.

40,200. You would think the woman he owed some obligation to was the paramour?—It seems to me somewhat illogical to allow the innocent spouse to marry and not allow the guilty one to, because to allow the innocent one to marry shows you declare the marriage at an end. It is making a ground of personal penalty that a man should not marry which I have a difficulty about.

40,201. It is not going behind the theory that divorce in Scotland is regarded not as a punitive thing but as annulling the contract which has been made? If it is annulled, it is annulled for both parties?—That is my view.

40,202. I am putting the difficulty in my mind as to the adoption of the view, for which there is much to be said, of not allowing the guilty party to re-marry, at any rate the paramour?—Yes, I appreciate the view of those who would not allow the guilty or the innocent to marry, but I have more difficulty about this, to allow the innocent and not the guilty.

40,203. On the other hand, there is not much analogy between the cases Lord Guthrie put to you. His suggestion was that, to be logical, you must make the law of disability apply lto ante-nuptial immorality. But if you look at it in a practical way I suggest to you in the case you are putting there has been a judicial finding that the adultery has taken place with the particular person who is not to be allowed to marry the man?—Yes.

40,204. But in the other case there is no finding of the immorality at all. The man and the woman cohabit together, and a child is begotten, and then they afterwards marry, but the law does not come in anywhere. I do not see how you could apply such a case to such a law. The two things seem to be different?—It could only apply where there had been an action of paternity. The thing is not worth arguing about, because public opinion would not stand it.

NOTE.—The witness supplied the following note in regard to the law of Scotland as to separation orders:—According to Erskine (1. VI. 9) simple desertion is a ground for judicial separation. Fraser (Husband and Wife, 896) combats this and adopts the reasoning of Sir William Scott (See Evans, 1 Hag, C.R., 120). There is no reported case and no case is known to have occurred in modern practice. Accordingly the question whether desertion must have endured for four years in order to warrant a judicial separation is not a practical one, and it is thought that if the question were now raised judicially, the court, in the absence of all trace of the opinion of Erskine having been acted upon, would hold that desertion is not a ground of judicial separation. A deserted wife may obtaiu a protection order for her property (24 & 25 Vict. c. 86, as amended by 37 & 38 Vict. c. 31), though since the Married Women's Property Acts of 1877 and 1881 this is of little importance. A deserted wife may also obtain an order for aliment. Neither a protection order nor an award of aliment prevents the desertion maturing as a ground of divorce, but a judicial separation on whatever grounds it is granted has this effect.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) If I may respectfully say so, I agree.

40,205. (Mr. Brierley.) About this poor's roll procedure in Scotland, we have had evidence, not only the statement of Mr. Gillie, which Dr. Muir referred to, but also from witnesses who work amongst the poor in Scotland, who have told us that this poor's roll procedure is really in point of expense out of the reach of poor people. One witness from Dundee said an undefended divorce case cost the petitioner 13*l.* odd. I should like to know the procedure when a petitioner lives in some provincial town such as Dundee. What does she have to do?—She ought to go to the person who is acting for the poor there, and get him to write to the poor's agent in Edinburgh.

40,206. Is the procedure afterwards carried on by correspondence between the Edinburgh agent and the party, or does she, assuming it to be the wife, have to go to Edinburgh to interview him?—That is a question of circumstances. In some cases she would come at once; in other cases the country agent would do it.

40,207. These witnesses seemed to think that the expense is very much more than you have stated to us in practice?—Of course, I go on the information I get. It may be more in some cases, but I do not think it is prohibitive.

40,208. That is what she would have to do; she would have to see the local agent, and he would communicate in writing or possibly personally with the Edinburgh agent, and the business would be transacted between the Edinburgh agent and the party?—Yes.

40,209. (Chairman.) Would you tell me whether the Scottish view, which has adopted adultery and desertion as far back as the 16th century, is, generally speaking, founded on Scriptural grounds?—I do not think that, as regards desertion, it originated on Scriptural grounds, but the attempt has been made to justify it on such grounds. I am not a theologian, and I do not say with what success they justify it on Scriptural grounds, but those who advocate it would endeavour to show that it was within the sanction of Scripture.

40,210. If it is justifiable, it may be justifiable on such a ground, according to some?—Yes.

40,211. Is the other ground on which it is justifiable that it puts an end to the married life and it is practically no use keeping it up?—Yes.

40,212. If that is the basis, I do not see why that necesarily excludes some other cause which would do the same on any principle?—Yes, I follow.

40,213. Do you exclude from the possibility of consideration a case—I will give you one in a moment—which would have a similar effect to that of desertion as on principle justifying a dissolution?—Theoretically no, but I should like to know the particular case.

40,214. I would like to put this case. It is accepted, and you accept it, that in Scotland desertion for four years maliciously would be a ground?—Yes.

40,215. Suppose that there is no desertion by the offender, but there is cruel treatment for years to such an extent that life is no longer safe for the person who is injured, and that person says, "I cannot live with you any longer, I am going," that person could not make a complaint on the ground of desertion, but by the conduct of the other the marriage tie was just as much broken as if the offending party had gone to America?—If you suppose that after this cruelty they separate and remain separate for four years, then I think that might possibly be brought under the principle of desertion on the ground that the person whose cruelty caused it was the deserter. If you contemplate that the divorce is to be raised at once when the parties separate on account of the cruelty, or perhaps while they are still living together, I say there may be theoretical justification for that on the grounds which I suggested as justifying divorce for desertion, but that the practical mischief of allowing anything so elastic and discretionary, as regards the person who tries the case, as cruelty or drunkenness, outweighs the possible benefit of giving redress in such a case.

40,216. Let me put a case—I have seen this repeatedly—where, say for 10 years life has been made a perfect hell for the petitioner, and at the end she says, "I cannot stand it any longer, I am off"; I do not see any principle to differentiate that from a case of desertion, unless you go to Scriptural grounds, which is another matter?—I do not profess to justify it as a logical distinction, but my view is that it is a practical distinction. I would rather let that be unremedied than loosen the law.

40,217. Supposing the number of those hard cases runs into thousands or hundreds, what is the advantage to the State or the children from the parties remaining in the marriage tie?—There is no advantage in those individual cases, but what I am doubtful of is whether it might not loosen the marriage tie in 10,000 other cases, and also if you once let in these grounds the questions of degree become more fine.

40,218. I was putting a case where it is absolutely unsafe to life. You do not differentiate that in principle from the separation?—No.

40,219. You said that insanity had not been discussed until lately. Did you mean by that since it has been mentioned it has been discussed in Scotland as a ground possibly of divorce?—Yes.

40,220. Do you know at all to what extent that has taken place?—It has not been publicly discussed on the platform or even in the Press, but wherever men have met together, reading the accountof this Commission, such questions have turned up.

40,221. I wanted to ask you because you have, if I may say so, a most logical mind. Do you see any difference in principle between treating insanity as a ground of dissolution, if it in fact brings an end to the marriage tie, and a case of desertion? In both cases the marriage tie is broken as regards a practical matter?—Yes.

40,222. I want to know, because it is a very interesting point, what difference there is in principle between the two?—There is this difference: in the case of insanity it is not the act of either party. In the case of desertion it is, and it may be that there is something in the view suggested by Lord Guthrie that where it is a visitation by the hand of Providence, although in that particular case it is equivalent to death, still it would alter our conception of the marriage tie if you allowed divorce in these circumstances. I do not commit myself against divorce.

40,223. You said you were not against it?—If you can make it out as equivalent to intellectual death.

40,224. At the moment I am putting to you the difficulty I feel in making a distinction in principle. Have you considered that in the application of it to insanity you have to deal with a vast mass of people, according to the statistics we have had, and many cases I gather are young people who find their spouse perfectly mad shortly after marriage, and then have to live the rest of their life alone with consequences which are disastrous?—Yes.

40,225. Do you think that those considerations ought to be excluded altogether?—No. I think that raises quite a fair case, always assuming that you can ascertain the insanity to be permanent.

40,226. Assume that. You would be prepared to say, assuming the insanity to be established after a certain number of years and pronounced incurable, at any rate it is a case for consideration, the case of the young and perfectly innocent spouse who has no possibility of a united life afterwards?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I thank you very much on behalf of the Commissioners for your evidence: it is very valuable evidence indeed.

Mr. Frederic Harrison called and examined.

40,226*a*. (Chairman.) Your name is so well known that I do not know whether I need ask you to describe yourself, but perhaps you will indicate how you would like it put down on the notes?—I was president of the Positivist Committee for 25 years, from the year 1880, but I have now for some years ceased to have any official position with that society. I have written several papers upon the question of marriage law, and also I have published a marriage service which I was asked to conduct, and have indeed for the last 20 years from time to time done so.

I should like to put a few extracts from my articles before the Commission. The following are passages from my article on "Civil and Religious Marriage" which appeared in the September 1894 number of "The Positivist Review":—"The question of lay versus "ecclesiastical marriage has become a burning problem "in some European countries, and gives rise in our "own country to several irritating anomalies. It is "ever at hand to bring about a conflict between the "law of the State and the most cherished institutions "of religion." "Wedlock never will be, never can be "confined within the limits of any Church, sect, or "opinion. Men and women, at any rate in the eye of "the State, ought to be free to marry into or out of "any church, any communion, any school of thought. "Here is a dilemma fertile of strife, in which the "partisans, first of civil, then of religious, liberty, are "equally hot, equally wrong, and equally right." "To "Positivists, marriage is at the same time an act in "law—a political function—and also a sacrament or "religious consecration. Both are indispensable—"perfectly distinct—alike honourable; and both should "be conducted with equal dignity and publicity." "To one plain and simple solution we must come. "Whatever else is done, the State must insist on its "own independent, uniform, lay act in the law: distinct "from any religious rite, and not affected by any "religious rite, antecedent, subsequent, or simultaneous. The State must have its own official, its "own distinct ceremony, its own national register, and "its own absolute record in its own keeping. With "all this duly done and witnessed—valid, unimpeachable marriage is concluded in the eye of the State "and in judgment of law. Without this—no marriage, "no legitimacy, no legal consequences from any pretended ceremony of marriage. No citizen need in "the eye of the law do more; but no citizen can be "married with less." "In the meantime let it be "understood that to Positivists the religious marriage "is a matter of religious duty. To Positivists marriage "is a sacrament—a sacrament of profound importance "and inestimable value. By sacrament they mean the "solemn and public pledge to fulfil a social, personal, "and religious duty. In the sanctity, indissolubility, "sacramental efficacy of marriage, Positivists can "yield to no Churchman, Protestant or Catholic. To "this aspect of the great institution I hope to return. "My immediate purpose was only to maintain as the "rational solution of a social dilemma, civil marriage "first—independent, obligatory, and uniform." Then in the October 1894 issue, in another article on the same subject, there is this passage: "There is every-"where in democratic societies a movement to render "divorce common, and re-marriage a matter of course. "And the note of modern free-thought is the assimila-"tion of all functions of man and woman. Both "tendencies must be fatal to true marriage. The "first saps the very idea of permanent union: the "second poisons the moral purpose of marriage itself. "The task of Positivism is to restore the institution "of marriage which even Catholic Christianity does "not adequately defend. Its essential conditions are "the exclusive and indissoluble bond of marriage, "and the setting free the wife to be the moral head "of the home. Marriage is the eternal devotion of "one man to one woman—a bond which no one can "put asunder and which normally should survive death "itself. To reject this last condition is to deny the "continuance of a spiritual life for a day beyond the "limits of corporal life on earth. Any view of the "prolongation of a moral and spiritual being beyond "death must necessarily involve the spiritual pro-"longation of the marriage union."

The following are passages from my article on "The Marriage Law," which appeared in the June 1903 number of "The Positivist Review":—"The questions "about civil and religious marriage are again in an "acute stage, and have received a new phase by the "very important decision of the new Bishop of London, "that he will visit with his displeasure any of his "clergy who should celebrate the re-marriage of a "person against whom a decree of divorce has been "pronounced. By this act it would seem that the "Church takes up a ground opposed to that of the "law, and also to that of average current opinion. "The marriage law and the law courts put no difficulty "in the way of the re-marriage of any divorced per-"son; and public opinion certainly favours it, espe-"cially where it promises a new life of happiness, or "an act of reparation. It may surprise some readers "to be told that the Positivist theory of marriage "offers the only reasonable and final solution of this "problem. And it may surprise them still more to "be told that the Positivist in this matter sides with "the Churchman and the Catholic against any religious "consecration of such a marriage." "To Positivists, "marriage, in its religious side, is a sacrament—"meaning thereby a public pledge by the wedded pair "that they will love, serve, and honour each other, "whereon the consecration of the Church, so far "representing humanity, is publicly bestowed on "them to stimulate their good intentions. This "consecration, or sacrament, is not conferred as of "course, or as a mere legal formula. Almost every "church, Catholic or Protestant, consents to marry "persons of notorious evil lives, or even hardened "criminals. The motive, no doubt, is the idea that "marriage obviates sin, and the Church, by exercising "its function of marrying, asserts its own ascendancy "in private and public life. The Positivist Church, "disclaiming any such idle pretensions, and fully "recognising the primary function of the State to "order the conditions of legal marriage, is free to "judge whether a religious consecration should pro-"perly be added to the legal rite. There is in this no "hardship on the parties, and no abandonment to "sin if such consecration is refused, for the legal rite "is open to all and is sufficient for every secular "interest. The Christian churches, however, as a "matter of course, perform the marriage ceremony "for adulterers and rogues indiscriminately, and a "parson of the Establishment can hardly exercise any "discretion in the matter. The Positivist Church, on "the other hand, is perfectly free to exercise an "efficient moral discipline over those whose con-"sciences it binds." "The bitter controversies we "see to-day can only be closed in one way—the recog-"nition of the double character of marriage by a "double and distinct rite, legal and religious. Posi-"tivists heartily support those who claim the freedom "of a simple legal rite as adequate and conclusive. "They as heartily support the claim of the churches "to enforce their own freedom to give or withhold "religious consecration upon any such marriage. It "is a striking example of the power of the great "Positivist principle—the independence and separation "of temporal and spiritual authority."

40,227. The marriage service you have referred to you have yourself performed?—Yes. That is published in my book on "The Creed of a Layman."

40,228. You have performed it as president of the society?—Yes.

40,229. How has that been legalised—by the presence of the registrar?—No, after the registrar's certificate. In every case I have insisted upon having the registrar's certificate put in my hands either at the time or before.

40,230. The service before the registrar has taken place first, and the Positive church service afterwards?—Yes. I may say when I was invited by yourself if I had any evidence to give to this Commission, I said the only really practical point dealing with legislation upon which I could offer any remarks was that upon which these articles principally turn, which was the establishment of a universal compulsory civil marriage in all cases, thus relieving various churches from difficulties which have arisen. With regard to the general question of divorce I have nothing to offer to the Commission. I am simply the man in the street. I have never practised in either criminal courts or matrimonial courts.

40,231. You would like this paper you sent in to be referred to?—Yes.

40,232. Perhaps you would read it?—I will take the first point, which is the only point upon which I can offer any suggestions for practical changes in the law. "The controversies which have arisen between the law of the land and the practice of the churches would be abated if the following general principles could be accepted by both: (1) Marriage has a double character, legal and religious; (2) there should be a double ceremony, each quite distinct; (3) the legal ceremony should be general, compulsory, and uniform; (4) the religious ceremony should conform to the rules of the communion to which the parties belong, or to the individual conscience of the marrying pair; (5) the religious ceremony should be entirely at the option of the parties; (6) it should have no legal effect or conditions; (7) every communion and every minister should be equally free to confer or to withhold such ceremony. The struggle has arisen from the practice of combining the legal and religious side of marriage in a single rite. The State still in England hands over one of its fundamental duties to a number of sects. The Church still strives to maintain an obsolete monopoly, and to enforce the substitution of a theological for a political sanction, and by this both State and Church are dishonoured in the struggle. Law, order, and conscience are equally offended." No. 1 is the point I wish to submit to this Commission: "The State has the highest interest in maintaining a uniform, public, simple form of lawful marriage. Property, family rights, personal duties, and liabilities all hang together on this institution. The State should not abdicate its duty of recording this legal act and suffer various religious bodies to keep these all-important registers. If public registers of birth and of death are compulsory, uniform, and official, why should not the State keep its own register of marriage and require its own conditions of the legal ceremony?" That is my first point, and I may say, is the only point upon which I think I can offer anything in the shape of suggestions for practical change in the law, and I am prepared now to answer any questions.

40,233. I think it would be simpler if you finished reading your proof?—Then I come to the second point: "To a large majority of Englishmen, and to almost all English women, marriage seems to demand a religious sanction of some kind over and above the legal sanction by the State. But since there is now a great variety of religious communities, and also wide differences of religious opinion, the religious sanction must be left purely voluntary at the discretion of the parties. To allow the religious rite to constitute, or in any way to affect or modify the legal rite, is to breed confusion and strife. The popular dislike of civil marriage in England is caused by the State having suffered the churches to retain their mediæval monopoly of the marriage rite, and by the scurvy way in which the civil rite was treated when the legislature was compelled to admit the protests of dissenting laymen. Civil marriage in other countries is made a decent, if not an honourable function, and it ought to be regarded as at least as formal and solemn an act as the investiture of a public functionary or the swearing in of public servants in ordinary judicial practice. In the ever-increasing diversity of religious opinions and congregations, and the repudiation by many persons of any religion, a plain and simple solution must be sought. Men and women to-day must be free to marry lawfully, whether they are within or without any Church, sect, or school of thought. The State must insist on its own independent, uniform, lay act in the law, distinct from any religious rite, and not affected by any religious rite, antecedent, subsequent or simultaneous. The State must have its own official, its own distinct ceremony, its own national register for all marriages alike. And it is a scandal that this fundamental institution of civil society should be treated as if it were a mere form, like taking out a licence to keep a dog or to drive a motor" —I mean by just going off to the registrar.

40,234. I think that finishes the subject of the necessary civil formal and respectful marriage?—Yes, as in other countries of Europe.

40,235. I think we might turn to the other aspect, because that is of importance?—I now proceed to that which I feel is an ideal and which is only practicable in a very altered state of things and in a very great religious reformation:—"To turn to the other aspect of marriage—the religious sanction, for what has been urged above was not based on any secularist point of view, but on the actual practice of a religious community. The body with which I have been associated for forty years, and of which I was the president until recent years, has always regarded marriage as a religious institution to be solemnised with a religious rite. To them marriage is a sacrament—the highest and most sacred of all sacraments, meaning (by that fine old Roman phrase) a public pledge to fulfil a personal, social, religious duty, to be faithful each to each, to form an honourable family in the nation. Marriage, we say, from the view of human religion is the devotion of one man to one woman by a bond which, if life in a spiritual sense is to survive after death should normally resist the dissolution of the body. In the religion of humanity, marriage is the exclusive and definitive consecration of the spouses to one another, and to the children, or even the childless family which by their union they form. That is to say, from the strictly religious point of view, that is to us Positivists, there is normally and regularly neither divorce nor re-marriage, even though one spouse be left physically—but not spiritually—widowed. On all this I need not enlarge to this Commission. It rests upon a vast scheme of ethical, social, philosophical, and religious reorganisation of life and thought. I do not come here to explain or to justify all that may be read in the voluminous works of Auguste Comte. I have often expressed my own opinion that many things therein are an impracticable Utopia, and some things even anti-social and certainly fantastic. I am speaking now of the actual practice of the community of which I was long the president, for whom I prepared and published a ritual of the sacrament of marriage—to be used after legal registration—and I have frequently officiated in conferring that ceremony in public. That ceremony, whilst insisting on the truly sacramental character of religious marriage, and denouncing the growing recourse to divorce, and to the really polygamic practice of successive re-marriages, carefully disclaimed any interference with the law of the land, any censure on those who choose to re-marry in the terms of the existing law, and emphatically refrained from asking for any pledge or promise to abstain from a second marriage. To the religion of humanity, second marriages may have full legal and moral validity —but cannot ask for any religious consecration. That being the practice of the religious community whose principles I have been asked to state, I need not attempt to put before the Commission my personal views as to the law of divorce. I should find it very difficult to distinguish my own advice to politicians from my religious sentiment and ideals. Comte himself fully recognised the difference between normal rules of society and special exceptions; and he formally laid it down that a conviction of penal servitude for life was a legitimate ground for annulling marriage. If I were a legislator, I might possibly accept some other exceptions arising from cruel cases of suffering. But human life and society have cruel cases of suffering on every side—cruel parents, cruel children, treacherous friends, fraudulent agents, and inhuman masters. And in our eagerness to save individuals, let us not ruin institutions by degrading the moral law which holds them together. To extend facilities for divorce to some is to vulgarise the sanctity of marriage for all.

Our body, here and abroad, has never given any countenance to the cry of modern democracy to extend and popularise divorce. On the contrary, it has always held divorce to be one of the most sinister and most dangerous symptoms of social dissolution, of moral anæmia, and of religious chaos. It seems to us the thin end of the wedge to establish free love."

40,236. On the paragraph "If I were a legislator I "might possibly accept some other exceptions arising "from cruel cases of suffering," in such cases as have been put very prominently before us in an earlier part of the evidence, where one spouse deserts another, leaving the deserted spouse in this country, and proceeds to America or the colonies, and by means of the laws there contracts a second marriage and brings up a family, what would be your view as to what a legislator should do with regard to the position of the person left behind in this country?—I am not prepared to make any general alteration of the law which would cover such cases, because, as I have said, to alter the law for all is to put temptation into the way of people to avail themselves of that licence.

40,237. Might I suggest the difficulty I feel, that that sort of fact exists now with the present state of the law which forbids the dissolution of the marriage—it exists, and there it is. We have had these cases put before us in large numbers, and the difficulty one feels, looking at it from a legislative point of view, is what is to be done with the persons left behind, and their children? Are they to be left to contract irregular alliances, as we are told they do, or placed in a position in which they can establish themselves in a proper way?—All I can say is that I am not prepared to extend the law of divorce. I am prepared to deal with gross cases of conjugal wrong, both criminally and by means of every possible social and religious stigma, and if that was done we should not have such frequent cases.

40,238. Might I suggest that in those cases the criminal law would not be operative? It could not operate outside the country, and the wrongdoer is beyond the reach of any social or other pressure. That is one of the strongest cases put before us?—I have read the cases which have been printed and put very carefully, and I have considered that, but, considering all that, I am not prepared to recommend any extension of the law of divorce.

40,239. The other point is, according to the views of the Positivist community, marriage once contracted is not only temporal, but is continuous, and they would not permit a second marriage, I understand?—That is dependent upon the whole of the Positivist view of subjective immortality; that is to say, the real moral and spiritual life of persons survives death. If that is ever to become a reality, that feeling will, we hold, prevent the re-marriage even after death, although, as I told you, in the marriage service which I have very frequently performed, which is now published, and a copy of which I will put in, we have always very carefully abstained from asking any pledge of that kind. We simply say that if you believe that the moral and spiritual life, although not the physical life of men and women, does survive the dissolution of the body, your marriage in a spiritual sense should be considered to live, and so far as I know I have not known of any case of re-marriage after death amongst the Positivist body since the whole community has been organised. I do not think there is any case.

40,240. That presents an idea which is beyond that which prevails in the Christian churches?—Certainly, very much, because that is what we have often insisted upon, which I have insisted upon in many printed works. It all rests upon the idea that there is a reality, a spiritual immortality after death, but this Commission is hardly the place in which I could enlarge upon such a subject.

40,241. I rather gather you would like the marriage service to appear with your evidence?—Yes, the marriage service is contained in my book called "The Creed of a Layman." The whole of that rests upon an entire re-organisation of our moral, social, and religious life, and I quite feel that it is merely at present an ideal. The Commission has listened to the views which have been put forward by moral reformers 2,000 years ago, and we are simply suggesting ideals which we believe may become practical centuries hence, but that really has no bearing upon immediate legislation.

40,242. I have looked through the papers; they are clearly marked. Shall we print the whole of this service?—Just as you think fit. It contains the whole points of the view of our body.

40,243. If you would like it to be put in, we will by all means?—Yes.

FORM OF MARRIAGE SERVICE.

In the Name of Humanity.

Order and Progress.—Live for Others.—Live openly.

The principle - - -	Love.
The foundation - -	Order.
The end - - - -	Progress.

Family.—Country.—Humanity.

We acknowledge that the moving spirit of our lives should be regard for others; for those, first, of our own household and family, for those, next, of our own country, and, lastly, for the whole race of man.

May we all learn to live for others, for only thus do we truly live. To live for others, not for self, is the real happiness of each of us, as it is our plain and simple duty. We acknowledge in humanity, in the past, the present, the future of man, the source of the best things that we possess; our protector and comforter, when evil things threaten us; the end and object of our work and hope.

We are met together to welcome as husband and wife this man and this woman; who, in the face of this congregation, and in ampler form, desire to renew the vows of wedlock which to-day they have made before the representative of the law. It has ever been the custom, both in ancient and in Christian times, for bridegroom and bride to assemble their friends, and solemnly to plight their troth in public. And in all civilized societies the primæval rite of marriage has been held to be an act both civil and religious—regulated, on the one side by law and the authority of the magistrate, and consecrated, on the other side, by the formal sanction of some spiritual communion. That twofold aspect of marriage we most unfeignedly respect. It is well that all who marry should accept such civil rite as is ordained by the law of the land; and also that they who think fit to be content therewith, should be free to act as their conscience directs. But marriage is a religious, no less than a civil act. It concerns society, as well as the two persons whom it unites, and the new family which it forms. Whilst it is the most decisive step that we can take in our personal life, it is the foundation of a new life in the home; and it is the means whereby man and woman take new parts in the social life of the community. For these reasons—reasons which have been approved in ancient and modern times—it becomes to us the foremost of those celebrations which we speak of as sacraments. The sacramentum of the old Roman citizen was the formal pledge that he took in presence of his comrades to be true to his country and his chief. And for ages the sacrament of marriage has been the formal pledge taken by the wedded pair, in presence of the congregation wherein they meet for worship, that they will love, serve, and honour each other; and also the Providence which they acknowledge as surrounding their lives. They who enter into the honourable estate of matrimony are taking upon themselves not only the solemn duty to be true husband and true wife to each other; but they take upon themselves new duties (no less solemn and even ampler) to the community in which they dwell, and to the great family of mankind. In the love, honour, and service which they promise to each other, they are learning to render to humanity itself love, honour, and service in a larger field. The presence and the sympathy of the congregation in which they meet, consecrates the obligation they take in this momentous epoch of their lives; and, investing their union with public acceptance, it dedicates it anew to the eternal human family, even as they dedicate to family affection and mutual help the new home they are about to form. Hear what the Master has said about the purpose and meaning of marriage:— "Marriage is the simplest and most perfect mode of "man's social life; the only society we can ever form, "where entire identity of interests obtains. It is a "union wherein each is necessary to the moral develop- "ment of the other; the woman surpassing the man "in tenderness, even as the man excels the woman in "strength." "Marriage joins together two beings to "the mutual perfecting and service of each other, by a "bond which no shadow of rivalry can darken. Its "essential purpose is to bring to completeness the "education of the heart. Attachment, in which it "begins, leads on to the spirit of reverence, and that "to the practice of goodness; each spouse is in turn "protector and protected; the one being richer in "affection, as the other in force." Again, he says: "Between two beings, even if united by strong mutual "affection, no harmony can exist unless one commands "and the other obeys. To work out her supremacy in the "moral sphere, the woman accepts the just rule of the "man in the practical." "When two beings so complex "and yet so different as man and woman are united "together, the whole of life is hardly long enough for "them to know each other fully and to love each other "perfectly." "The marriage bond is the only one in "which none can share, and which none can put "asunder; and so it outlasts even death itself. For "time, which tends to weaken all other domestic ties "does but cement more closely this one—the only "human union of which we can say: 'These two shall "be one.'" Lastly, he has said: "The moral value of "the domestic life is this: there is no other means "whereby man's personal life can be naturally enlarged "into a social life. It is the first stage in our pro- "gress to the end of all moral education—a spirit "of active goodness towards all mankind." In the spirit of these words, and in this human and social understanding of the solemn institution of marriage, these two persons present come now to acknowledge their union, as already complete in law; and in the presence of this body they will profess their willing- ness so to live. Let them, therefore, standing in the face of this congregation, repeat the words which custom and antiquity have sanctioned to our ears; words which the Church adopted from the ancients; which, in various forms and from time immemorial have been used as the symbols of marriage.

Wilt thou have this woman to thy wedded wife?

Wilt thou love her, comfort her, hearken to her, honour, and keep her in sickness and in health; and, forsaking all other, keep thee only unto her, so long as ye both shall live?

I will.

(Question: To the wife.)

Wilt thou have this man to thy wedded husband?

Wilt thou counsel and obey him, serve, love, honour, and keep him in sickness and in health; and, forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long as ye both shall live?

I will.

I, M., take thee, N., to my wedded wife, to have and to hold, from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish till death us do part.

I, N., take thee, M., to my wedded husband, to have and to hold, from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part.

With this ring I thee wed, with my body I thee worship, with all my worldly goods I thee endow.

In the name of those who are wont to meet in this place, and of all elsewhere who share our hopes (the feeble image of the greater family of mankind) I offer our welcome to those who to-day have entered into wedlock, and have pledged their troth before the law and before this congregation. We receive them as a new household added to our simple community. May the power of social sympathy add strength to their resolves, and grace to the aspirations of their hearts. May they long abide in mutual help and perfect love, fortifying and inspiring each other in all good things; a support to those around them, and an example to those who come after them. In the spirit of which things they desire to give their pledge, as follows:—

You do now, as husband and wife, profess your desire to live as useful and virtuous citizens in the world, and in all right ways in the faithful service of man: that the home which you are about to form in our midst may be the abode of love, industry, and peace within; the source of good works and just dealing to all your fellow citizens without?

(Answer by both.)

We do.

(Question to both standing.)

You do also resolve, that if children be born into your household, you will strive so to train them up worthily in the same spirit, that they may hereafter become true children of the great family of mankind?

Of all the institutions of society, that of marriage is the one which most plainly exhibits the law of progress throughout man's social life. In its primitive form, among the untutored races, it was surrounded by barbarous or fantastic customs, as caprice or selfish- ness dictated. In its early patriarchal form, as we read of it in the old records of the East, much of that caprice has disappeared; but, though a more human spirit of duty and protection is enforced, the selfishness of the stronger is but too manifest in its laws. In the habits of the Greeks, but far more in their poetry, a purer spirit arises; and the joining of one man with one woman in permanent and equal union is recognised at least in theory and of right. The Romans made a great advance on the moral standard of the Greeks; and the Roman matron has long served the world as a type, at least, on the sterner side, of the dignity and duty of the wife. But the practice of the Romans, especially in the days of their decline and in the centre of their empire, very early fell short of their primitive ideal. And nothing made the advent of a new religion more needful and more inevitable than the Roman corruption of marriage, and the degradation of woman from her true part in human life. The ages of Christendom enormously raised the institution of marriage, by establishing for the first time a real and true monogamy, and by insisting that marriage should be practically indissoluble. But the true beauty of the home was beyond the reach of any Catholic priest- hood, as the spiritual mission of woman was a sealed volume to a theology of figments. Both Catholic and Protestant rituals have failed to beautify marriage; and, by the instinct of modern sentiment, they are judged to be to-day behind the age. It is to modern morality, modern poetry, and modern sentiment, that we appeal to show forth the inner sanctity of marriage, and to dignify the wife and the mother, in all the glory and the power of her mission. Marriage—too long regarded in early times from the point of view of the lord and master, and as a mere source of multiplying the tribe—too long undervalued by the mystical extravagance of theology, as a lower state of life, as a concession to human weakness, as a material necessity of worldly life, which had to be enveloped in supernatural mystery—marriage has only, in our own age, been duly understood to be the great social instrument of religion; the moral education of man and of woman; the first link between the person and humanity; the stepping-stone from the lower self to the higher unself, or other self. You have heard how Auguste Comte has shown us that the home is the only natural mode by which man's selfish life is purified and elevated into social or unselfish life. And the wife is the centre of the normal home—the typical embodiment of the home influence. Certainly, all men and women are not husbands and wives, just as all homes are not the abode of any married pair. There are noble men who, for excellent reasons, are not husbands; and noble women who are not wives; as there are beautiful homes where there is neither wife nor husband. But the typical centre of the home is the wife, as the typical basis of the home is marriage. The home (in the sum) is the universal resting-place of normal man and normal woman; it is the source of our principal moral ideas; nay, it is the source of our real moral knowledge. And marriage constitutes the home in its normal and perfect form. The home, thus centred in marriage, is the miniature image of humanity, as marriage is the type and prelude of religion. The home, of which the married pair are the natural centre, has in its essential features all aspects of the great human family of which it is a unit; and all the conditions and elements of religion begin to be exercised in the married state. Its originating principle is love. Its basis is the order of a true and natural distribution of duties. Its end is the moral progress of husband and wife; she growing stronger by use in the spiritual influence of affection and tenderness, he growing stronger by exercise in the active duty of protection, devotion, and endurance. She yields when he commands; whilst she leads in inspiration and by moral suasion. He leads by force of his superior strength in labour and public activity; he follows when he is animated by her pure counsels, or moderated by her sympathy and pity. Both gain in true strength—both, in turn and in their due sphere, guiding and following; both, broadening to their true mission: the husband ruling as materially the master in his own house; the wife guiding as, morally, the mistress of her home. As the Roman matron said in their marriage rite: "Ubi tu Caius, ego Caia"—"Where thou art master, I too am mistress." The symbol this of the material and the moral power; government and counsel; the world of action and the world of feeling; State and Church. But in our faith the end of marriage does not stop there. It is not alone the normal completeness of the married pair; it is the State, society, humanity, which is the final aim of the family. As we are reminded by the inscriptions on these walls, family is but an element of country, as that is but an element of humanity. If the progress of our affections stopped short at family, the family itself would develop a deeper collective selfishness. It is a danger which besets all modern societies, and none more sorely than our own. The very end of the family is perverted, if in love for our family we are estranged from the public. The central maxim of our faith is—live for others. We learn to live for others best, as we live for our parents, our brothers, and our sisters, after the flesh; then mainly most deeply as we live for our wives, and in good time for our children and descendants. But to live for our wives or our husbands, for our children or our household, to the exclusion and forgetfulness of all wider duties, is to live for self in a way, less coarse it may be than the life of the mere individual, but perhaps more injurious to society, more widely at war with the spirit of humanity. In the history of marriage as an institution there are two main features which show a continual progress—and to-day there are two great dangers by which the institution is menaced. From the first, marriage has tended to become more and more exclusive and indissoluble, and the position of wife has more and more tended to that of a moral and spiritual supremacy. Monogamy—the marriage of one man to one woman for ever—has been the slow triumph of ages of civilization. And even yet, it is far from perfectly observed. The wife who was once but the first of the slaves, and then the mere mother of children, has but lately been recognised as the good genius of the home. And even yet there are households too many where the ancient savagery remains. There are two dangers, I have said, which menace the institution, and they both are steps backward in the progress of ages. The growing tendency for facilitating divorce and re-marriage—the very practice which ruined marriage at Rome—is pressing upon us with the lawless passions of democracy and its claim to be free of all social limitations. And the same democratic passion for equality is madly pressing onward to assimilate the functions of man and woman, and even to annihilate the distinction of sphere between that of the husband and that of the wife. It is the aim of our faith, and it has no aim more sacred and urgent to resist both these tendencies; to counteract both these social poisons; and to strive, without rest or equivocations, to the further development of the institution of marriage—the basis of all society and the school of all morality—under the same two conditions towards which it has ever been tending. The two conditions are: the completely exclusive and indissoluble form of marriage, and the recognising the wife as the moral head of the home. Where divorce is common, marriage is not exclusive or even permanent; whilst monogamy itself is degraded to a temporary union at will. The progress towards divorce is therefore the retrogression towards polygamy. And the man who, as in some Protestant countries, marries in succession several living wives, never truly has one wife at all. And so, in like manner, the moral headship of the woman is destroyed where she is urged to grasp the material power of the man, to compete with him in the same sphere. It will be the mission of our faith in the future to carry to its furthest limit the exclusive and indissoluble nature of the marriage bond. Marriage is the eternal devotion of one man to one woman—a bond in which but they two can enter, and which none can put asunder. It survives death itself. I speak not of possible exceptions under special conditions, of which extreme shortness of married life together on earth is obviously the chief. We ask for no legal restrictions upon the re-marriage of those whose marriage has been sundered by death. But, morally and normally, marriage is the union of one man to one woman for ever, and once for all—it is their union physically, morally, spiritually; in life, and in death, in sight, and in memory; in material society, and in spiritual communion. Were it less than this, it would stop short of becoming the moral education of the heart and soul. It is no part of our duty, as a nascent, rudimentary society, to impose beforehand on those who come amongst us a formal pledge to this effect. We will leave it to them, in the fullness of married life, to form such a resolution in the ripeness of their own free judgment. Much less is it any part of my duty, who have no sacerdotal pretension whatever, to ask any vow to such end. But it is no less my duty as the organ and mouthpiece of those who meet here in the faith in humanity, to assert this sacred, this tremendous obligation as normally a part of the true obligation of marriage, as inextricably bound up with all we believe and with all we teach. And in like manner it is my duty to assert that the dignity of marriage is impaired when the moral sphere of the woman is confounded with, or surrendered for, the practical sphere of the man; to appeal to the duty of increasing that dignity and enlarging that moral sphere in every way, and the need of protecting the woman in her indispensable mission. That mission is impaired and ruined by all that impedes the woman in the true duty of the home; by all which withdraws the mother or the wife from the incomparable task of being its real moral providence. By engrossing labour, by absence from the home, be it in toil or in pleasure, by the burden of children too numerous to tend or to train, by the distraction of too many cares, by ambition to shine, by eagerness to gain money, by all that dries up in woman the fountains of love, joy, and pity; by all that strangles in the wife her grace, her tenderness, her self-respect, her purity, her refinement; by all that chokes in the mother her passion for her little ones, her yearning anxiety for their welfare in body and soul; by every coarse word, or selfish act, or sordid thought of him who is the natural protector of the home, the home is degraded and ruined. To far brighter and purer ends we would dedicate the married life which begins amongst us to-day. May the happy auspices with which it opens be ever unclouded and unchanged. May this new home be a source of happiness and goodness within, and a strength and an example without. May the master of this new household make it a pattern of industry, good order, and moral well-being in all the acts of a good citizen and a just head of an honourable family. May the mistress of this new household make it a pattern of tenderness, purity, and devotion in all the things that belong to true and perfect wife. And if this household shall hereafter be blessed with children, may they be trained up in all things that belong to love and goodness; first by their mother, then by both parents equally, till at last they be worthy to enter into the training and the service of society. Thus we would trust that all the great principles of our faith may be here expressed and illustrated afresh. May all they of this household, resting on good order inspired by love, and striving after moral improvement, be seen for ever to live for others, and as they live openly, may they live in the spirit of order and of progress, so that a new and worthy family may be this day added to our country; imaging to us all, whilst it realises and prospers in it, the great life of humanity itself.

40,244. (Sir William Anson.) I understand that the question of divorce or even of re-marriage would not concern your community in any way; you do not contemplate either divorce or re-marriage? — No, not from a religious point of view, certainly; and might I protest against the extension of the present law of divorce? I remember the establishment of the law of divorce at the time of the great duel between Sir Richard Bethell and Mr. Gladstone, when Mr. Gladstone made a magnificent fight for the old law, and I do not hesitate to say I and my friends regret the establishment of the Divorce Court. I may say the old law, bad as it was, with all its evils, to my mind did not affect general society. The public never for a moment regarded divorce as possible. I suppose the rare cases of divorce by Act of Parliament were called forth with a view to establishing succession to titles and to great landed estates, and things of that kind. The general public regarded it as out of the question, and did not require the horrible publicity or the vast expense of an Act of Parliament, and therefore it did not touch them. But when the Divorce Court was established all marriages were immediately affected, and in my opinion any change and extension of that law of divorce would still further affect all marriages and all homes. That is our point of view.

40,245. In fact you regard the Act of 1857 as a step in the wrong direction?—Yes.

40,246. You would rather the State did not advance upon that. I observe you would like to sever altogether the civil contract of marriage from the religious ceremony. Outside your own community do you think that would be to the advantage or otherwise of the sacred and serious character of the marriage obligation?—I think that it would be good on the whole, because it would avoid the immense amount of hypocrisy and falsehood which goes on when persons most hostile to the religious ceremony think it a matter of social convenience to submit to it. That, to my mind, has a very serious effect upon the whole social point of view, and very much injures the authority and the influence of the Church, that avowedly and knowingly consecrates Agnostics by a sacrament, when they know perfectly well persons submitting to it regard it with hostility, not only indifference. It weakens their influence. Everybody present is aware a gross act of hypocrisy is being carried out. I think it must do harm. We are very anxious indeed that there should be solemnity not only with the religious service but also with the civil, and for that purpose if civil marriage were made compulsory and general, it should be put in the hands of other functionaries. I should suggest something like mayors, lord mayors and mayors, and also perhaps three justices sitting in petty sessions, in a public justice court, in a quarter sessions court, and perhaps not interfering with the present registrars; but it might be done gradually, supposing the practice became universal and common. So in Catholic countries like France and Austria there is no objection raised to civil marriage, even by extreme Catholics, and it is made a serious and interesting ceremony. I think without touching the present registrar's office, the civil marriage might be entered into before mayors, chairmen of quarter sessions, or perhaps three justices, in a public way, something of that kind; but in my opinion it is essential that there should be ample notice given, and ample publicity of intended marriage. The great evil of the present registration system is that marriages are so contracted quite secretly, and in the shabbiest way often, and under the most sinister circumstances. I think it essential there should be publicity. If I was asked how the law might be amended, speaking of civil marriage, I would say in the first place, by insisting upon ample notice, ample publicity, and perhaps raising the age of marriage, and requiring, possibly, affidavits of the fitness of the persons to marry, including, no doubt, their conditions as to sanity and to health. That would be essential.

40,247. The reason I asked was because we have had conflicting evidence as to the effect of making the civil marriage the only legal form, leaving the religious ceremony to the option of the parties. You do not think that would, taking the case of the population of the large towns, affect the seriousness with which the obligation was entered into, assuming, as you suggest, that the civil marriage was surrounded by more accessories?—On the contrary, I think its effect would be good, and would increase the seriousness and sanctity of the marriage bond, even of those who went no further, because they would feel that they were engaging in a civil public act for which they were responsible, and that there was no sort of concealment of opinion, no hypocrisy, no saying one thing when you meant another in the matter at all. It would be a bonâ fide act of civic duty, and on the whole the effect would be good. If some of the churches say "We might lose," that does not affect me. I think in time people will see it is necessary to have a real religious marriage from the public and social and human point of view.

40,248. You think in time they would come to associate a religious character with the civil function?—I think so; for instance, take our own experience: ours is not a very large body, but it has been in existence now for 30 years. In connection with it there is a guild of 100 or so of young women, mostly working women in factories. There is another guild of young men, mostly young clerks and young workmen, and we find amongst them that very many of them decline, both the men and the women, any religious service in the existing churches, but both of them, and especially the women, very much desire a religious service, and therefore they come to us. The marriage ceremony which I have published, and which I have put in, was forced upon me; I did not suggest it to anybody. We had young people who had met together in the guilds (my wife was the president of one guild, and my successor was the president of the other guild), we had known them for months and years very often, and had seen them together, and when they came and said they desired to have a religious marriage, I found it then necessary to form my service. I saw them, and gradually formed, after a great deal of consultation with friends, the marriage ceremony which I have now put in. I may say that we never gave that without full knowledge of the people. I have had before me once or twice a couple who were outside our strict Positivist community. Amongst others I had Dr. S. C., the head of a great Ethical movement; his intended wife, came to me and asked me to perform the ceremony of marriage. I said, "The question "is, do you sufficiently accept this point of view? "I do not regard you as being entirely members " of our body," because there were things which they hesitated to accept, and I had interviews with both of them together, and they satisfied me that in the first place they had had that printed ceremony before them, had studied it, and they came back to me and said, " Yes, we will accept that." I said, " Under " those circumstances let us proceed," and the ceremony took place in Kensington Town Hall, which was full, with good musical ceremonies. Recently the same thing has occurred with one of the professors of a Scotch University. He is an Englishman, but has now married a Scotch lady, and they insisted upon the Positivist ceremony. I said, " But I must know a little " more about you, and know that the bride as well as " the bridegroom accepts that point of view; are you " going to make these protestations in real earnest? " Do you mean it, and feel it, and do you recognise the " seriousness of making such professions as these "—because there are very serious professions in that little form—and after inquiry I found that they did. One is actually a member of our Positivist committee, and a scientific man of great value and ability. We married them with musical ceremonies in the Old Hall of Clifford's Inn. That was an instance. On another occasion a man came to me after attending a great many of our discourses—I had been speaking—and said he wished to be married. I said, " You come to " us frequently at Newton Hall, but I do not know " anything about your intended wife, and what are " you?" He was an Irishman, and spoke with an Irish accent, and I said, " Are you a Catholic?" and he said he was. I said, " Why do you not get " married in the Catholic Church?" He said there was a difficulty, and I asked what difficulty. He said the fact was he had been divorced, his wife had divorced him and the Catholics would not marry him now. I said " I daresay not, nor would I, so you must go away."

40,249. (Lady Frances Balfour.) How many Positivists are there, can you say?—I do not know. We keep no Positivist roll. There is a Positivist society in which people are actually enrolled.

40,250. You have no way of numbering them; you cannot say how many you have in the society?—No, we have no roll. There are several societies about; there are two in London. Another body meeting in Holborn has sent you, I believe, an address which has been given; with the substance of that address I very much agree.

40,251. You are against divorce, but supposing it exists you would like to make the law equal between men and women?—Certainly not, at present as things are.

40,252. You prefer it as it stands, cruelty as well as adultery?—I am prepared to see great alteration of the law for various forms of marital wrong. I should like to see criminal legislation, but I should trust still more to the growth of moral, spiritual and social, and religious stigma; I am prepared to deal with a variety of cases of conjugal wrong even in a criminal way.

40,253. You would not allow it to be equal between men and women, as it is in Scotland?—No, certainly not; it is not the same thing. I cannot imagine the idea of putting the possible casual act of passion of a man by which he may become a father as having the moral, the social, and the physical consequences of the woman becoming a mother. It seems to me the two things are so absolutely incommensurable that I cannot for a moment say there is any similarity in them.

40,254. The sin is different between the two?—I do not know about the sin. I do not say the sin is different. Morally speaking, I see very little to choose between the male and female sinner.

40,255. The infidelity of wife against husband is the same as husband against wife?—Very much.

40,256. (Chairman.) Could you not give some idea of the numbers of the Positivist community as you know them?—No, I cannot give you any idea of numbers. There is no roll. There are a great number of people who come. I was talking the other day to a learned prelate, and he said, " You know I have " sat under you at Newton Hall," and a great many have.

40,257. I did not mean the number that attended the place of worship or instruction, but those you would enumerate as recognised members of the society?—I cannot give any number; besides which I do not think it is a thing which interests or concerns this Commission.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much. I think that concludes everything you have been good enough to say, and I must thank you very much for coming here.

Mr. ISAAC SHARP called and examined.

40,258. (Chairman.) You are a member of the Society of Friends. Do you hold any official position?—I am the general secretary of the Society of Friends, working at the central offices at Devonshire House, Bishopsgate.

40,259. You attend here on behalf of the Society?—I am here as the representative of the Society, at the request of its executive committee.

40,260. A communication was made asking whether the Society desired to present their views, and you are sent in answer to that?—I am sent to present a memorial and support it, if you require, with evidence.

40,261. The memorial we take as read; it will appear in the print, as signed by direction of a meeting held for the purpose of passing it?—Not held for that purpose only: at the regular meeting of the executive committee of the Society of Friends this came on the agenda for that particular day.

40,262. May I take it, as it will appear as part of your proof, to be a memorial which practically places women on the same footing as men?—That is the one point in it.

40,263. That is the only point you have come to present?—It is the only point. May I hand you the signed copy?

Memorial of the Representative Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends in Great Britain.

To the President and Members of the Royal Commission for inquiring into the Divorce Law and its Administration.

Respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialists, in considering the proposals now being made regarding the amendment of the law of divorce, desire to lay before you their convictions on the subject of the equality of men and women under the moral law.

For two and a half centuries as a Religious Society, we have in practice recognised equality between the sexes in spiritual, as well as in educational and other matters, and the results have led us to value highly the benefit to the community of this equality, and particularly the benefit of an equal moral standard.

We deplore the present law, by which, while faithfulness is required from the wife, the husband's unfaithfulness does not give ground for divorce unless accompanied by " legal " cruelty.

We condemn the false principle which does not demand from men the same moral life as from women, and we maintain that the present inequality of the law has a disastrous effect upon the public, in encouraging the view that the morality of men is not important.

We believe that our recognition of equality in religious, educational, and business affairs of the Society has laid the foundations of a view of marriage in which troubles leading to divorce are less likely to occur, because there is a better feeling as to the mutual obligations of the sexes. Divorce is, in fact, practically unknown in our Society, and we believe that the influence of the laws of the country would tend in the same direction if they were based on equality between men and women.

From the point of view of justice to women, of the moral health of the nation, and of the educative influence which laws exert upon the community, your memorialists will be thankful if your Commission will recommend that relief shall be granted to an injured

40,300. I leave it in your hands?—In the annual report of 1907 there is this passage: "Divorce.—The "words of the presiding judge of the Divorce Court "uttered a year ago have had the effect which might "have been expected; they have led to the formation "of a Divorce Law Reform Union, which is agitating, "in the supposed interests of morality, for a wide "extension of the Law of Divorce. This new organ- "isation boasts that it has already received promises "of support from many influential members of Parlia- "ment, and the fact that a Bill has been introduced "into Parliament for the purpose of enabling the "wives of convicts sentenced to more than seven years' "penal servitude to obtain a divorce, illustrates the "deplorable trend of opinion on this question. There "must be no slackening in the work of spreading "information; and the President and Council would "respectfully urge the Clergy to give suitable in- "struction in view of the fact that a generation has "grown up which accepts divorce as an established "institution, belonging to the natural order of things, "and neither shameful nor against the Law of God "and the Church. Moreover, there is grave reason to "fear that marriages of divorced people are in- "creasing in the Diocese of London. The Chancellor "of that Diocese is understood to have introduced a "new rule into his office, which provides that licences "issued to persons who have been divorced are to be "withdrawn from the general list, in order, it is sug- "gested, to prevent those who object to such marriages "from becoming acquainted with the name of the "church at which the ceremony is to take place. "It is, therefore, matter for regret that a resolution, "respectfully asking the Bishop to direct his clergy "to refuse to act upon licences issued by his "Chancellor to divorced persons was not allowed to "appear on the agenda paper of the recent meeting "of the London Diocesan Conference. Two objects "must be kept in view: (1) the freeing of the Church "from all complications arising from this infamy, and "(2) as already suggested in America the redemption "of society from the corruption which increases year "by year as a consequence of the Divorce Act of 1857. "The true remedy would be to repeal that Act, and "to forbid all divorce a vinculo, except in the one case "of nullity of marriage, whether such marriages have "been celebrated with religious rites or not. It must "always be remembered that the Church is under "grave responsibility to the nation in this respect, for "the Divorce Act could never have become law had "the Bishops of that time done their duty to the "Church and State." That was in 1907. In 1910 there is a similar passage. It introduces no new argument, in fact, it just re-affirms what was said before as to the desirability of bringing about a better state of things by the repeal of the Act of 1857. "For some "years past, as was noted by the President and "Council in their last report, it has been apparent "that efforts would be made to extend the operation "of the existing law concerning divorce. The appoint- "ment of a Royal Commission as the result of a "motion in the House of Lords, made by Lord Gorell, "the former President of the Admiralty, Probate and "Divorce Division, in the High Court of Justice, was "no surprise. The Commission has held many "sittings, and has received much evidence. This "evidence, which has been published in the news- "papers day by day, although not in a complete form, "sufficiently indicates the nature of the proposals "which are being made in various quarters, and the "dangers which would result from their adoption. It "is asserted that the poor are being unfairly treated, "inasmuch as they cannot get decrees of divorce for "want of means, and that there ought not to be one "law for the rich and another for the poor. This was "the great argument used by the supporters of the "Act of 1857. If such be the case, the repeal of the "Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act would be a "great step towards the remedying of the alleged "injustice. All the predictions made in 1857, as to "the disaster which would overtake the Church and "society by the alterations of the law then made, have "been more than fulfilled. The English Church Union "has always consistently held the view which the "President and Council here express. Happily there "are signs that those who have appeared to be "indifferent in the past, and have connived at, "and sanctioned breaches of the Church's law, are "now alarmed; and the President and Council trust "that no sort of unworthy compromise will on "this occasion be attempted. Certain individual "suggestions, however, entirely inconsistent with "Church principles, have already been made in "quarters where they would not have been expected, "and have raised much comment. On the other hand, "successive judges in the Divorce Court, after the "experience gained there, have declared that in the "interests of public morality it would be well if the "indissolubility of marriage could once more be "affirmed by law. That is the opinion always firmly "held by the members of the English Church Union, "knowing that the law of the Church declares that "the bond of matrimony is indissoluble save by death. "It is most satisfactory to note that at the last group of "sessions a report was presented to the Lower House of "the Convocation of Canterbury, which speaks with no "uncertain voice on this matter. The House itself, "after a very serious debate, adopted resolutions "opposing any increase of facilities for divorce, and "asserting the desirability of the repeal of the "Divorce Act, 1857." Mr. Wood, who is here, was a member of that committee of the Lower House of the Canterbury Convocation. The Union, as I said just now, has been consistent throughout, and amongst other things one might mention the fact of a great meeting at Exeter Hall in 1896, at which a letter to the President was read from Mr. Gladstone, dated March 7th, 1896: "My dear Halifax, my opinions, so "often declared during the last forty years remain "unchanged, and as a meeting hostile to the principle "of divorce your meeting on Tuesday has my full "and warm sympathy. Always sincerely yours, "W. E. Gladstone." Perhaps I might mention that the Council of the Union in 1896 thought it necessary and desirable to pass this resolution: "That to "sanction, permit, assist at, or otherwise connive at "the use in Church of any ceremony connected with "the legal union of a divorced person is conduct "incompatible with membership in E.C.U." That resolution has once or twice been acted on with the result, in one case, of the resignation of a member, and in the other, of an apology for what was thought to be contrary to the principles of the Union. I think I do not need to say more about the Union. I trust I have made clear the position.

40,301. What are the grounds upon which the English Church Union would seek to repeal the Act of 1857?—I am coming to that presently.

40,302. I thought you were passing away to something else?—In the last part of my memorandum I raise the question.

40,303. Will you finish that now?—On the ground that we think it is contrary to the law of Christ; that it is not conducive to the good of civil society; that it is destructive to family life, and that it is a dishonour to our Lord and to His Church.

40,304. I suppose that the first point, that it is contrary to the law of Christ, is based upon the Gospel teaching?—It is based upon the law of the Church which declares the law of Christ.

40,305. I do not quite follow that ——

40,306. (Sir William Anson.) Where?—I had prepared this. The law of the Church is declared in the Book of Common Prayer, and in the canons of the Church. The Prayer Book service is familiar surely to all of us, and the canons.

40,307. (Chairman.) You mean by "in the Book of Common Prayer," where it deals with the marriage service?—Yes, we get it there, and the canons of the Church of 1603, of Canterbury and York of 1604, canons 106, 107, 108. There is nothing to say it is not competent for the State to repeal those.

40,308. May I take it your view is that those are in accordance with the Gospel teaching?—Quite.

40,309. The real position that results from that is that the Union will desire to see the Act of 1857 repealed?—Entirely.

40,310. That would make an end of all the difficulties?—Yes, and would do away with the alleged inequality as between the rich and the poor.

40,311. They are prepared to take that view, and adhere to it, notwithstanding the amount of suffering that would be inflicted upon those who have utilised, or still would continue to utilise, the Act?—The amount of suffering? In what way do you mean—spiritual suffering? Do you mean if Church people reject the law of the Church, which it is so clear is binding on them? They do it at their risk. We cannot consider particular cases of suffering as against the good of the whole Church.

40,312. I want to get quite clear the position. That would exclude from consideration the dissolution of the tie in all those cases we have had put before us, of people going to other countries and leaving their partners to look after themselves?—I do not know that the Church could alter her universal law to meet particular cases.

40,313. It would also exclude from consideration cases where a man or woman was living in the same neighbourhood with another person and producing children, in the case of the woman, while the person left behind was left alone?—I do not know how the Church of Christ can be expected to lower her standards and alter her laws to meet the lapses and all the difficulties of individual sinners.

40,314. I want to get the position quite clear?—I think that fairly states it.

40,315. Does that exhaust all you have to say?—No, I would like to come back to that. I will deal with the last part of my memorandum if you wish.

40,316. You mean that part which begins "There " can be no question as to the law of the Church"?—Yes. I say the marriage service in the Book of Common Prayer is plain enough.

40,317. What do you mean by saying, "There can " be no question as to the law of the Church"?—It is so plain I do not see how anybody could dispute it.

40,318. I do not want to interfere with the course of your evidence, but we have had three different views from the Church?—From Church people?

40,319. Yes?—I will deal with those. I have them in my mind.

40,320. May I ask whether, if there are three views presented to us by different people from the same Church, you can maintain that there can be no question as to the law of the Church?—I think so. I think you will see my position if I may make my statement. I have said: "Divorce for a faithful Church person is unthinkable. Nor is it open to anybody in the Church, from bishops downwards, to go behind the authority of the Church and deduce for themselves exceptions taken from the Bible. They are bound to accept the Church's law." There is no question about the Prayer Book and about the canons, and it is alleged that much use has been made of the resolutions of the Lambeth conference of the bishops in 1888, and the conclusions of that committee. I believe it is common knowledge it recognised an exception which was carried by a small minority of the committee, while the encyclical letter which went out from the conference has this in it: "The sanctity of " marriage as a Christian obligation implies the faithful " union of one man with one woman until the union " is severed by death." So that the conclusions of that committee have not been generally accepted in the Church. For instance, I hold in my hand a very valuable report on divorce. It is a report of the Lower House of Convocation of York (and I should be glad to send a sufficient number of copies for the information of the Commission) which passed these resolutions on June 4th, 1896, eight years after the Lambeth conference, nemine contradicente: "(1) That " the marriage law of the English Church is that " to which those who are members of it must " look, and by which they must abide. (2) That this " law is clearly set forth in the marriage service, " namely, that the sanctity of marriage as a Christian " obligation consists in the faithful union of one man " with one woman until the union is severed by death " (3) That this law is in accordance with Holy Scripture, and has the support of the vast majority of " Councils, and of Fathers, and these the most weighty. " (4) That this law does not permit the marriage of " any person separated by divorce, so long as the " former partner is living. (5) That it is, therefore, " inconsistent to issue any marriage licence, or to " allow banns to be published, or a marriage to be " solemnized with the rites of the Church, for any " such person." Those are the conclusions of the committee which issued a very valuable report, and as further evidence that the resolutions of the committee of the Lambeth conference are not followed throughout the Church of England and Churches in union with her, I would like to remind the Commission that the general Synod of the Canadian Church in September 1905 passed this canon: "That no clergyman of this " Church shall solemnize the marriage of any divorced " persons in the lifetime of either of them." Only the other day the House of Bishops of the Episcopal Church in the United States of America, on October 18th, resolved to take steps to amend their canon so that it will read, "No minister knowingly after due " inquiry shall solemnize the marriage of any person " who has been or is the husband or wife of any other " person then living from whom he or she has been " divorced for any cause arising after marriage." You were good enough to draw my attention to certain views placed before this Commission, but I do not claim to be a scholar, and I do not wish to enter into any question of Biblical criticism. I would like to remind the Commission that views so confidently expressed as to the exception in disputed texts in St. Matthew's Gospel, are not generally accepted, and I will read two short extracts bearing that out.

40,321. What are the extracts from?—From a paper. I do not want to argue myself about it.

40,322. I only ask you so that we may be able to look at it afterwards?—For instance, in the session of the Shrewsbury Congress in 1896 Dr. Luckock, who is now dead—he was then Dean of Lichfield—in the first paper on "the Church's law of marriage, especially in " relation to divorce," had this to say on this very subject: "The subject is dealt with directly or in- " directly eight times in Holy Scripture. In six of " these marriage is regarded as indissoluble, save by " death, without the slightest hint of any possible " exception. In the two remaining those who advocate " re-marriage after divorce for adultery claim to find " divine authority for the practice. Now, if they are " right, I am bound to say that it lays a tremendous " strain upon our belief in the inspiration of Scripture. " To be told that our Blessed Lord deliberately allowed " that upon one condition the marriage tie was broken " —changing thereby the whole character of its original " conception—and yet that the All-wise Spirit of God " permitted, yea, even moved, three out of four of the " sacred writers upon the subject to make no mention " of the exceptional concession, simply fills us with " blank amazement. I purpose now to concentrate " your attention upon the two passages in St. Matthew's " Gospel on which the claim is based." Dr. Luckock was a scholar of great repute and had written on this subject. I will read one other passage from that same congress at that same session by Prebendary Barker, then Rector of Marylebone, who is now Dean of Carlisle, and I am sure that Dr. Barker would not object to the description that he represents a large number of liberal-minded clergy. Here are his words: "But I " would observe in the words of the Rev. Oscar Watkins, " whose valuable book, 'Treatise upon the Divine Law " of Marriage,' should be studied by all interested in " this subject, that 'there are extraordinary variations " ' in the reading of this text. The original reading " ' may well have contained no reference to re-marriage " ' at all. And in any case the uncertainty of the " ' reading makes it very undesirable to base any " ' argument upon it.' However, whatever interpreta- " tions is put upon it, it is inconceivable that our " Blessed Lord should contradict Himself; and to " interpret it in the sense of giving His sanction to

" divorce a vinculo would be in flat contradiction to " His own words in other and undisputed passages, " e.g., 'Have ye not read, that He which made them at " 'the beginning, made them male and female; and " 'said, For this cause shall a man leave father and " 'mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and they " 'twain shall be one flesh? Wherefore they are no " 'more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath " 'joined together let no man put asunder.' Christ, " in fact, raised the divine ordinance of marriage to the " position of a sacrament. He made the marriage " bond indissoluble except by death, because it was " impossible to sunder it. The relation between " husband and wife is not in His view an artificial " relation, but an essential one, like that between " father and son. Once a son always a son. Once a " wife always a wife. Once a husband always a " husband. Having by God been made one, they " could never be divided so as to be at liberty to " re-marry while either lived, any more than the " mystical union, to which St. Paul compares mar- " riage, between Christ and His Church can ever be " broken." I do not think I need add anything more to that branch of the subject.

40,323. I do not wish to argue it with you, but the reason I wanted to know a little more from you was because you say there can be no question as to the law of the Church. I understand your view to be as expressing the sentiment of the Church Union, that the law of the Church is that marriage is indissoluble?—Yes.

40,324. Why I do not understand your statement that there can be no question is because we have the law of the land passed in 1857, and a number of the bishops voted for it. That would go to show there is a question at any rate?—I am extremely sorry as a Churchman to be reminded of that incident. I have a pretty extensive acquaintance with the feelings and sentiments of my brother Church people, and the Bishops in Parliament are not the Church. They do not sit in the House of Lords as hostages for the Church, or as representing the Church, and they had no authority from the Church to take part in helping the State to change the law of marriage.

40,325. May I remind you that one was the Archbishop of Canterbury, and another the Bishop of London?—I should be sorry to detain the Commission to say at length all that one has always felt, and all that churchmen generally feel about those facts.

40,326. I do not wish to argue it for one moment, except to suggest it is hardly correct to say that there is no question as to the law of the Church?—The Church has raised no question in her corporate capacity. Individual members of the Church—bishops, priests, and laymen—no doubt have done things which are contrary to the settled law of the Church.

40,327. What do you understand to be the Church?—Our part of the whole Catholic Church of Christ.

40,328. How does it present its views?—For us who live here in union with the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, in these two provinces we are bound not only by the Divine law, but also by that law as expressed in our own marriage service and in our own canons.

40,329. I do not think you caught my meaning. How does the Church make its law plain? By what voice?—Do you mean in what circumstances? I do not follow you.

40,330. You said that the Church's view is so and so. I wanted to know how you said that the Church manifests its view?—In her own marriage service and her canons by which her priesthood and bishops are bound. The whole thing is fully gone into in this report.

40,331. I think that exhausts the point about the present position?—Yes, I think so. That is all I wish to say; I do not wish to argue.

40,332. The other part of the case is your experience in South London?—Yes, with regard to general Church opinion, I should like to say since this Commission was appointed there has been a very strong opinion manifested all over the country against any extension of divorce and also a strong feeling in favour of the repeal of the Act of 1857.

40,333. Will you tell me by whom that feeling has been manifested?—By branches of our union, and notably at the annual conference of the Church of England Men's Society, which was held at Bristol at the end of October with 1,000 delegates.

40,334. I think we had that yesterday?—I do not think you have had this.

40,335. I was not here myself, but I am told that we had the secretary yesterday?—I will be very brief. I was a delegate to that conference. There were 1,000 delegates at that conference, and I was one of them, and to a resolution advocating personal purity this rider was carried unanimously: "And further " trusts that individual members, branches, and " federations will also do their utmost to defend the " Church's law of marriage and resist divorce, so that " the cause of public and private morality may be " better maintained." I know what was behind that rider, because I drafted it myself, and it was carried unanimously at that conference. What was remarkable was that the loudest cheers upon this question at the conference were given to an expression of opinion made by a speaker, that the only way out of all these difficulties was to repeal the Act of 1857. I think that is all I have to say about that.

40,336. You have also a passage in your report giving your own experience?—I will willingly do that. I think I may put in my own experience. I lived for 26 years in South London, from 1873 till the end of 1899. It was before the days of settlements and poor men's lawyers and Labour members of Parliament, and it was in a period when instructed church people rather liked to live in poor parishes and to do what good they could. For 17 years I lived in Horselydown, a parish on the banks of the Thames in Southwark, just at the foot of the Tower Bridge. I held many offices in that parish, in fact, every office a layman could hold. I was rather an active politician. I was twice vice-president of the liberal association of the district, I was chairman of a radical club, and I think I knew the life of the poor as well as anybody about there. I was constantly taking part in all sorts of discussions, and I should like to mention one incident which would show that I did possess the confidence of my neighbours. When the great dock strike got to that side of the river, there was some fear of disorder, and I was asked if I would address a meeting of the strikers, because they feared that they would not be recognised by the people who were conducting the strike at Poplar. I did so, and took down the first list of the names of those people on strike, and that list was taken over by Dr. Esmonde the next morning at Poplar. I only mention that to show that I was well known, and knew the poor very well, and that my neighbours had confidence in me. They came to me with all sorts of troubles and difficulties of every kind and description, but never once was I asked by any woman or man in trouble whether there was any way by which they could be separated or the marriage tie could be dissolved. I am quite clear about it, because I think those who know me would allow that I was an active worker in all sorts of ways, and really did know the lives of the poor. There is another experience I should like to mention, I have only thought of it to-day. There was a small but influential body of communicants of the Church, called the Guild of St. Matthew, which did a lot of work in giving lectures on all subjects at radical clubs in London during the eighties. Their main work was to combat the secularism which was identified with the name of Mr. Bradlaugh, and in all those connections, and in all my work as a political and church worker amongst the poor, and as willing to give lectures of that sort, I never once remember the question of divorce, or the need of the divorce laws being extended having been raised. On the contrary I found amongst the poor a general abiding respect for the marriage bond. Many times it has been said to me, "After all, he is my husband" or "after all, she is my wife." I do not know what evidence there is, or what facts it can be based upon, which would go against the testimony I venture thus to give. I can only say what I felt and found myself, and perhaps add some weight from the fact that during all those years I held just the views I have expressed here to-day, as to the position of the Church, in regard to divorce.

40,337. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) When you describe the law of the Church as against divorce, I notice you only put it on the prayer book and the canons. Is that the only ground upon which you put it?—The universal law of the Church.

40,338. Let us take it in steps like this. Before the Reformation I suppose it is quite clear that according to the law of the Church marriage was indissoluble?—Yes, and since the Reformation ——

40,339. Let us go by steps. Was any change made by the Reformation about that?—No substantial change.

40,340. Was any change made with regard to that particular point?—I am not disposed to go into any highly technical legal argument when I have the canons of the Church of England as they exist to-day plainly before me, and the marriage service of the Church plainly before me.

40,341. I think you misapprehend the object of my question?—Mr. Wood is a very learned person upon those things and will doubtless answer any questions of the sort.

40,342. I will not ask you any more questions about that, except to ask you what it is in the Canons of 1604 which in your view negatives divorce?—The fact that they must live separately, that it is not a divorce a vinculo, and they cannot marry again.

40,343. Has it escaped you that that canon had nothing to do with divorce a vinculo at all, but merely with judicial separation?—I have just said so.

40,344. You will find it is so by the heading. I will not ask you any further questions if you do not wish me to?—It has been accepted that the canon is what I have stated.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Indeed it has not.

40,345. (Sir William Anson.) Have not you read the heading of the canon you hold to be the authority against divorce or the canon itself?—I have read the canon many times.

40,346. Are you aware what its purport is?—Here is a print of it: "In all sentences for divorce, bond to be taken for not marrying during each other's life."

40,347. In all sentences for divorce?—In all sentences pronounced only for divorce and separation not a vinculo but from bed and board.

40,348. That is what you were asked?—I apprehend your question.

40,349. Will you tell me what you mean by the Church in its corporate capacity?—Did I use that expression?

40,350. Yes, I was rather struck by it. What is the Church in its corporate capacity?—With regard to Government? In what connection did I use that? I would like to be reminded of it.

40,351. You said the Church in its corporate capacity had never accepted the Act of 1857?—The Church of England.

40,352. Yes?—The Church never has.

40,353. What is the Church in its corporate capacity. In what way would the Church in its corporate capacity express assent or dissent?—No synod of the Church.

40,354. You again use the words "general Church opinion"?—I mean the general Church opinion held by individual Church people.

40,355. Church opinion has varied in respect of divorce in the course of the last 150 years?—I can only speak within my own lifetime and thank God general Church opinion is very much strengthening just now against divorce.

40,356. General Church opinion is a temporary thing. You are happy to feel during your lifetime that it has taken a form satisfactory to yourself?—Yes, and it will make it exceedingly more difficult for bishops, if they continue to sit in the House of Lords in future, to behave as the bishops did in 1857.

40,357. (Chairman.) I think that exhausts all you have to say, or is there anything else you would like to add?—I have nothing else I wish to add, except that I would like to send you a copy of this report.

40,358. I have had that?—I will send some more copies.

40,359. It is not necessary to print the whole of that?—No.

(Chairman.) We shall have the extracts you have read before us.

Rev. Edmund Gough Wood called and examined.

40,360. (Chairman.) Are you a Bachelor of Divinity?—Yes, of the University of Cambridge.

40,361. You are the vicar of St. Clement's, Cambridge?—Yes.

40,362. You are the proctor in convocation for the diocese of Ely?—Yes.

40,363. Do you attend on behalf of yourself, or on behalf of any body?—I am asked by the council of the English Church Union to attend in the same way as Mr. Hill. I am a member of the council. You will see that I am one of the elected members, and I have been a member of the English Church Union since 1882.

40,364. You have been good enough to prepare a short memorandum on the question of the position of the Church with regard to the indissolubility of marriage?—Yes.

40,365. You have only just sent in your memorandum, and I think I have the only copy there is?—I regret very much that I was not able to send it sooner. I sent it at the first opportunity I possibly could.

40,366. I asked that because I understood from the secretary this is the only copy. It is rather regrettable, because I believe you communicated with us as far back as February last?—No.

40,367. The union did, then?—I never heard of it, then.

40,368. The best way will be for you to read it, so that we can follow it?—I intended it as a sort of précis.

40,369. It only came last night?—Perhaps I might be allowed to make a brief statement.

40,370. I would rather you took it fully?—I want first of all to put before you the grounds upon which those theologians and canonists, who maintain the theory of the indissolubility of marriage, rest their opinion. I do not put it forward as the opinion of the Church. I desire to put it forward before you as the opinion of those theologians who maintain this theory, because I have observed that there are certain misapprehensions with regard to the grounds upon which we who maintain this theory do so. First of all, we do not base our theory ——

40,371. Who is "we"?—Those who maiutain the doctrine of indissolubility.

40,372. That is what you mean?—That is what I maintain. If, for shortness, I say "we," you will understand I mean those theologians who maintain that theory. We do not base it upon any special Christian dogma. We base it upon the fact that we regard marriage as a divine institution instituted in the time of man's innocency.

40,373. What is meant by that?—That it was along with the creation of man that the Creator intended that there should be marriage between man and woman, and that it was a state—I will explain it presently—which should exist between them, and that it was not owing to the choice of man and woman that this condition of marriage arose, but it was of divine origin, not of human origin.

40,374. Where did you get that from?—We take it from the statement of our Lord in the Gospels. "Whom God hath joined together let not man put asunder." We took it from the general idea those words give, and also from His expression, "In the beginning," which, according to Scripture usage, seems to mean the beginning of human society, the beginning of the human race.

40,375. As described in the first and second chapters of Genesis?—Quite so.

40,376. Do you take those chapters as describing actual facts?—Oh, dear no. I take that as being a mode in which the Divine Spirit has enshrined certain Scriptural truths, but I do not take them as being descriptive to us of actual facts as those words relate them. I do not imagine, for instance, that Eve was taken in a literal sense from Adam's side. I do not in the least imagine that. It is a way of expressing deep spiritual truths.

40,377. Can you tell me the date when those chapters were written?—No, I cannot possibly tell you.

40,378. Or by whom?—I cannot possibly tell you, but I do not rest upon the chapters of Genesis. What I rest upon are our Lord's words when he speaks of the condition of marriage being "In the beginning"—it was not so in the beginning—with regard to that particular question of divorce. I also rest upon our Lord's words that "They twain shall be one flesh." I rest upon our Lord's words that "What God hath joined together let not man put asunder." All those point, in our opinion, to the idea of a divine institution, not of the human origin of marriage, but the divine origin of it. It is a question of origin; it is a question of what was the origin of marriage. We do not believe it to be merely owing to some evolutionary process, but to as direct a divine operation as the creation of man solely. That is our belief. That is what we mean by marriage being of a divine origin. Human practice departed from the original institution.

40,379. The first line of this paragraph in your proof is, "Marriage a divine institution instituted in the time of man's innocency." Where do you get that from?—That is simply a quotation from the preface to the marriage service.

40,380. That marriage service was compiled at a later date than the foundation of Christianity?—I quote that as a way of expressing what one means by a divine institution and the time of the divine institution. I do not quote those as being authoritative words, but merely as being familiar words to express the idea. It was at a time before sin had appeared in the world, taking the ordinary Christian view (which I am not here, of course, to argue), of the beginning of sin and the origin of sin. We say marriage was before that. Then sin came into the world and human practice degenerated; for instance, polygamy was introduced. Now that human practice having departed from the original institution, it was part of Christ's work as the Restorer of all things, to restore that which had been departed from, to restore marriage to the higher ideal with which it was originally instituted.

40,381. I am sure you will forgive me for trying to get it quite clear, but I do not understand where you get the original institution from?—I am again going on our Lord's words, "It was not so in the beginning," when discussing the question of divorce. Now there came the Mosaic legislation, but we do not regard the Mosaic legislation with regard to divorce as being of divine authority, again based on our Lord's words. He said Moses gave the permission and proceeds to say, "I say unto you," which seems to draw a distinction between the Mosaic authority and Christ's authority, contrasting the two, and therefore asserting that the authority for divorce among the Jews was of human institution by Moses, not as a divine legislator. Speaking philosophically, the principle of indissolubility is based upon the declaration which our Lord makes, "They twain shall be" or "become one flesh." By "one flesh," following the general line of Biblical psychology, is meant constitution into one moral or spiritual personality, and the principent cause of that oneness is the divine institution, that is to say, the divine origin of marriage. The efficient cause is the divine power operating when two individuals consent to be man and wife. The instrumental cause is the contracting by the parties, and I use the expression of the old civic law, consensus facit matrimonium. From those we draw the conclusion that marriage is not a contract but is a state. The marriage contract effected by the consent of the parties and by that alone, is the means by which the state is entered upon. The efficient cause being divine, it follows that the bond which is thereby created is dissoluble neither by human authority nor by mutual consent, because the bond was not created by the contract but created by divine power, on the theory that marriage is a divine and not a human institution.

40,382. Which constitutes one moral or spiritual personality?—Yes.

40,383. I do not follow why that should be dissolved by death?—Because it is part of the divine institution that the union is for the lifetime of the parties, as declared to us by the revealed word of St. Paul, when he says that the woman is bound by the law of her husband so long as he liveth; therefore not after his death. It is an incident or principle of the divine institution. The vinculum is not the contract, but the divine institution which established the state, and which by means of the contract admitted the parties to it. The Church relies upon Christ's words, "What God hath joined together let not man put asunder." I say the Church relies upon it because those words are used in the marriage service.

40,384. They are not correctly quoted by you, but that is another matter?—The Church doctrine of indissolubility does not arise out of any sacramental theory, as is sometimes supposed. I am anxious to state that, because it has been supposed that the doctrine of indissolubility as taught by most theologians arises out of sacramental theory. That would be in effect an inversion of the sequence of thought. The Church holds marriage to be indissoluble not only in the case of Christians, but of non-Christians also. In the case of the baptized, the sacramental theory lays down that Christ in their case elevated the natural institution into an outward and visible sign, whereby inward spiritual grace should be given to the parties to enable them duly and religiously to fulfil the obligation and duties of the state of matrimony: the consent of the parties expressed per verba de presenti being the matter and form of the sacrament, and the parties themselves being the ministers of the sacrament. The theory holds that the sacramental character is not dependent on the intervention of a priest nor of the use of any service or ecclesiastical ceremony of priestly blessing. The indissolubility is not affected in any way whatever by the sacramental character. Baptized persons contracting in a registrar's office would receive the sacramental grace equally with those contracting in a church and with the Church service.

40,385. That applies equally to Christians and non-Christians?—The indissolubility, not the question of sacrament.

40,386. I have not the evidence before me at the moment, but I understood that the Bishop of Birmingham said that it applied to Christians, but as regards non-Christians he did not regard the marriage as essentially indissoluble. I understand that you differ from that?—I differ from him upon that point. The next point I pass on to is the question of the Scripture proof of indissolubility, upon which I have written a memorandum. I put aside for the moment the St. Matthew account, and we have the following statements by our Lord, from St. Mark x., 2, to the Pharisees who said, Moses for the hardness of your heart permitted to write a bill of divorce. Then He states they are no more twain but one flesh; what therefore God hath joined together let not man put asunder. And then to the Disciples He says, "Whoso-
" ever shall put away his wife and marry another
" committeth adultery against her, and if a woman
" shall put away her husband and be married to " another she committeth adultery." Then in St. Luke xvi., 18, He says, "Everyone that putteth away
" his wife and marrieth another committeth adultery,
" and he that marrieth one that is put away from her " husband committeth adultery." Then in St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, vii. 2 and 3: "The woman
" that hath an husband is bound by law to the husband
" as long as he liveth, so then if while the husband
" liveth she be married to another man she shall be " called an adulteress." These passages, if taken by themselves, would be conclusive as to the Scripture teaching on the point, that is to say, certainly none of those passages allow re-marriage, and they certainly seem to negative re-marriage. We have also the St. Matthew passages, which seem to create a difficulty. Assuming for a moment that the primâ facie view of the matter is that the St. Matthew report of our Lord's words permit of divorce in a certain case not mentioned either by St. Mark, St. Luke, or St. Paul, on what principle of interpretation are we to proceed? Are we to endeavour to interpret St. Matthew so as to harmonise with the other passages, or are we to read St. Matthew's apparent exception into the other passages? It has been suggested by Dr. Sanday that we must regard our Lord's teaching in these other passages as the moral ideal and not as a positive rule. It would follow from that that our Lord made a concession to human infirmity, in fact that He did what Moses did. But the concession theory is entirely inconsistent with the whole line of teaching of our Lord, not only in the Sermon on the Mount but always. Moses gave the law, and the law was hard, too hard for man, as he thought to endure by himself, and Moses could give no help to keep the law, the law was deadly. Moses had therefore to make a concession that, at least in a certain case, the case of adultery, the marriage should be dissoluble. The law came by Moses, but grace by Jesus Christ, hence Christ could put before men the highest ideal, because while He did so He also gave grace to enable men to act in accordance with that ideal. There was no need for Christ to make concessions. They could find no place in the system which is a kingdom of grace and of power. Confessedly He set up the ideal of indissolubility, but He did so that man might not merely admire it but act up to it. While He did so He provided means by which they should be enabled to act up to it. We cannot admit any concession theory as satisfactory. It would be wholly inconsistent with the teaching that our Lord gave and with His plan, and we must therefore interpret St. Matthew in the light of the other passages. Now taking the passage in the Sermon on the Mount first, in St. Matthew v., 31 and 32, we find these words: "I "say unto you that every one that putteth away his "wife saving for the cause of fornication (παρεκτὸς "λόγου πορνειας) making her an adulteress (ποιεῖ "αὐτὴν μοιχασθαι), and whosoever shall marry her when she is put away committeth adultery." Now the wife is either innocent or guilty. If she be innocent of adultery, then by divorcing her the husband "makes her an adulteress," that is, he places her in the position of an adulteress, because, according to the strict interpretation of the Mosaic law, only one guilty of adultery could be put away: but if she is an adulteress then of course the putting her away does not make her one, for she is that already. The clause therefore is equivalent to "setting aside the case of an adulteress." παρεκὸς will undoubtedly bear that interpretation. The next point is to whom does the further clause "and whosoever shall marry her when she is put away committeth adultery" apply, that is, do the words "been put away" apply both to the lawfully and to the unlawfully put away wife? No doubt the word ἀπολελυμένην might mean only the unlawfully put away if this passage stood by itself, but in the light of other passages we must make it include both. If we do so, as we are entitled to do, and as the well known Herman commentator Meyer says, we have a complete agreement: but even if we confined the term to the unlawfully put away wife, while it would be true to say that our Lord only pronounced that if she married again she and her second husband would be adulterous, it also is true to say that our Lord does not pronounce anything in that case about the guilty woman. He says nothing about the innocent party or his re-marriage, nor anything about the guilty party. The scope of the passage is confined entirely to the question of unlawful divorce, and says nothing about putting away an adulterous wife. There is, therefore, nothing inconsistent with the other passages, but while we are entitled to say that, we are of course not entitled to say that this passage forbids re-marriage of the innocent husband, or even the re-marriage of the adulterous wife. On the latter point, considering the passage as an interpretation of the then existing Mosaic law, there was no need to say anything, as the adulterous wife was to be stoned. Let us take now the other St. Matthew passage, St. Matthew, xix. 9. The Pharisees come to Christ and put to Him the question, was it lawful to put away a wife for every cause? I need hardly remind the Commission of the well-known fact that there were at that time two schools among the Jews, the school of Hillel, which holds divorce might be for any cause whatever, even, as one Jewish writer says, if the wife burned the soup, or, as the Rabbi Akiba says, if he saw another woman whom he thought was better-looking than his own wife, There was also the strict school of Shammai, who maintained that the Mosaic legislation only permitted divorce in the case of adultery. The Pharisees apparently come to ask the Lord His opinion as between those two schools, and our Lord first of all replies to that; "What therefore God hath joined together let not man put asunder," that is to say, He asserts in the plainest language the indissolubility of marriage, and then he proceeds to say, "Whosoever shall put away his wife except for fornication," and here St. Matthew's report, according to the received text, uses a different expression, εἰμὴ ἐπί πορνείας, "and shall marry another committeth adultery, and "he that marrieth her when she is put away com-"mitteth adultery." I use the translation of the Revised Version. Before examining this statement it is important to remember that the text is in an exceedingly doubtful condition. From the point of textual criticism it is quite impossible to settle satisfactorily what the true reading is. There are so many variants and so many combinations of those variants. In fact, the condition of the text is such as to warrant our saying that no argument can be securely based upon it. Indeed, so far back as the fourth century, we find St. Gregory Naziangen, in his 37th oration, speaking of the obscurity of the passage. These variants add very greatly to the difficulty of interpretation, but they also suggest endeavours to gloss the text in an unwarrantable way. From the point of view of higher criticism the passage is one of doubtful authority. Professor Driver, as well as others, says on this passage, "It is open to question whether this exception"—that is, in St. Matthew v.—"is not an "addition by an editor representing, no doubt, two "influences, Jewish custom and ethical necessity in "the early Christian Church. A similar exception is made in xix. 9, and it will be seen that the clause is clearly an interpolation.

40,387. What are you reading from there?—From the International Critical Commentary, edited by Professor Driver. "The teaching of Christ seems to "be that recorded by St Mark, St. Luke, and St. Paul. "The interpolated clause confuses the issue." Bleek, Keim, and others, denied the genuineness of the clause, on the ground that Christ's original unqualified statement was felt to be a stumbling block, and that the exception crept into the traditional report. "There is grave reason," says Plummer, in his edition of St. Matthew, "for doubting whether Christ, either in "the Sermon on the Mount or elsewhere, ever thought "that divorce is allowable when the wife has committed "adultery. There was an earlier marriage law of "divine authority, according to which the marriage tie "was indissoluble. To this divine law men ought to "return." Then I might quote Dr. Salmon, the late Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, to the same effect. The importance of these statements is, that they come from thinkers not specially predisposed to take what I may call the ecclesiastical line, but if we take a more conservative line, it is quite possible to interpret, as we are bound to do if we can, this passage in agreement with the other passages. One important question is, how did the disciples understand it? The Pharisees had propounded the question, "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?" clearly the question between the two schools of Hillel and Shammai. The latter taught that it was lawful to divorce for adultery, and for that only. Was that what Christ taught? The disciples do not appear to have thought so; they clearly thought our Lord's saying a hard one, something beyond what they had heard before. If the case be so with the man and his wife, it is not good to marry. It is difficult to think that they could have spoken as they did about a mere re-stating of the familiar dictum of the school of Shammai. But if Christ's teaching was something stricter than that of Shammai, it could only have been so because it was an enunciation of the doctrine of the indissolubility of marriage, and therefore of the unlawfulness of divorce a vinculo even in the case of adultery. It seems clear, therefore, that the disciples so understood Christ's words. That seems to point to the conclusion that the exception is an interpolation. But taking this statement as presented in the Revised Version, is it possible to interpret it consistently with St. Mark? Probably the most reasonable suggestion is that of Bellarmini, namely, that the clause, "except for fornication," is simply negatived and not exceptive, that is to say, that Christ meant that He was not discussing the question of the wife having committed adultery, but only divorce in other cases. If that be so, and it is a possible interpretation, then there is no inconsistency between this statement and the others. I allow that another interpretation could be put upon it, but my point is, if possible one ought to interpret the St. Matthew passages in harmony with the other passages, and that this is a possible interpretation, and, therefore, as it is in agreement with the other passages, it is the interpretation which we ought to accept. The conclusion seems to be that the teaching of the New Testament is that, without any exception, marriage is indissoluble, and therefore divorce a vinculo impossible, and re-marriage of divorced persons is adultery. Now the next point, if I may be allowed to refer to it, is very briefly to sketch the historical position with regard to the question of indissolubility and divorce. There is, of course, undoubtedly a divergence between the Eastern Church and the Western Church.

40,387*a*. You are now going back to the copy I have?—No; I have to give you another copy directly. I now treat the historical aspect of the matter. First, taking the period up to the conversion of Constantine, which we put in 314, we may give this summary of it. So far as we can gather from Christian writers and councils up to the conversion of Constantine, we may say this: First, the wife may be put away for adultery but cannot marry again, nor can the husband do so in the lifetime of both parties. Secondly, the wife similarly may divorce the husband under similar conditions, that is to say, there was the equality between the sexes. Thirdly, that the Church did everything she could to encourage penitence on the part of evil-doers and so bring them together again. Fourthly, that there is no instance of any writer during the period referring to St. Matthew xix. as sanctioning re-marriage after divorce. Origen refers to that St. Matthew passage and discusses it, but not from the point of view of it being a sanction for re-marriage after divorce. What I might in a rough way call the voice of the first three centuries may be said, so far as silence can be allowed to speak, to be unanimous against divorce and re-marriage, yet on the whole the Roman Civil Law was encouraging laxity in some cases referred to by Origen, who is strong for indissolubility, and there seems to have been on the part of some bishops a certain weak tolerance. Then, according to the Apostolic Canons, 47—I am not discussing what the date of them may be, it is usually taken that they were pre-Nicene—say, "If any layman having put "away his wife shall take another, or if anyone take "a woman divorced by another man, let he be excom- "municated"—no exception whatever. According to the Council of Elvira (Granada) 305, Canon 9 amongst other Canons forbids re-marriage of innocent party under penalty of excommunication only to be relaxed in articulo mortis, so that both from silence and those positive enactments it seems fair to say that the first three centuries knew nothing authoritatively of re-marriage. Taking the period from Constantine to Justinian, 314 to 527, we may summarise the evidence of the period thus: in the West all re-marriage after divorce was excluded; St. Matthew xix. is not cited by any writer to support re-marriage; the Councils of Arles, the well-known so-called African Code, St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, disallow re-marriage and maintain indissolubility. On the other hand, at the beginning of the period Lactantius, apparently under the influence of Constantine and a writer called Ambrosinister, admit the re-marriage of the innocent husband but do not admit the re-marriage of the innocent wife; fourthly, the Churches of the East, under pressure of civil legislation, began to waver; fifthly, St. Basil bears witness to the pressure which the Roman law and the customs of Eastern society were causing, hence the difficulty of inflicting discipline, and he shows himself weak on this point, that is the point of inflicting discipline, while quite clearly teaching that marriage is indissoluble and disallows re-marriage, It must be remembered that the Roman law on divorce was becoming more and more lax; divorce by mutual consent was allowed, and the grounds of divorce widely extended. The Church in the East was endeavouring to check these extravagances, and so keen was the struggle over these points that the maintenance of discipline with regard to others became relaxed. Now I would like to say a few words with regard to the West after Justinian. In the West, as the Frankish and German people became converted, there naturally came to be a conflict similar to that which existed in the East. In the British Isles much corruption prevailed amongst the Celts. Hence here and there we find laxity, but it was only sporadic. The Church was stronger than in the East and held her own, and Council after Council refused to allow re-marriage. We may note in regard to one Council, the Council of Aachens in 862, which to the great scandal of many Christians permitted Lothair to re-marry, the firm conduct of Pope Nicholas the First, who did not hesitate to excommunicate all who took part in that Council. The age of the Canonists, which we may date from the 9th century, marked the final triumphs of the doctrine of indissolubility in the West. Now, just for a moment to discuss the question of the practical divergence between the East and the West, I think we are entitled to say this, that the difference between the Eastern and the Western Church on the subject of re-marriage and indissolubility has been (really it is re-marriage) a question of practice rather than a question of doctrine or of law. So far as law is concerned, the Eastern Canon Law is quite clear with regard to the forbidding of divorce and the forbidding of re-marriage. The great Code of the Eastern Church is that which was constituted by the Canons of the East, called the Canons of Trullo, in 691, which adopted into the Code first of all the so-called African Code, the Apostolic Canons, the Canons of St. Basil, the African Code, the Canons of Milevium in 416. All those elements in the great Code of the Eastern Church distinctly and explicitly maintain indissolubility and forbid re-marriage, and that is the law of the Eastern Church at the present time, so that she is conservative in those matters; she has not altered the law; the law of the Eastern Church is in agreement with the law of the Western Church. Further, it is a notable fact that in the criticisms and accusations which Eastern theologians have levelled at the Western Church with regard to many of her practices and her theological decisions, there never has been anything said by any Eastern theologian by way of criticism of the Western Church on indissolubility and of the forbidding of re-marriage. Notably at neither the Council of Lyons in 1274 nor at that of Florence in 1432 was any difficulty raised upon this point. On the other hand, Michael Paleologus in 1274, in his letter to Gregory 10th, expresses his acceptance of the Western theory of indissolubility, so that we come to this, that while there is unquestionably grave difference of practice between the East and the West, yet the Eastern practice was going away from her own law and her own theory under the pressure of Byzantine corruption and legislation of the Eastern emperors which the Church in the East was not strong enough to resist, as the Church in the West, freed from the incubus of the Roman Empire, showed herself to be. The conclusion I venture to offer to the Commission is that certainly up to the period of the Reformation the law of the Church, both East and West, putting aside the question of practice, was that marriage was indissoluble, and that re-marriage was not to be allowed. With regard to the position of the Church of England, in the first place when we speak of the "Church of England" of course we only mean the two provinces of the Catholic Church which go by the name of York and Canterbury, that is to say, the Bishops, the clergy and laity of the one Holy Catholic Church of Christ, that which the preface to the Prayer Book calls the Whole Catholic Church of Christ, that part of it, those individuals who are domiciled in England. By the "Church of England" one does not mean any religious body, but simply a part of the one whole Catholic Church. Unless it can be shown that the Provincial Synods of England have made any alteration in the laws existing at the period when rightfully the incubus of papal supremacy was rejected in England, unless it can be shown that the Provincial Synods have made any law different from or inconsistent with that existing, then we must hold, as it has been held, I do not speak with regard to this particular subject, but with regard to other subjects, that the existing Canon Law still survives and still is to be appealed to. Undoubtedly an attempt was made, as everyone knows, at the period of the Reformation, to alter the law of the Church on this point. I will not discuss now whether a Provincial Synod could alter the law of the Church, assuming it to be as I have endeavoured to show it is, but as a matter of fact an attempt was made as shown by the reformatio legum to alter the law of the Church, although as a matter of fact the law of the Church was not altered. I do not rely particularly upon the Canons of 1603. I simply look upon them as being in harmony with what appears to me to be historically the law and custom of the Churches throughout the West and throughout the East, and I am as yet uninformed as to any way in which the Church of England, meaning by the "Church of England" the two Synods, has altered the law. Therefore I venture to say that the law of the Church of England, using the term in the sense I have used it, is that marriage is indissoluble and that the re-marriage of the divorced person is not to be allowed. One does not rely, of course, upon the marriage service as being law, because rubrics do not bind, nor does the service book ex proprio vigore, but are declaratory or explanatory of the existing law which underlies it. So far as it goes, the service book of the Church of England in the marriage service bears witness to the fact that those who drafted that service did believe that marriage was indissoluble. Now I venture to say this, that as an Established Church the Church of England has a right to claim the support of the State in respect of her laws as affecting her own members. That is the only—I speak here in agreement with the late Professor Freeman, who wrote on the subject—meaning to my own mind. The word "Establishment" is that the State supports by the civil power the law and custom of the Church, and therefore on this ground, the ground of Establishment, we, and when I say "we" I mean the English Church Union, base our demand for the repeal of the Divorce Act of 1857, and we do so as a matter of right. We conceive that the Established Church has a right to look to the State not only to legislate in opposition to her law and custom, but, so far as her own members are concerned, to support her law and custom. We regard the Divorce Act of 1857 as being in effect, and quite truly—I am not speaking rhetorically but purely argumentatively—a measure of disestablishment. Even if the law of England should continue to allow divorce and re-marriage, I further say that it is inconsistent with the principle of establishment that the clergy of the Church should not be restrained by the civil power from solemnizing such marriages, or that such marriages should be solemnised in church, or that persons choosing to contract such marriages should be held to be legally entitled to the rites and sacraments of the Church. On those grounds we ask for the repeal, either the total repeal of the Divorce Act or for such amendment of it as will make it impossible for re-marriages of divorced persons to be celebrated in Church.

40,388. Do you think that is within the range of practical politics?—I do think so. It has come within my personal knowledge in going about and talking with lay people. I could give an instance of persons I meet every day who are not members of the Church, Nonconformists and Liberals, who entirely agree with me as to the importance of maintaining the indissolubility of marriage and the desirability of the repeal of the Divorce Act. I believe myself, of course, each individual can only speak of his own experience, but I believe there is a rising in public opinion for the repeal of the Divorce Act.

40,389. The next point in your paper I have is with regard to separation orders?—Yes.

40,390. We have had that very fully discussed already?—It is desirable that that law as to separation orders should be reformed. It is desirable that it should be made more difficult to obtain such orders. They should no longer be granted by magistrates. Jurisdiction should be given to the county courts to grant them. In extreme cases where danger to the wife may be apprehended, a temporary protection order to be granted by a magistrate pending proceedings in the county court. No separation order should be for more than six months when fresh application may be made. Provision to be made for endeavour to reconcile the parties under the authority of the court. Proceedings for separation orders to be instituted by either party.

40,391. Then paragraph 3 is really an objection to the facilities of divorce on the grounds you have already given. Obviously no consent can be given to such extension by those who object to divorce. Alleged inequality of treatment of rich and poor best met by abolishing divorce?—Will you kindly note in that that the argument with regard to the inequality of treatment of rich and poor is best met by abolishing divorce altogether.

40,392. That is expressed there?—Yes.

40,393. Then paragraph 4 says, "The objection as "to separation orders giving rise to immorality and "therefore facilities should be given for divorce. "This would be in the view of those who object "to divorce the substitution of one immorality for "another." Then paragraph 5: "So long as divorce is "legally permitted no case should be adjudicated on "which is undefended; provision should be made for "intervention of King's Proctor in all such cases"?—Might I say with regard to the King's Proctor that is important from my own experience. In a recent case I myself reported to the King's Proctor what occurred in my own parish.

40,439. There is power to intervene in all cases now?—I desire to see that there should be a counsel officially assigned to defend every case.

40,395. Your next paragraph is with regard to civil marriage?—Yes. The proposal to make civil marriage, that is the contracting without religious ceremony, compulsory in all cases would not be a remedy for present difficulties. Attitude of the Church towards clandestine marriage. Only an impedimentum impediens, except where the Decree Tametsi of the Council of Trent is in force. Recognition of a contract, however entered into, if it can be proved, though penalties, even to the bastardising of the children, should be enforced. Objections to Tametsi and to Lord Hardwicke Act. But the Church requires her members to contract in facie ecclesiæ. This would create a certain conflict were a civil ceremony compulsory. Grave objections to reiterating the contracting. The State as well as the Church has the most profound interest in ascertaining that the contract has been properly entered into and that the evidence is duly preserved. It is possible so to arrange that the necessary requirements both of the Church and other religious bodies on the one hand, and of the State on the other, may be duly satisfied without any conflict. Recent legislation in the Bahamas has shown this. Description of the provisions of the Act of the Legislature for securing all that the State requires without interference with the religious contracting, or, with the rules as to impediments, &c., which any religious body may make for its own members. Desirability of some such legislation to supersede the present Marriage Acts, and for securing uniformity throughout the United Kingdom. With regard to the recent legislation in the Bahamas, may I say what it was. I applied to the Crown Agents for the Colonies to supply a copy of the Act, and if you would like it I will send it in.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I think we have it.

40,396. (Chairman.) Will you make your point on it, because it is mentioned here. You say, "Recent legislation in the Bahamas has shown this." Will you add what you want to say about the Bahamas?—The legislation of the Bahamas was this. It is about three years ago. First of all the State recognises no marriage which has not been contracted in the presence of a marriage officer appointed by the State, and any minister of religion of any permanent congregation is qualified to be a marriage officer. He applies to be appointed and is appointed by the governor. If the governor refuses to appoint him he has an appeal to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. In addition to those ministers of religion, justices of the peace are appointed, and other persons. Every marriage must be contracted in the presence of a marriage officer. The ceremony of marriage may be whatever the marriage officer likes, provided that it contains certain words of contract which are practically identical with those words in the Book of Common Prayer. The marriage has to be registered by the marriage officer in triplicate. As to preliminaries of marriage, very great care is bestowed as to the publication of banns, which have to be published in certain words, and a considerable amount of information has to be obtained. The parties giving that information are liable to prosecution for perjury if they give wrong information before the banns are published. Very strict regulations are made with regard to residence. Then there is a clause in the Act that every religious body can make such regulations as they choose with regard to impediments to marriage, and may refuse to celebrate the marriage unless the parties conform to such regulations, so that in the case of marriage officers who are ministers of religion, no party who does not conform to the regulations of the particular sect to which that nomination or to which that marriage officer belongs, would have the right to be married by him. He would have a right if he does conform. Those provisions make the preliminaries uniform, and that all brings in the authority of the State in a proper manner, and provides that the contract shall be uniform and the registration uniform, and in that way supplies the State with all that the State has a right to demand, namely, that the marriage shall be properly contracted and that the evidence shall be preserved.

40,397. Your last point is really an indication of what preliminaries to marriage you think should be provided for?—Yes. There I desire to say one word. What I put as the preliminaries to marriage are not theoretical: it is based on practical experience.

40,398. Does it not sufficiently summarise your recommendation?—I think it does. Publications of banns and issue of licences. Unsatisfactory and insufficient character of present practice. Requisite publicity is not secured; the law continually violated. Suggestions for an improved system. Powers to be given to marriage officer to require particular information from the parties with the view of ascertaining that no impediment exist Declaration under oath to be required. No fees to be allowed for preliminaries. Publication of banns to be in public places as well as in church, or registrar's office. Residence to be required before publication of banns. Arrangements for facilitating the solemnization in any place desired by the parties. Uniformity of marriage fee.

40,399. The last but one, No. 8, is "Desirability "of enacting that children born out of wedlock should "be legitimated per subsequens matrimonium"?—I am very strong about it, and I want to bring the law in England in accordance with the old law of Scotland in regard to that, and, I may say, in conformity with the law of almost every civilised country.

40,400. Will you explain No. 9, "Recognition in "accordance with the authentic form of the table of "prohibited degrees, that affinity as well as consan-"guinity arises ex copula illicita"?—I may say the table of prohibited degrees, as usually printed, omits the notes which were made at the bottom of it, which Parker originally made. One of these things was, it is to be noted, that consanguinity or affinity hindering marriage arises out of the unlawful intercourse of man and woman as well as the lawful intercourse. That was in accordance with the old Canon Law that affinity arose ex copula illicita. There is a doubt at the present time. I may refer to two cases of recent years: one is the case of Wing v. Taylor, in the Court of Matrimonial Causes, in 1861, in which Sir Cresswell Cresswell decided that affinity arising out of unlawful union was not a cause for the pronouncing of a decree of nullity. The case was that of a man who had married a woman with whom his father had had intercourse, and it was held that that was not a case for nullity. It may not be a case for nullity, because one knows how easy it would be to assert such a thing, but it was held by the old law of England as an impediment to marriage, and I would desire to see that restored, in order to bring it on a level with the law of England existing at the present time. Consanguinity does arise out of illicit intercourse. That was held at the same time in the case of The Queen v. The Inhabitants of Brighton, before Sir Alexander Cockburn. It seems to me desirable it should be made clear on what we must call the honestus publica, as the Canonist would say, that in such abominable cases a man should not be allowed to marry, in the interest of public decency.

40,401. That concludes your paper. Is there anything else that occurs to you to add?—Nothing else, my Lord.

40,402. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) It is extremely important we should get your view as to what it is in the law of the Church of England which prevents marriage. I have listened very carefully to your evidence, and I gather you take the view which I was endeavouring to put to Mr. Hill, but he was not anxious to be questioned, that the law of the Church of England really rests not upon the Canons of 1603, but upon the fact that the Canon Law at any rate prevailing in the Western Church, including England, up to the time of the Reformation was decisive against it, that no change was made at or after the Reformation in the law of the Church, and that therefore it remains to this day as it was before the Reformation. That is really the argument?—That is really my argument.

40,403. Both of you represent a very important body, the English Church Union, but on this point your evidence is inconsistent. May I ask who does represent the English Church Union on this point, you or Mr. Hill?—I do not think Mr. Hill was inconsistent with me, but he did not quite express himself.

40,404. May I take it it is you?—I think Mr. Hill would say I have expressed the opinion of the English Church Union. I think he will allow me to say so.

40,405. You put clearly to us at the beginning of your evidence this view. You said we regard marriage as a divine institution, whether Christian marriage or non-Christian marriage, and you regard both marriages exactly the same?—Yes.

40,406. You would not wish the Commission to come to the conclusion that although that is your view, that is the uncontradicted view of the Church, or different branches?—I speak in that way speaking as a student of the Canon Law. As far as I am able to say, that seems to be the view of the Canons.

40,407. You would not say it was the view of all the Canonists?—Except with regard to what one may call the Pauline dispensation.

40,408. I am thinking of that?—I think that is a very difficult point.

40,409. I am not arguing it with you, but I want to get the matter right. The Roman Church would not agree there was no difference between Christian marriage and non-Christian marriage?—They would, only they would regard it as a dispensation.

40,410. They would hold the Pauline privilege applied to a non-Christian marriage but not to a Christian marriage?—The very thing, the Pauline privilege, is a privilege to override the law. Privilege is something which overrides the law. I did not want to overweight what I was saying, but I would have regard to that, and that is the way every Canonist would explain it, that it was a privilege overriding the law.

40,411. I do not want to argue it. I want to get the fact clear. You know Mr. Watkins' book on marriage, with which you agree in many ways?—Yes.

40,412. I am reading from page 589. His view is that marriages contracted outside Christianity are not essentially indissoluble?—I do not agree with that.

40,413. There are two views even among the school you represent?—Yes.

40,414. Yours is that all marriages, Christian and non-Christian, are alike indissoluble?—Only that there is a sort of dispensation, that St. Paul gave a dispensation in the case of converts.

40,415. They are equally indissoluble essentially?—Yes.

40,416. On the other hand, the received Roman view is that the question of indissolubility only affects the Christian marriage?—I do not think so.

40,417. That is Mr. Watkins's view?—Yes, but I do not think Mr. Watkins is right. As regards the opinion of Roman Catholics ——

40,418. I think Mr. Watkins has rightly interpreted the Roman view, but I leave it there. Would it not meet your view as to the remedy of the ceremony, the civil marriage, if the Nonconformist Marriage Act of 1898 were made universal? As you describe the practice of the Bahamas it seemed to me extremely like the machinery of the Nonconformist Marriage Act of 1898?—It is very much like that, but I should like to sweep away all Marriage Acts and have a consolidating Act.

40,419. That is a detail. You would like to establish machinery so that the State might make the clergyman of a particular church, or the minister of a particular nomination, its marriage officer?—Quite so.

40,420. And let him, subject to pronouncing certain words of the marriage oath, celebrate the marriage with any marriage service suitable to his own denomination?—I would take away from the clergy of the Church of England their official right to celebrate marriages, and in future make their right from the State point of view to celebrate marriages depend upon their attitude as marriage officers.

40,421. That is your proposal?—Yes.

40,422. In proposing that are you representing the views of the English Church Union?—No.

40,423. Those are your own personal views?—Yes.

40,424. With regard to the legitimation of children born prior to marriage, you bear in mind the old objection to changing the laws of England?—I know.

40,425. Although you have not told us so, are you not a little influenced by your love for canon law?—I am.

40,426. You said it was in accordance with the law of other States, but is not what is in your mind the Canon Law?—Quite so, but I regard canon law as good law.

40,427. I follow that is your view, but that is the influence at the back of your mind?—But I am also influenced by social considerations and general considerations of public weal. I am not putting it forward because it is canon law.

40,428. (Chairman.) Your view is that marriage is indissoluble according to Christian principles?—Yes.

40,429. In that you differ from the present law, although that was supported by certain dignitaries of the Church?—Quite so.

40,430. You also differ from those who have been called before us who maintain that it is desirable on grounds in addition to adultery, and they are also members of the English Church?—Yes.

40,431. So that we have three views of the English Church at present placed before us?—Yes. I agree nothing can be said to be truly the view of the English Church except as voiced by her Convocations.

40,432. Do you think there is any certainty about it at all, after that minute examination you have made, pointing out the extreme difficulty of making out what the experts really say?—I do not think there is a difficulty. I think that the teaching of the New Testament is perfectly clear as to indissolubility, and the only difficulty is this.

40,433. How do you account for the dispute through the centuries which has resulted in 1910 in three different views being held by the English Church, if it is so perfectly clear?—I believe that entirely arose out of the Byzantine corruption, and it was ex post facto.

40,434. Cannot we leave the Byzantine corruption out of the question now? I ask you, to-day?—Because it is a tradition.

40,435. Why is it not equally so that your view is a tradition and you have tied yourself down by the writings of people who are dead and buried centuries ago?—Because notwithstanding the difficulty which some writers have found with regard to interpretation of St. Matthew, the practice of the Western Church came to be inconsistent with the notion that our Lord had made an exception.

40,436. Are you not relying on the practice of ages when there was a great deal of ignorance and superstition in the world which does not exist to-day?—I think there is more superstition to-day than there ever was, and more ignorance.

40,437. Does that represent your serious view?—Quite so.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much for your evidence.

Mr. Henry Willliam Hill recalled.

40,438. (Chairman.) I think you wish to say something?—Yes. If the matter had been put to me as it was to Mr. Wood, by a statement of what he thought was the truth, I should have assented at once, but Sir Lewis Dibdin is a lawyer and I am only a layman, and he began to ask questions as to what happened at the time of the Reformation, and in Mr. Wood's presence, who is known to be a very learned Canonist and an expert on all these questions, I did not care to enter into what I knew he was going to deal with There is, however, no difference of opinion between Mr. Wood and myself as to the operation of the pre-Reformation canon law.

40,439. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) If Mr. Hill desires to apologise for the way in which he received my questions I accept it, otherwise I refuse to ask any questions at all?—If Sir Lewis Dibdin thinks I did not receive his questions as I ought to have done, of course, I apologise. I should be extremely sorry if he thought that.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I accept the apology.

40,440. (Chairman.) Do you wish to indicate to us there is no substantial difference of view between you and Mr. Wood on that point?—Yes.

40,441. (Sir William Anson.) Although I understood from you that the Church law, with regard to marriage, was to be found in the Prayer Book and the Canons?—The substance of it, certainly.

40,442. I understand from Mr. Wood, and it seems to me a reasonable view, that it was the law of the Church unchanged at the time of the Reformation?—Just so.

40,443. And unaffected by the Prayer Book and Canons?—Yes.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) That was the view which I desired to put to Mr. Hill, but which he refused to allow me to put.

40,444. (Chairman.) May I take it that you have now said what you want to say?—Quite.

(Chairman.) All I care about is, that we should have everything said people wish to say.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FORTY-NINTH DAY.

Tuesday, 6th December 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
Sir WILLIAM R. ANSON, Bart., M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
His Honour JUDGE TINDAL ATKINSON.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.
The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).

Mr. BASIL HOME THOMSON called and examined.

40,445. (Chairman.) You are secretary to the Prison Commission?—Yes, my Lord.

40,446. And late governor of Dartmoor Convict Prison?—Yes.

40,447. Are you now at the Home Office?—Yes.

40,448. What is your office there?—Secretary to the Prison Commission.

40,449. What does the Prison Commission do?—It has control of both convict and local prisons.

40,450. Does it inquire into anything that requires looking after?—Yes.

40,451. Under the direction of the Home Secretary?—Yes. I am also an inspector of prisons, and sometimes hold inquiries on behalf of the Prison Commission.

40,452. You have had long experience with long-sentence convicts?—Yes, my Lord; chiefly with the recidivist.

40,453. What do I understand on that?—Prisoners convicted of grave or persistent crime. As a rule, in practice, recidivists are men who have undergone several terms of imprisonment and are over the age of 24.

40,454. That is at Dartmoor?—That is at Dartmoor.

40,455. Where your experience was?—Yes, and at Wormwood Scrubs too; because they come to Wormwood Scrubs on conviction.

40,456. You say in your proof, with regard to convicts who belong to the habitual criminal class: "Comparatively few of these men are lawfully married to the women with whom they live"?—Yes.

40,457. "Though they refer to them as their wives"?—They regard them as their wives, but are not married.

40,458. And you say, "Many of these women correspond regularly with their men throughout a long sentence, especially when they have borne them children."—That is so.

40,459. Have you found that they take up with other men?—They do, but they very often go back to these men again afterwards unless they have entirely disappeared. They will carry on a temporary connection with another man while the husband is in prison, and then go back to him after, sometimes with his knowledge.

40,460. "When they take up with other men, as they often do, they will return to their reputed husbands if, as often happens, the husbands are willing to have them."—That is so.

40,461. How often have you met with that?—Well, it is difficult to give figures, but I should say one is always coming across cases in the convict prisons of that sort; a man comes and complains that his wife has gone wrong.

40,462. Can you give us roughly what is the total of long-sentence prisoners; I would say seven years and over?—I can give you the figures for five years and over.

40,463. They do not keep them at seven years separate?—Yes, we could have got it, but I did not actually ask for it.

40,464. Would you give it us at five?—At five there is a total of convicts now undergoing penal servitude, or rather undergoing penal servitude on the 6th of August last, 3,200. Out of these, 1,694—that is about half—were serving five years and over.

40,465. The other half is not so long?—The other half are three and four years' sentences.

40,466. Is there anything at all to show what the number of those at five years and over is who are married?—Six hundred and thirty-six are reputed to be married, that is to say, they said they were married on reception.

40,467. That is quite a different thing from fact?—That is quite a different thing from fact.

40,468. Are those all at Dartmoor or scattered about?—They are scattered about in five convict prisons.

40,469. Do you find that of those who are in prison there is much anxiety as to whether the wife, or supposed wife, will be true when they come out?—Very great.

40,470. There is?—Yes.

40,471. And you say here, "Sometimes I believe she does so, particularly when she has reached middle age." I suppose that means she remains true. Have you got your memorandum?—I have a copy, my Lord.

40,472. Perhaps you would read that and explain what you mean?—"In those cases where marriage has taken place, the man suffers much anxiety as to whether his wife will remain true to him. Sometimes I believe she does so"—I mean sometimes she remains true—"particularly when she has reached middle age, and in such cases she would not apply for a divorce even if the law gave her the right to do so. In most cases, however, she goes to live with another man, either writing a farewell to her husband or concealing the fact from him and neglecting to answer his letters." I should like to qualify that by saying that that is the recidivist class I am dealing with, not the star class. I should like to except the star class.

40,473. What are the star class?—First offenders, of previous good character.

40,474. They are not so long?—Yes, they may be as long, but they are men specially classified by the Prison Commissioners on reception, after inquiries of anyone that has known them; and they include bankers and solicitors and doctors and all kinds of professions; and, as a rule, they are much better educated than the recidivist or habitual class.

40,475. And this refers to the recidivist class?—Yes, only to the recidivist class. "Both cases are common in a convict prison, and in such cases she might or might not apply for a divorce. Generally she would not, as in the criminal classes people do not trouble themselves about the ceremony, and are not thought less of because they may not have gone through it." That again is the recidivist class.

40,476. Do you think that divorce cases might be brought by those who you say would live with another man if they had the possibility of doing it?—I do not think they would take the trouble. They would not pay the fees.

40,777. To get free?—No.

40,478. It would depend on the individual or their circumstances?—Yes, but people of that class simply go and live with another man.

40,479. Then you give an instance on the next page, if you will pass on to that?—"I remember one instance in 1899 where a husband undergoing five years' penal servitude heard from an incoming convict that his wife had had a child by another man. He was then only 21 and his wife 18, though they had been married two years. In his distress he wrote her a threatening letter which on my advice he withdrew, and he then wrote her a letter quite properly worded, promising to take her back if she would leave the man. To this she replied admitting her lapse, but explaining that the father of her child was a casual acquaintance whose name she did not even know and whom she had never seen since, and that the child was a boy of whom she was sure her husband would be very proud, as it was the image of him (!), and she would bring it with her when she came to visit him on the next August Bank Holiday. After some demur the father consented to this arrangement; the Church Army consented to interest themselves in the young woman, and I believe the couple were re-united. This was doubtless an exceptional case, and I relate it only to show how lightly persons in this class may treat adultery on the part of a wife. Personally I do not think that there is any demand for divorce on the ground of prolonged imprisonment for the following reasons:—(1) The wife who is attached to her husband would not apply for it. (2) The woman who might apply for it would go away and live with a man without going to the expense of a divorce. There are moreover strong reasons against it: — (1) A judge in sentencing a prisoner to a long term would in one case be awarding a terrible addition to his sentence (i.e., where a man was attached to his wife), in another would be imposing the bare sentence of imprisonment (i.e., where the man was unmarried or cared nothing for his wife), and the judge would have no evidence enabling him to judge between the two. (2) A prisoner sentenced to a long term often has the term shortened by the Home Secretary. In such a case the wife might have secured a divorce to which, on the shortened term, she was not entitled."

40,480. Then you have made an additional note?—"On 6th August, a circular was addressed to 27 persons who have had experience of convict prisons, including the governors, chaplains and medical officers of all the convict prisons, inviting their views, supported if possible with actual instances 'showing the hard-'ship or the advantage of maintaining the marriage 'relation when the husband or wife is undergoing 'a long term of penal detention.' Of these 27, 3 gave no opinion; 7 were in favour of a long sentence being a ground for divorce, and 17 were against it."

40,481. Now can you give a summary of, first, those in favour of a long sentence being a ground; and then, secondly, the reasons of the 17 that were against it. Can you summarise it? I believe you have a memorandum which Captain Wilmot sent which summarises it. If you have not got it, it does not matter?—No, I have not got it, my Lord. Out of the 17 against it, I think all the chaplains were against it on religious grounds.

40,482. That is what I want. Can you tell me how many of the 17 were chaplains?—I think nine, my Lord. By going into the other room I could get the actual figures.

40,483. Perhaps you had better?—(After a short pause). Eight were chaplains, my Lord.

40,484. Do they base their views on religious grounds?—Yes, nearly all of them.

40,485. I do not want very long details, but you have been good enough to send us from the Home Office the names of some gentlemen representatives; you were asked for that?—Yes, that is so.

40,486. The witnesses that are coming have all had their names supplied to us by the Home Office as representing opinions?—Yes, that is so.

40,487. Can you summarise for us what are the reasons on which those who were in favour of long sentences being a ground for divorce put it, and what the reasons are, given roughly, by those against it?—Well, my Lord, I take first of all those who were for divorce. Some were in favour of it, not on the ground of length of imprisonment but on the ground of the nature of the crime.

40,488. Can you indicate a little more?—Well, unnatural crimes; crimes against nature; crimes of indecency; and even crimes of violence one or two were in favour of. I think one or two favoured divorce on the general ground that there might be cases of hardship in long sentences, and that a woman, though she might not use the power, ought to have the power if she wanted it.

40,489. Did any of them base it on the ground that there are cases of criminals who are in and out of prison repeatedly?—Yes, that was mentioned, but it was more on the personal ground that a man that did that was a very bad husband.

40,490. Then on the other hand?—Well, against the grounds I have already given, that of uncertainty in the mind of the judge in sentencing; and also the question of shortening the time by the order of the Home Secretary, and also a very strong ground with a great many of them was the great hardship on the man himself, especially on the star class. There is often a very great affection between the husband and wife, which comes very much to the front after a long sentence, and it was felt that it would be a very cruel addition to the sentence if a man were uncertain whether his wife would avail herself of divorce or not.

40,491. That seems more from the point of view of the criminal?—That is the case in the answers, that it was rather the criminal who appealed to the prison official than the relations outside.

40,492. What view has been taken about the position of the children?—Curiously enough, the position of the children is quoted by both sides.

40,403. Each in support of their own view?—Yes.

40,494. Now, you have mentioned yourself how the tendency seems to be for these women associating with these men to go off and live with somebody else while the man is in prison?—Yes, I have, my Lord.

40,495. Was that a matter that enabled either side to present any view?—No, I do not think so, and I think my experience is more limited than some of the others, in the sense that I was only dealing with the recidivist class, and they were dealing with the star class as well.

40,496. Have you anything else to add that may help us?—I think not, my Lord.

40,497. (Mr. Brierley.) You have given us the number of prisoners suffering penal servitude for five years and upwards as 1,694?—Yes.

40,498. That includes, I suppose, the recidivist and star classes?—Yes.

40,499. Could you give us the number of prisoners of the star class under sentence of five years and upwards?—I could obtain them easily.*

40,500. Your opinion that you expressed really refers to the recidivist class, does it not?—Yes.

40,501. With regard to the wife not caring about a divorce and going off with another man?—Yes.

40,502. That would entirely apply to the wives of prisoners of the recidivist class?—Yes.

40,503. I should like to know the number of prisoners in the star class, because their wives might take a different view. They would be probably respectable women, would they not?—I can give you very nearly the right number, but not quite.

* The witness subsequently wrote to say that the number of such prisoners in custody at the present time is 313 males and 16 females.—H. G. B.

40,504. They would be women who in all probability would not be willing to live with another man?—Quite so, and would not avail themselves of the power of divorce also.

40,505. Well, that might or might not be so, according to whether they had any affection for their husbands?—Yes. The approximate number is about 400 in the star class; and then there is a second class, called the intermediate class, who are on the verge of being recidivist, but are sufficiently young to give hope of reformation.

40,505. (Chairman.) Did the witness give the number of the star class?—Approximately 400.

40,506. (Mr. Brierley.) That is the class of five years and upwards?—No.

40,507. But would you confine yourself to the class of five years and upwards; I should like to know the number of the star class. I suppose it would be much less than that, would it not?—About 200.

40,508. And the intermediate class. You would not have any intermediate class of five years and upwards, would you?—Oh, yes, they are classified according to their antecedents, but I could not give you the figures.

40,509. Different considerations would apply to the 200 class of prisoners?—Certainly.

40,510. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) We have had some evidence that in these irregular unions women would prefer not to be married because they get greater control over the men. Would not that apply equally to the women whose husbands are in prison?—I do not think so.

40,511. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I only want to ask you, Mr. Thomson, with reference to your knowledge generally of prison governors, and authorities of that kind; the great preponderance of opinion, I take it, is against making penal servitude a ground for divorce?—Yes, that is so.

40,512. (Chairman.) Are there any definitions in writing of the classes into which people go in prisons?—Yes, my Lord; the definition of a recidivist is a person guilty of grave or persistent crimes. The definition of the star class—I cannot give it you verbatim, but the effect of it is—(they are in the prison rules which are statutory).

40,513. Could you send us a copy of the prison rules?—Certainly.

40,514. Would that enable us to judge what the star class or the recidivist are?—No, my Lord. But as I am a member of the classifying board, I can tell you.

40,515. Well, would you tell us first what you understand by the star class?—May I give you the process from the beginning?

40,516. If you please?—The process is that on the conviction a convict—that is, a man sent to penal servitude—the previous record is prepared at the prison of conviction, and it is the duty of the governor to send out a certain form with a number of questions on it as to previous character; first to the police; second, to any friend of the prisoner's he may nominate, or old employer and so on, or any person that the governor may know; and these come before the board of which I am a member; and each member of the board records his opinion independently; first of all, seeing the man's previous record of crimes; second, the opinions about him (of course, if he has had a previous term of penal servitude he becomes a recidivist, naturally); and if there is a difference of opinion another member is called in, the chairman, as a matter of fact, of the Prison Commissioners, to decide between the differing opinions; and the star class——

40,517. Might I stop you for a moment there. What sort of cases go, as a matter of course, in the recidivist class?—As a matter of course, only those who have been previously in penal servitude.

40,518. For how many years?—For any time.

40,519. That is what I was trying to get at?—That is almost invariable. I have known about two exceptions in the whole of my time.

40,520. Supposing a man got penal servitude for any length of time, and then gets it again for any length of time does he become a recidivist?—He does, unless it is actually a case where he has come before a court which has taken a very grave view of a small crime, and has awarded penal servitude. If he comes up again, still being under 24, he would perhaps be an exception.

40,521. Does nobody become a recidivist under 24?—Very rarely.

40,522. It is in your discretion?—It is in our discretion, but it is very rarely that it happens.

40,523. What is the shortest term that he can have the first time, the shortest the second time, that would put him into the recidivist class?—Three years in each case.

40,524. Does that practically exhaust that?—No; because a receiver of stolen goods, where it is his first conviction, but there is evidence that he has been a receiver for a long time—there are cases where that man would be put into the recidivist class.

40,525. Although he has not been sentenced at all?—Yes, but there would be evidence from the police that he was a trainer of young thieves, and we would put him into the recidivist class to save contaminating the others.

40,526. Then, supposing a man has a great number of sentences?—If he is over 24 he would go into the recidivist class; if under 24, we would give him the benefit of the doubt.

40,527. What class of crime would the earlier case have to be?—In practice they are generally crimes against property; the only habitual criminal is really a man that commits crime against property. The crime passionel—the crime of passion—may be persistent, especially sexual crime; but it is very uncommon; and it is very uncommon that the two classes of crimes cross over—that the crime passionel becomes a crime against property, and vice versâ.

40,528. But the result is that a recidivist is really a man who would be described as habitually criminal?—That is so.

40,529. Would that be so even though his last sentence were not penal servitude?—Yes, if he is over 24. If he had a large number of sentences for crimes against property we should make him a recidivist.

40,530. Then as to the star class?—Well, that depends very much on these reports. If it is a first offence, and there is nothing known against the man by the police or others, and he gets a good character from his employers, he goes into the star class as a matter of course.

40,531. Does that include a man who has been guilty of manslaughter and sent to prison for 20 years?—Yes.

40,532. He is still in the star class?—Yes, or men who have been commuted from the death sentence; a considerable number.

40,533. Supposing the first sentence was rape?—Well, formerly bad rape cases were not admitted, but now they are admitted into the star class; and we admit unnatural offences into the star class now.

40,534. Does that exhaust the star class. It really means a person who is not supposed to be habitually guilty?—No, it is more than that, my Lord. It is a person who has committed a crime, but is of previous good character and antecedents.

40,535. That is what I was trying to convey. Then the intermediates?—The intermediates are those who are not quite good enough for the star class. I think that is the best way of putting it. And amongst those are habitual criminals under 24, because there is a hope of their crimes not being persistent.

40,536. Then, broadly speaking, with regard to long sentences, it does not follow because a man has a long sentence, that he goes into any one class?—No, it is entirely character.

40,537. He may get 20 years and yet find himself in the star class?—Yes.

40,538. And he might get less years and be put into the recidivist class?—Yes.

40,539. He has done something less offensive, but he has enough to make him an habitual criminal?—Yes, he would go into the recidivist class.

40,540. Could you send me anything in writing showing the classes?—Yes, a transcript from the rule, and the practice under it.

40,541. Do those contain the statutory definitions of habitual criminals?—Yes.

40,542. You would take that from the rules?—Yes.

40,543. (Sir William Anson.) Do these distinct classes—star class, recidivists and intermediates—have any effect on the prisoners in an ordinary prison or convict prison, with regard to prison discipline or privilege?—Yes, in two respects only. The star class and intermediates have only one month separate confinement, and the recidivists three, at the commencement of the sentence. And the second is that they are all kept apart. The discipline is the same, but the star class are kept apart from the recidivists, and the recidivists from the intermediates.

40,544. The star class is not necessarily a first offender?—No, a man who has had two or three convictions for drunkenness might still go into the star class.

40,545. Nor does it depend on the character of the offence?—Not now; it used to.

40,546. Nor on the length of the sentence?—Not in the least.

40,547. And the same with the recidivists?—Yes.

40,548. A man may become a recidivist for a first offence?—No, not for a first offence unless it is receiving.

40,549. And would that be necessary with a sentence of penal servitude, or, say, 18 months' imprisonment?—No, only penal servitude. The classification is different in the local prisons; it is carried on by the local authority there.

40,550. (Chairman.) In the local prisons they do not get long sentences?—No, only up to two years.

(Sir William Anson.) But there is a star class.

40,551. (Chairman.) But they are classified in a different way?—Yes, there is a star class; but in the case of a man coming in for only a month it is not possible to make the same inquiries.

40,552. Then really this classification is a matter of discretion very largely?—Yes.

40,553. There are no arbitrary rules?—No.

40,554. But according to the general condition of the prisoner you would put him in one class or the other?—Yes, his previous character and antecedents. Might I add one thing that I forgot to say. We stretch a point in the direction of keeping the star class exclusive, because the figures of reconviction of the star class are so extremely low; they are under 10 per cent.; perhaps under 2 per cent. of the star class return to penal servitude.

40,555. Under 2 per cent. come back?—Yes, and for that reason we are very careful not to make the star class too wide.

40,556. The whole idea is discipline and reformation?—It is reformation, but the discipline is the same for all.

40,557. But I mean the object is to reform?—Yes, entirely.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much, Mr. Thomson; you have thrown great light upon it. I hope it has not greatly inconvenienced you coming here.

The following are the rules referred to in the witness's evidence:—

The classification of prisoners sentenced to penal servitude is governed by the Statutory Rules set out below.

PRISON RULES

(Convict Prisons).

Rules, dated January 21, 1905, as to Division and Classification, made by the Secretary of State under the Prison Act, 1898.

"A."—Ordinary Division.

3. All convicts in the Ordinary Division shall be classified by the Directors immediately after conviction as follows, viz.:—(a) The Star Class; (b) the Intermediate Class; and (c) the Recidivist Class. Convicts of each class shall, as far as practicable, be kept apart by themselves, and not be allowed to associate with convicts of the other classes.

4. The Star Class.—Any convict shall be eligible for this class who has never been previously convicted, or who is not habitually criminal or of corrupt habits. Convicts in this class shall be liable to be removed to the Intermediate Class if found to exercise a bad influence over other convicts.

5. The Intermediate Class.—Any convict may be placed in this class—

(a) who has not been previously convicted, but who, owing to his general character and antecedents, is not considered by the Directors to be suitable for the Star Class; or

(b) whose record shows that he has been previously convicted, but not of such grave or persistent crime as would bring him within the Recidivist Class.

6. The Recidivist Class.—Any convict may be placed in this class—

(a) who has been previously sentenced to penal servitude or whose record shows that he has been guilty of grave or persistent crime; or

(b) whose licence, under a sentence of penal servitude, has been revoked or forfeited.

7. Convicts in the Intermediate Class may be promoted to the Star Class on their showing proofs of a reformed character, or they may be reduced to the Recidivist Class if they are known to be exercising a bad influence on their fellow convicts.

Classification under these rules is carried out as follows:—The governor of the prison to which the convict is first committed, sends out forms of inquiry to the police and reliable persons to whom the convict is known, and forwards the reply with all other particulars to the Prison Commissioners, who proceed to classify the convict according to the information available as to his character. Certain factors are considered in the classification:—

(1) A conviction for an offence of a non-criminal character, or a criminal conviction several years before would not necessarily disqualify for the Star class, provided that the recent character was good.

(2) Men convicted of criminal assaults on young children are generally excluded from the Star class. Women convicted of illegal operations, where there is evidence of persistence, and men who have committed several bigamies accompanied by fraud are disdisqualified.

(3) Professional receivers, makers of base coin, confirmed blackmailers, and members of a gang of long firm swindlers are not as a rule admitted to the Star class, even though it be a first conviction.

(4) Young men, whose records point to classification as Recidivists, but who are under 24 or even a little over, are generally classified as Intermediates in order to keep them away from more hardened criminals.

(5) Convicts who have already undergone a term of penal servitude are with a few exceptions classified as Recidivists.

From time to time convicts in the intermediate class whose character and disposition appear to justify the change, are promoted to the class above; and others in the star or intermediate classes whose conduct and disposition show that they are exercising a bad influence on their fellows are reduced to the class below.

(Signed) BASIL HOME THOMSON.

Dr. JOHN BENSON COOKE called and examined.

40,558. (Chairman.) Are you engaged at His Majesty's Prison at Wakefield?—I am.

40,559. What is your official position?—My official position is principal medical officer of His Majesty's Prison, Wakefield.

40,560. How many do you have there?—We have just under a thousand prisoners altogether.

40,561. And are some of them, and if so, how many, what you call long-sentence prisoners?—We have 200 convicts who are of the recidivist class, and we have a certain number of juvenile adults.

40,562. Can you say how many of five years and over you have?—I am sorry I cannot tell you. I did not dissect the figures of my own particular prison, but I take the figures of all the convict prisons.

40,563. Well, what are the figures you have?—Over five years, my Lord.

40,564. Five and over?—I did not take it on the five years basis, but on the seven years basis.

40,565. Well, will you give us that?—The figures, my Lord, would be about—taking the seven years basis—of recidivists who are undergoing a sentence of seven years and over—it would work out at about 1,000.

40,566. That is the recidivist class?—Yes.

40,567. How many have you of a class called star?—We have no stars at Wakefield. Generally the star class, taking the figures in the Blue Book, were 355.

40,568. That is this last year?—Yes, the year ending 31st March.

40,569. That is the class who have not come under the general head of habitual criminals?—The star class men are men quite by themselves. They are not habitual criminals.

40,570. Are they the persons whom Mr. Thomson described?—Yes, they are.

40,571. You have been good enough to express your views in a memorandum?—Yes.

40,572. Have you got that before you?—Yes, I have it before me.

40,573. Would you kindly read it. It states it very clearly?—"I have the honour to express my views on this subject as requested in the accompanying letter"—that was a letter to the Commissioners. "I am afraid that the large majority of long-sentence criminals, and the women with whom they live when at liberty, are so loose in their sexual relations, and so readily form temporary ties, that any advantage from the facilities suggested would not be very far-reaching in its effects. There may be a few respectable women, struggling to support themselves and their families, who, having the chance of favourable re-marriage, might be benefited by the facilities suggested. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the binding nature of the marriage tie, in the existing state of the law, may occasionally be the means of driving the wife into irregular sexual union with a man who would marry her if the law were altered. Apart, however, from the question of re-marriage, such facilities would possibly operate favourably in another direction; I have known instances in which the return of the husband from imprisonment has been dreaded by the wife, and his actual return home has been the means of breaking up the home."

40,574. To what extent have you known that?—I have known that, but I very much regret I could not refresh my memory with the actual details; but I know I am stating a fact when I say I have known several instances of that; and I have heard it also from the police who have followed the lives of these men afterwards.

40,575. Then will you kindly proceed?—"It is in such a case as this, where the granting of divorce facilities would be an advantage to the woman in freeing her from these disastrous consequences that follow her husband's return from prison. I have heard of instances where the husband has, under these circumstances, forced the wife and girls into prostitution in order to obtain money for himself. Such cases seem to emphasise the need for releasing the woman from the matrimonial tie."

40,576. Does that mean on his return?—On his return, yes.

40,577. And if she had been able to free herself he would not have had the power to do it?—That is so. "It might be objected that the influence of a good wife is occasionally the means of reformation of the criminal on his regaining his liberty. I think such cases are rare. The difficulty, however, would be likely to adjust itself, inasmuch as the woman who would seek divorce under these circumstances is not the kind of woman to prove a guardian angel to her husband. Any facilities for divorce in the circumstances mentioned would be quite inoperative unless the state of the law were fully explained to the wife by some outside agency, acting the part of friend and adviser. To become operative the alteration in the law would have to be supplemented in this way. In some cases it is extremely likely that divorce having been granted to the wife in the husband's absence, he would on release resort to reprisals which might easily take the form of personal violence. I regret that I have not any notes which enable me to give concrete instances of the conditions to which I have referred, but I am in no doubt as to the actual facts. From the standpoint of mere expediency, and ignoring any considerations touching the sacredness of the marriage tie, I incline to the view that the balance of advantage would be found to lie in the granting of such facilities."

40,578. Then you have some further notes?—Yes. "I incline to the view that it is not so much merely long absence from the wife that should be looked upon as a ground of divorce in regard to long-sentence prisoners, so much as the moral depravity evidenced by the length of sentence, and degree of recidivism. In regard to the illustrations mentioned in my report of August 24th as to the hardship inflicted on the wife by the return of a depraved husband ——"

40,579. This is the previous memorandum, I take it?—It is, my Lord.

40,580. This is a supplemental one?—Yes, my Lord. With regard to those illustrations—"I can now remember two others. One, the case of a wife visiting her husband who was seriously ill in the prison hospital at Portland. On being told that the patient was out of danger, the woman's grief seemed rather to increase than diminish, which she explained by confessing that her tears were really due to the distress of mind caused by the near prospect of her husband's return, with all the misery it would bring upon her and her children. I also remember an instance in a convict prison in which the governor received a quite pathetic letter from the wife of a prisoner, imploring him (in her ignorance of the law) to keep her husband in prison as she and her children had got a nice home together which would all tumble to pieces on his return. There can be no doubt that a rigid adherence to the law in its present form often means something indistinguishable from slow martyrdom in the case of a respectable woman tied to a cruel and hopelessly bad man; and I would put the matter in this way: let such a down-trodden woman choose whether she sacrifice herself in this way, or seek to break the matrimonial tie. I would not force the sacrifice upon her."

40,581. Might I ask, as you refer to the children there, whether you think the woman should have that choice, and exercise it partly for the benefit of her children?—I think the consideration of the children comes in very largely in dealing with a man of utterly debased morals—a man whose influence in society is nothing but pernicious.

40.582. If he came back the influence might be so bad that she might say: "Well, I prefer to exercise this for the sake of my children"?—I do; I feel that very strongly indeed; and I should like to add that I look upon many of the recidivist class as most dangerous to society, forming centres of moral infection. I have had a great deal to do with the police ——

40,583. Would you add exactly what you mean by the recidivists?—The recidivist class are men who have been sentenced—I think, Mr. Thomson, I am right in saying that the recidivist class are men who have been sentenced to a certain number of local sentences, or of penal servitude. Is not it so?

40,584. Well, we want your evidence; we have had Mr. Thomson's?—I was asking for the official view of recidivism.

40,585. Well, never mind the official view; give us your view?—Well, recidivists are men, I take it, who show by their classification as recidivists that they are habitual criminals.

40,586. Well, that is quite sufficient for the present purpose. Then you have dealt with the numbers on the next page?—Yes. "Taking the total number of convicts as 3,046, it will be seen that they are made up as follows" ——

40,587. Is that this last year?—Those are the figures up to the end of March of this year—the last official year. "They are made up as follows in reference "to classification:—

"Stars	355
"Intermediates	522
"Juvenile adults	67
"Recidivists	2,102."

40,588. What are the intermediates?—The intermediates are men who may have committed crime and probably have been sentenced previously, but who do not show that they are habitual criminals.

40,589. You mean there is a doubt about it?—There is a doubt about their being habitual criminals. They are intermediate between the star and the recidivists. "In regard to the star class, although there are many long-sentence prisoners among them, they are a very hopeful class. They are to be looked upon as more unfortunate than absolutely criminal. They feel their imprisonment very keenly, and mental depression is not uncommon among them. For these reasons, I would not add to their punishment the forfeiture of matrimonial rights. The 522 intermediates are so young in years, and, moreover, criminal habits are not fixed in them. Any divorce facilities would therefore not apply to this class. We are now left to deal with the 2,102 recidivists, men in whom the criminal habit has become fixed, and whose 'moral mainspring' (to quote a recent writer) has been irreparably damaged and permanently put out of action. On the suit of the wife I would grant divorce facilities to some, if not all, of this class. But when it is considered that certainly half these men are unmarried, it will be seen that the number of wives of long-sentence prisoners who would be affected by divorce facilities is very small. Among the prisoners in local prisons there are, however, 1,516 old convicts of the recidivist class. It would be reasonable to include some, if not all, of these under the penalty of forfeiture of matrimonial rights. My present feeling is rather in the direction of restricting the proposed penalty to convicts, whether in convict or local prisons, who have undergone two and more previous sentences of penal servitude. The figures under this heading would work out at about 1,000."

40,590. How long are these sentences that you have in your mind?—Those sentences that I have in my mind are not limited. There is no limit to the number of years in that case I merely take men who have done two previous sentences.

40,591. Even if it were, say, two years or three years?—Oh, it must be three years in a convict prison, but if it were two sentences of three years, I should be inclined to look upon their degree of recidivism as being so pronounced as to justify their being called habitual criminals.

40,592. Do they ever come into the recidivist class without having had a previous sentence?—As a rule, they must have had a previous sentence either in the local or the convict prison.

40,593. In the convict prison it must be three years?—Never less than three years.

40,594. And in the local prison?—It may be from two days up to two years. The recidivists I am speaking of are recidivist convicts; they are not local prisoners at all. I am not considering the local prisoners except the 1,500 and odd convicts who are doing small sentences in a local prison.

40,595. But at the top of the page you have now reached you are dealing with those who have undergone two or more sentences of penal servitude at least?—Yes, I am.

40,596. And for those you think it might be a case for divorce?—Yes, I do.

40,597. Now, I want to know what your views are with regard to those who, for instance, have done some small offence, and then have a sentence, say, of seven years?—I am not absolutely determined in my own mind as to whether divorce should be granted for recidivists who have done seven years; I am not sure; I leave that rather open. It is a matter of detail I really have not made up my mind about.

40,598. But you include in recidivists a man who has been sentenced to a small punishment first and then a penal servitude punishment?—No, I do not in this case. I am only dealing with men who have done two previous sentences of penal servitude actually.

40,599. Yes, I follow that at the top of that page; but do you include generally under the term of recidivists persons who have done short sentences in a local prison and then a long sentence in a convict prison?—No, I do not.

40,600. They are not included as recidivists?—Not necessarily.

40,601. Then are recidivists only those who have had penal servitude twice?—No, I think I am right in saying it depends on the number of previous sentences, and also the nature of the crime very much—as to their being recidivists or not.

40,602. Then would you proceed?—"Taking the same number of recidivists, if those whose present or past sentence is, or was, seven years and over, were made liable to forfeiture of matrimonial rights, the figures would be well under 1,000." That is taking it on the seven years basis. "This is, of course, a very small number to legislate for, but the methods of selection I have suggested would serve to single out those whose reformation cannot reasonably be expected and who, in a condition of liberty, are a focus of moral infection and a cause of degradation to all around them."

40,603. I gather that is really your point of view, that if they are, when let out and coming back to their families, a focus of moral degradation, it is an advantage to the wife, and possibly to the children too, to be free?—Yes, that is my feeling.

40,604. That would apply to any that come within that category?—Any that come within that category, as showing a certain depth of moral depravity. "The indirect effect of divorce facilities in such cases would be considerable. It would give an unfortunate downtrodden woman 'something to bargain with,' even if not utilised, in dealing with her husband. At present, among the lower orders, the idea largely prevails that the wife is the property of the husband." Then I have made some remarks under the head of general considerations.

40,605. Yes, I should like to have that?—"General considerations not touching exclusively the question of long-sentence prisoners.—In my experience I have met with instances of systematic tyranny, persecution and cruelty practised upon a helpless woman by a dissolute, ruffianly husband, of which cruelty the details should only be heard in camera. For such there is at present no relief. It is to be remembered, in connection with women living without support apart from their husbands, among the lower orders, that the taking in of lodgers is a common way of making a living; and, very naturally, this easily leads to temptations to unfaithfulness."

40,606. (Sir Frederick Treves.) In your large experience, Dr. Cooke, have you met with many actual instances of hardship to the wives of convicts through the want of facilities for divorce?—I have certainly met with one or two instances; I cannot say I have met with very many.

40,607. One or two in an experience of how many years?—In an experience of 25 years.

40,608. You could only say you have met with one or two instances in which the wives of convicts suffered hardship from the lack of facilities for divorce?—That is so, but I should like to add I have not been looking out for them.

40,609. Still, the number has been very small?—It would not immediately come under my notice. If I had been looking out for them I should probably have found a great many more.

40,610. Then might we infer in the case of the recidivists there is not likely to be much demand for divorce?—You mean on the part of the wife?

40,611. Yes?—I do not think so, seeing that a very large proportion of the recidivists prisoners are unmarried. My own view is that it might easily be found that only a third are married, because prisoners are very fond of telling the chaplains and other officials that they are married. They mean that there is a certain woman they live with, but the ceremony has been waived, and they say she is the wife; she is allowed to visit the prison, and it is an advantage to the man; and, therefore, I would not take the figures of the officials.

40,612. Then if it becomes a matter of law that five or seven years imprisonment is a ground of divorce, it would not be made use of by the wives of the habitual criminals?—I think it would be made use of to a very small extent indeed; because my experience of the lower orders is, that they are so ignorant, that they would know nothing about it, unless there were some outside authority to tell them. I believe if it were law to-morrow that the number of instances where a wife would apply for divorce would be very small indeed.

40,613. Then you make an exception of the star class. You say you would not allow penal servitude to be a ground for divorce in the case of the star class. I mention this, because I think the impression that has rather been left on the minds of the Commission by previous evidence is that these are the very people whose wives are likely to want relief. For example, there has been mentioned the case of a quite young woman—I think her age was 22—who married a man, who within three or four months of their marriage is convicted for some offence, and has five years' penal servitude. Probably he would come into the star class. Does not that strike you as a hard case?—I feel with regard to the star class that they should be considered. The star class feel their imprisonment very keenly and mental depression is exceedingly common amongst them; and if, added to the punishment were the knowledge that their wives could leave them, and go off with some other man under cover of divorce, I think the depression would be very great. I think it would be an addition to the man's punishment.

40,614. You are carrying out the excellent tradition of our profession of considering first the patient and are looking at the question from the prisoner's point of view?—Yes, I think quite likely I am.

40,615. Looking at it from the wife's point of view, do not you think there may possibly be a great hardship in that class of case to the wife?—I think so, but I do not think it applies any more to these prisoners than to any other absentee; a man out prospecting in the colonies, or any other absentee from a wife.

60,616. Therefore, it comes to this, that if you exclude the star class the number of cases of divorce likely to arise would be exceedingly small?—Exceedingly small, yes.

40,617. (Lady Frances Balfour.) You are talking about depression, Dr. Cooke, of the star class in prison. Of course, their wives are probably equally as well educated as themselves: they are a superior class in education?—Yes, I think they are.

40,619. And the wives are probably as well educated?—I should think that may be considered to be the case, 40,619. Then is it not possible that the mental depression of the wife outside who has a husband in for some disgraceful crime may be quite as great as that of the star class in prison?—I think that cannot be denied.

40,620. And that therefore she ought to be considered; considered by giving her her freedom to release her from this pain?—That would follow if you would consider that mere absence should be a ground for divorce.

40,621. No, I do not agree there. Surely a crime that puts a man in prison is quiet different from desertion. The disgrace to her and her children is quite different from the man deserting her?—But so many crimes of the star class are crimes of passion committed under a momentary impulse, perhaps when a man is drunk; and I am bound to say I have a great deal of sympathy with them in that way. I think they are quite rightly punished; but I quite agree that the wife's position should be considered.

40,622. If they are crimes of passion, which are not so usual, I suppose, in the star class as in other——?—Oh, I think so. Many of them are momentary attacks under a sense of injury and not premeditated crime.

40,623. Then we may probably assume that the wife and children have suffered from that before the imprisonment?—I do not think that would prevail largely in the star class.

40,624. Then you say that the woman should also have in her hands something with which to bargain with her husband, so to speak?—I think so.

40,625. In the lower classes it would be an advantage to the women to have the power of divorce. I do not like to put it the lower classes generally; but that element would enter into the condition of things, and operate very strongly, namely, that at present the wife has nothing to bargain with, and her hands are empty, and she is entirely at the mercy of her husband?—I quite agree that is so.

40,626. And that would be a practical proof that she was not in his hands?—Yes, I think so; I think it would operate indirectly to the advantage of the woman; the mere existence of facilities would operate indirectly to the advantage of the woman.

40,627. She is equally free as he is himself?—Exactly.

40,628. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Would the fact that the right to divorce exists operate as a deterrent to the commission of crime?—I do not think it would; I think it would be quite inoperative; I think it would not deter a single man from committing crime.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much, doctor; I am sure your evidence will be of great assistance.

Dr. WILLIAM HENRY WINDER called and examined.

40,629. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You are governor of the prison at Aylesbury?—I am.

40,630. Your prison experience is almost entirely with women prisoners?—It is; yes.

40,631. You have been kind enough to furnish a memorandum. If it will suit your view, I will ask you to read it?—"My prison experience has been almost entirely with women, chiefly convicts, and therefore is somewhat restricted. It seems to me that if divorce is to be possible, as the result of criminal action by one party to a marriage contract, it should only be allowed when the other desires it, and when he or she has led a respectable life. I do not think that divorce should be an automatic result of every long sentence. I certainly think divorce should be possible in the case of serious offences leading to long sentences of, say, ten years and upwards, but I would not allow divorce if the husband or wife of the offending party had anything to do with the commission of the crime. My reasons for these conclusions are: — (1) The long separation which often leads to immorality on the part of the free party. (2) The unfairness of the non guilty party having to live with the criminal partner after the termination of the sentence. (3) The advantages which would result to the children of a marriage by complete separation from the guilty party. Cases of female prisoners' husbands living with other women have come under my notice, but the information is mostly unreliable, so one hardly feels justified in quoting them."

40,632. Are the women prisoners you have to deal with generally married women?—As a rule, yes, I think so.

40,633. And you say in cases you have had before you where the husbands have gone with other women, the evidence is too unreliable to give?—Yes, I have tried very hard to recollect some cases, but I could only hear of four or five.

40,634. Is there anything else you wish to tell us?—No, I do not think so.

40,635. (Mr. Spender.) I suppose your first point, Dr. Winder, applies to a suggestion that was made to us by a previous witness, that if, say, the wife of a convicted prisoner applied to the judge on conviction in case of certain long sentences, a decree of divorce should be at the discretion of the judge. That would not be your point of view?—I had not looked at it in that way.

40,636. You think that in those long sentence cases there should be grounds for divorce practically on evidence that the wife has lived a respectable life, or the husband, as the case may be?—Yes.

40,637. Have you any idea in your own mind what sentence should carry that with it?—Well, I said 10 years, but I am not very clear about it.

40,638. Ten years, you think?—Of course, 10 years in an ordinary way does not mean 10 years. If a woman gets 10 years, she would in the ordinary way get out in six years and eight months.

40,639. Is it your experience that a wife or a husband of a convict criminal is faithful to the other party?—I think so, but I am not very clear about it. It is so very difficult to get information.

40,640. They do not talk about it?—No.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Thank you, Dr. Winder.

Dr. OLIVER FEREIRA NAYLOR TREADWELL called and examined.

40,641. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You are governor of the convict prison at Parkhurst?—No, medical officer of the convict prison at Parkhurst, and medical superintendent of the asylum at Parkhurst.

40,642. Now you have been kind enough to prepare a memorandum for us. Will you read it to us if that meets your views?—Yes, this gives my views: "I am of opinion that a criminal offence, resulting in a term of imprisonment long or short, should not, by itself, form a ground for divorce for the following reasons:—In a large number of instances, the convict is attached to his wife and children by ties of affection, and I know from reading many letters passing between them that the ties of affection are kept up during the incarceration of the convict, and that both look forward to the reunion after his release. I am of opinion that the marriage tie is powerful as a deterrent from infidelity, and the perils to the wife would seem to be increased by the possibility of divorce, merely as the result of application on her part on the ground of her husband's imprisonment; she would be more liable to be subjected to persuasion by other men, and might well give way to a course of action she would deplore later on, especially on again meeting her husband after release. Where there are children, the difficulties of the situation would be still further increased; the father after release might find his wife married to another, his children, out of his custody, neglected or ill-treated, and a situation produced tending to crimes of violence. As regards the convict himself, I am of opinion that the severance of the marriage tie would in very many instances remove a powerful incentive towards good behaviour in prison, to possible endeavour towards a better life when free, and might produce in some considerable depression and despondency, possibly leading to suicidal impulse; it would in some, no doubt, engender bitter feelings of revenge to be brooded over and fostered during imprisonment and acted upon after release. It appears to me that the question of repeated acts of crime, leading to repeated terms of imprisonment, might well come within the scope of consideration as a ground for divorce under the heading of desertion, but that other contributory evidence should be necessary to give it effect; e.g., that the wife was ignorant of, or no party to, the crime; had not benefited thereby; had endeavoured to persuade her husband from his course of conduct, and after due notice had been given him, that persistence in his course of crime would be used as a plea for divorce. As I understand it, divorce is granted to persons both of whom have shown, the one by misconduct, the other by the application for divorce, that it is mutually desirable to be relieved of the marriage tie, and, as a general rule, I should say both parties are relieved, or at any rate able to appreciate the justice of the result. But it appears to me that, in placing a term or terms of imprisonment in the category of reasons for divorce, we should often be acting unjustly towards one member of the contract; we should be forcing divorce upon one member for reasons to some extent outside his control, reasons which in the majority of instances would not appeal to his judgment as direct acts of misconduct, injustice or injury towards his wife, and thus engender a spirit of injustice or a desire for reprisal."

40,643. Have you anything you desire to add to your statement?—I should like to qualify it to some extent. In the first place, I should like to say that the prisoners with whom I have to deal are male convicts only. They are of three different classes of prisoners. They are those you have already heard of as the star class, the intermediates and the recidivists, and in addition there are collected at Parkhurst prison nearly all the weak-minded convicts, and since the year 1906, nearly all the convict-insane. The remarks which I have made here in reference to the state of mind of the prisoner which might be engendered by the possibility of the divorce of his wife, would apply more particularly to the star class prisoner. These prisoners very often for one particular act—in fact, the imprisonment which they are suffering is for one particular act of crime—get long sentences, and I know from experience in many cases the ties of affection are kept up between the prisoner and his wife, and both are mutually looking forward to the time when he shall come out of prison and return to his family. In a very large number of cases the man does not revert to a course of crime. He comes out and makes a home for his wife and children, and it seems to me that the mere fact that a man has been locked up as a result of one crime or even of more crimes than one, should be taken as a ground for divorce would be detrimental. With regard to the other class of prisoners—the recidivists particularly—it appears to me, in fact I know from experience and from enquiry of the prisoners themselves, that in many cases they did not live with their wives. It is not at all uncommon for them to go out, and instead of returning to their wives to live with another woman, and in those cases I do not think the factor of divorce would affect them individually so detrimentally. At the same time, it appears to me that even there this factor might be taken into consideration in another way. For instance, as desertion; the fact of his having repeated terms of imprisonment might be looked upon as desertion. As regards the weak-minded convicts, I am of opinion that divorce might be granted in almost every case, because they do not appear to me to be at all fitted for family life. They are most unstable people. They have no ability to make or keep a home, and consequently are not at all fitted for married life. At the same time, the difficulty would arise as to whether they should be allowed to re-marry if you grant them divorce; this is a very important question, because it would be no good if you grant a divorce and after three years the man goes out and re-marries. So we seem hardly ripe for legislation on that point, until something with regard to carrying out the recommendations of the Feeble-Minded Commission is done. With regard to the convict insane, I should say, in the majority of cases, the wife ought to be entitled to divorce. The conduct of the convict insane is generally very bad. The majority of the cases are incurable, and under any circumstances it seems to me that they are not fitted to go back to family life.

40,644. Are there many of these cases—the last class that you have mentioned (the criminal insane) —who are married?—Of those cases that have been in the asylum since it was opened in June 1906 (numbering about 168 cases), the proportion of the criminally insane who are married is about one to three. There are 40 married, roughly, to 120 single.

40,645. About 40 married cases?—Yes, and about 120 single.

40,646. Since 1906?—Since 1906—of those that have been through the asylum of which I am superintendent.

40,647. That asylum is a branch of Parkhurst prison?—It is a branch of Parkhurst prison. It now takes the whole of the convict insane.

40,648. How many prisoners have you got in Parkhurst altogether?—In the prison itself the general average is about 780.

40,649. Counting the asylum too?—The general average population of the asylum is 56.

40,650. Between 800 and 900 altogether?—Between 800 and 850 altogether.

40,651. And of those during the four years you have had 46 married insane?—We have had 40 married insane.

40,652. Would you say it was an argument in favour of divorce in the case of the recidivist, that when he comes out he generally does not go back to his wife, but seeks some other alliance?—I would not say it is generally done, but very frequently.

40,653. We must not look at it simply from the point of view of the prisoner. Is it not rather an argument in favour of the wife having a chance of divorce?—Yes; but it does not seem to me it is a divorce that should be given on the ground of imprisonment, but on the factor of desertion, which would be easily proved too—desertion coupled with imprisonment should entitle to a divorce, but the mere fact of imprisonment per se should not entitle to divorce.

40,654. (Mr. Brierley.) Do you say the 120 you have mentioned are the whole of the convict insane in the country?—No, in Parkhurst.

40,655. I thought you said they were all at Parkhurst now?—No, the majority.

40,656. Because there is Broadmoor?—Yes, but they do not go to Broadmoor now—very few go to Broadmoor. They are only the convict insane. They are not the King's pleasure insane; only those certified to be insane after they have received a sentence of penal servitude go to the Parkhurst Asylum—who become insane during the term of their imprisonment —and that does not represent anything like the whole total number, because a certain number are boarded out in the county asylums.

40,657. You do not know what the total number is?—No, I could not give the actual total number.

40,658. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Do I understand if a man is an habitual criminal that should entitle the wife to a divorce?—No, I would not give divorce—not for actual crime—for actual terms of imprisonment at all. I think there should be some other factor to be taken into account with it.

40,659. By reason of his being an habitual criminal, if he was kept in prison for a certain number of years, you would count that desertion so as to give the wife a right to divorce on the ground of desertion?—Yes, if she could prove that when he came out he did not endeavour to make a home for her, then I should look upon that as desertion, and the fact of his crime being also taken into consideration, she would be entitled to divorce. But I think there ought to be more than one factor—not the simple factor of imprisonment.

40,660. You would include the imprisonment as a ground for divorce, and if, when he came out, he puts her into such a position that she cannot live with him, then you would include imprisonment as a factor for divorce?—Yes.

40,661. You would combine it?—Yes. I think it might be combined with the nature of the crime—particular crimes against the person—crimes of immorality and possibly crimes of violence; if she could prove that he treated her very brutally I think that might be taken into consideration with the term of imprisonment from the point of view of getting a divorce.

40,662. Then you mention a man coming out and going off with another woman. If the sexes were made equal in the Divorce Court, she could get a divorce simply on the ground of adultery?—Yes, and if the facilities for divorce—that is to say, the cheapening of the process—were brought within reach. I am told by these men—by a large number—that they believe their wives live with other men while they are in prison—I am speaking particularly of the recidivist class—and I should imagine that is possibly the case, and that a divorce is not sought in many of those cases because they cannot afford it. I think it is quite possible that many of those people might seek divorce if there were the facilities for it.

40,663. (Sir William Anson.) You would not make imprisonment in itself a ground for divorce?—No, I would not.

40,664. Either length of time or frequency of conviction?—No.

40,665. In fact, you would couple it with desertion ——?—I would couple it with some other factor which might ——

40,666. Which might not in itself be enough?—Enough to entitle to divorce.

40,667. With regard to re-marriage, you said that some of these persons whose wives might be entitled to divorce were quite unfitted for married life?—Yes, I think so—the feeble-minded.

40,668. If they were divorced ——?—They would re-marry.

40,669. You could hardly, as the law stands, put any restriction on the re-marriage?—They would marry another woman, and we should be worse off than before. I admit that.

40,670. Have you come across many cases in which divorce is desired either by the prisoner or the spouse outside?—No, I have no opportunity of coming across that. Practically in a convict prison one has very little opportunity of coming across the families. The only ones one would come across are those who visit; and if a man is visited by his wife, there would be some affection presumably between them, and we should not hear anything in those cases on that point.

40,671. Then have you come across individual cases in which you think divorce would be desirable?—No. I know of many convicts whom, I think, it is most undesirable that they should return to their wives.

40,672. Therefore would it not be desirable that the wife should have a divorce if she could be induced to apply for one?—Yes, there are many such cases undoubtedly.

40,673. (Sir Frederick Treves.) The term "criminal lunatic"; by that do we understand a person who is insane at the time the crime is committed?—Well, the term criminal lunatic—I do not know whether it is justified, but it has actually come into use to signify a lunatic who is at the time during the period of his certificate doing a sentence of imprisonment.

40,674. As a matter of fact, there are two perfectly distinct classes of individual: one is the person insane at the time the crime is committed?—That is so.

40,675. And the crime would be a feature of that insanity?—That is so.

40,676. And the other person is a person who becomes insane after he has been convicted?—Yes.

40,677. And the crime for which he has been convicted need not necessarily be the outcome of the insanity?—Quite so.

40,678. That is to say, a man may be convicted for forgery who later on develops homicidal mania?—Yes, he becomes insane.

40,679. As a matter of fact, at Parkhurst you have all the prisoners who have become insane after conviction?—No, only the convict insane and not quite all of these.

40,680. Do they follow the ordinary classification of the insane with regard to proportion?—I should say they do very nearly. The two great classes we have are the secondary dementia and the delusional insanities, and I should say that is much the same proportion as in the ordinary asylum.

40,681. The secondary or terminal dementia represents one-third of the total of the insane in this country?—Yes.

40,682. Would that be about the proportion in your asylum?—The secondary dementia taking the cases since we opened the asylum—of course the asylum itself at the present moment only accommodates 56 patients—but taking it from the period from which we opened it we have had 164 through the asylum; of those, 42 have been classified as secondary dementia; delusional insanity 43; the next two classes, being the melancholias or manias, or the alternating insanities.

40,683. And the proportion of recoveries in those cases is about the same as in other asylums throughout the country?—I should say the proportion of recoveries is very small, or small in comparison.

40,684. Then you would allow that the criminal lunatic—using the term in either sense—or the weak-minded convict should afford a ground for divorce?—Certainly.

40,685. But I rather gather that you base that on eugenics, because you say, speaking of the weak-minded convict, "It is no use to grant divorce if he can marry "again"?—No, that is so.

40,686. Then your basis rests mainly on eugenics?—Yes.

40,687. You are not granting divorce because a man is insane, but because he may possibly propagate degenerate——?—No, not altogether; I consider he is unfitted to go back to his wife. I admit that under the present state of the law one is not able to keep him away; but that is only a deplorable condition which ought possibly to be remedied.

40,688. But would you allow that, in the interests of the wife, it would be justifiable that insanity should be a ground for divorce?—Yes, I think so.

40,689. That is a different aspect of the case?—Yes; there is the aspect of the case as regards the probability of the hereditary influence upon his children, which would be certainly bad. He ought not to be allowed to have any more children.

40,690. But in the interests of the wife, would you say also that insanity should be a ground for divorce specially in the case of criminal lunatics?—Yes.

40,691. Then you have amongst your patients an exceptionally large proportion of epileptics, have you not?—No, we have not a very large number. We have a general average in the whole population of about twenty epileptics; not insane epileptics or weak-minded, but epileptics of any description.

40,692. And they do not come under the category you have now mentioned?—No; the proportion of epileptic insanity in our asylum is very small indeed. I think I have only known of one or two cases.

40,693. Would you distinguish between insane epileptics and sane epileptics?—No; on the ground of eugenics I would not allow the epileptic to marry at all.

40,694. Then that you would hold entirely on the ground of eugenics?—Yes.

40,695. (Mr. Spender.) You seem to distinguish, Dr. Treadwell, between a criminal condition and criminality as measured by the conviction. You would not give a wife a remedy of divorce in the case of a husband who has been convicted of any crime or any sentence?—Not as regards the sentence. I think the actual fact of imprisonment, or the length of the sentence, or the mere fact of the sentence, ought not to enter into consideration in the question; but it ought to have added to it the factor as to the crime which has been committed, or the desertion of his wife when he is free, or his conduct when free. If he treats her brutally, and she can prove brutality as well as imprisonment, it seems to me that there are two factors there, one the violence towards his wife, the other the inability to support her; or he does not support her, or make any endeavour to support her, because of his imprisonment, and I think those are two factors instead of one.

40,696. Does not that seem to require to add an element of cruelty to the desertion? Take the case of a wife whose husband has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment for 10 years; on your principle that would be desertion. Would you not give her a remedy for that unless it were coupled with something else which you would call cruelty or general misconduct?—Yes.

40,697. Do not you think in that case——?—I see the hardship to the wife. There are many cases, I have no doubt, in which there is extreme hardship to the wife consequent on the husband having been in prison, and being taken away from her for 10 years. But I come across a large number of the star class of prisoner (I am speaking here particularly of the star class) who are in for crimes against property—perhaps one act; they are brought up for forgery or misappropriation of funds—men in a good position, whose wives have corresponded with them on the most affectionate terms, and who are looking forward during the whole period of their imprisonment to their return to their wives and particularly to their children, and who after their release, as far as one can tell, have never lapsed into another period of crime, and who have made a home for the wife and children after release; it seems it would be a very great hardship to the convict, and might be detrimental to him—in fact, I think it would be detrimental to him, as far as his mental condition is concerned—in such a case if, owing to the pressure of some person outside, the wife were to obtain a divorce from him merely on the ground of his imprisonment.

40,698. I do not think anybody has proposed making it compulsory, and in the case of the wife being affectionate it would not arise?—It is only a question of where the injury to the individual would arise—whether there is, to commence with, a mutual affection; but it seems to me that the wife might be subject to undue pressure when she was away from her husband to take some action which she would deplore when he came out of prison.

40,699. Do you think that should weigh against giving other wives the right to have this release from a convict who is in prison for 10 years or going to be? Do you think that ought to weigh?—Yes, I think it ought. It is a contract that has been entered into, and it appears to me it is a contract which must to a great extent be kept. I think there are many cases in which, even where they are living together, there are very great hardships which have to be borne.

40,700. We are only thinking of the particular case. Supposing it is just to give it to the wife in these extreme cases, ought we to withhold it because it might be abused in some cases owing to extreme pressure from outside?—It is difficult to say, but that is the point that strikes me about it—that it is open to that. I have conversed on the subject of divorce with a good many prisoners and the opinions differ a good deal. There are a certain number of men who would, I think, welcome divorce; there are a certain number who would be willing to accede divorce if it were requested; and there are others who have told me that the fact of their having children and a wife to go back to has enabled them to continue their self-respect while in prison; has enabled them to go through their incarceration in a much more contented frame of mind, and been an incentive towards, and hope for, a future better life on their release. I think, if you take away all that, you would take away a very great deal of that incentive to reform which is most important—certainly, with the star class of prisoner.

40,701. (Sir William Anson.) There is one question I should like to ask. You have experience both of male and female convicts?—No, I have only male convicts. I have had no experience of female convicts for so many years that I could not speak of those.

40,702. Then what you have been telling us applies entirely to male convicts?—Yes.

(Sir William Anson.) We are very much obliged to you for your evidence.

Mrs. Mary Hodder called and examined.

40,703. (Sir William Anson.) You are a visitor for the Church Army, I believe?—Yes.

40,704. And in the department which concerns prisoners' wives and families?—Yes.

40,705. You have been kind enough to prepare a short statement. Would it be convenient to you to read that aloud?—"I have worked for the Church Army 17 years, and for the past 11 years I have given the greater part of my time to visiting and helping the wives and families of prisoners. I have during that time seen some 3,000 cases; I have analysed my books, and find that 1,475 were long-sentence cases ranging from one year to 20 years; the remainder were of shorter duration. During the whole of my experience in dealing with these people, I have never heard of one desiring divorce; the great majority of the women are very faithful to their husbands. I am of opinion that the majority of prisoners' wives would resent the idea of being divorced. It is true some have done wrong, but in every case owing to extreme poverty, and under a promise from the seducer, that they and their children would be cared for and provided with a home; with these few exceptions the women on the whole are very loyal and true to their husbands. My feelings are that increased facilities of divorce would be conducive to more harm than good. Bad as the husbands of these poor women are, they seem to have a certain amount of regard for their wives, and are most ready to forgive their wives in the few cases when unfaithfulness has occurred."

40,706. Is there anything you would like to add to that, Mrs. Hodder?—Only one thing I would like to say, that all the cases with a very few exceptions I have proved are married. You see, I always get their marriage certificates before I help them. Some have tried to deceive, but now that it is generally known that I insist upon seeing the marriage certificate, I have very few who try to deceive me in that way. So with a few exceptions they are all married.

40,707. Your evidence applies almost entirely to women who are married?—Yes. There are just one or two who are not whom we have helped and are helping now. We have a woman who has been with us over a year; we care for her children; but she is very faithful to the man, and he has promised to marry her when he returns in January after serving his term of imprisonment.

40,708. Then your experience, I may take it shortly, is that you have not come across any demand for divorce amongst the wives of these prisoners?—No, I have never met any prisoner's wife who desired to be divorced from her husband.

40,709. Have you any experience on this point, whether the continuance of the marriage tie has a good influence on the man?—Well, I believe so. I had a letter from a prisoner, who is undergoing six years sentence, this week, and he tells me how he is looking forward to coming home to his wife and children; and I have seen the wife, and she is also looking forward to the man returning to her. Then I have had a case where a man was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment, and all the children—five in number—have been taught to look forward with joy to their father's return; and during the 11 years I have been dealing with that case, that man has written to me saying how delighted he is at the thought of being re-united to his wife and his family. She, I know, has been faithful to him during that time.

40,710. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) In those cases you have mentioned, even if there were a right of divorce it would not be taken advantage of?—I am certain it would not.

40,711. Is that any reason why, in cases where there should be a divorce owing to the conduct of the man, the wife should not have it?—Well, I have known of a case where I think there would be no difficulty in his getting divorce; but the wife has repented of her wrong-doing, and she has repented so very much that she has suffered very much for her wrong-doing, and the man has freely forgiven her.

40,712. There there would be no divorce at all?—No, there would not be, but she has done wrong to the extent that if he sought for divorce he would be granted it, but he has forgiven her.

40,713. But Dr. Treadwell mentioned cases where the man has had a long term of imprisonment, and then come out, and he is a man of such bad character that he ill-treats his wife. In such a case as that, do you agree with him that you could, by combining the imprisonment with the subsequent misconduct, give the wife the right to divorce?—Well, as far as I am concerned, I would; but strange to say, the more the men ill-use their wives the better they seem to like the men. It is a very strange thing, but, notwithstanding the illusage, they are sometimes subjected to—they seem to cling to their husbands.

(Sir William Anson.) We are very much obliged to you, Mrs. Hodder, for your evidence.

Mr. Harry Butler Simpson, C.B., called and examined.

40,714. (Chairman.) Are you in the Home Office?—Yes.

40,715. What is your official position there?—Principal Clerk in one department of the Home Office.

40,716. Which is that?—Department C, which deals, amongst other matters, with police and criminal procedure.

40,717. I wanted to get some information from you which I have no doubt you can give us with regard to the expenses that would have to be paid by married women in enforcing their maintenance orders and getting those orders. You state here that formerly the clerks to the Justices were "solicitors acting in a more or less private capacity, and they charged persons asking for the issue of warrants, summonses, &c. fees for the clerical labour involved"?—That is so.

40,718. And that "later the amount of these fees had to be in accordance with tables approved by Judges of Assize. Since 1848, every new table of fees requires to be approved by the Home Secretary"?—That is so.

40,719. And that "there is a model table in use at the Home Office which has been revised from time to time"?—Yes, my Lord.

40,720. Now could you keep your attention to the one point that interests me, namely, the obtaining by married women of their orders for maintenance, and the enforcing of those orders. Does each county and borough have the same rate of fees for obtaining an order?—Oh, no, my Lord, there is no special fee for obtaining such an order. One has to look at the table of fees and see what would be chargeable on the proceedings that are taken in order to obtain an order. For instance, a fee for issue of summons; a fee for hearing a witness; a fee for making an order; a fee for service of order. Each of those fees might differ.

40,721. In the different counties and boroughs?—Yes.

40,722. Is there no power in the Home Office to require a uniform fee throughout the country?—No, I am afraid not. Each county and each borough has a separate table.

40,723. Have you to approve at the Home Office of those tables?—Yes, we should approve of new tables, but there are some tables in force that have not been approved by the Home Office; in fact, in boroughs I think the majority of tables came into force before 1848.

40,724. And those still exist?—I believe so.

40,725. Therefore, there is in fact diversity of fees chargeable in the police courts both in boroughs and counties throughout the country?—A considerable diversity.

40,726. I was struck by it; that is why I asked your attendance. I think we were told by one of the police magistrates in London that a fee for a woman issuing a summons for a maintenance order was 2*s.*, and on inquiry in the country I was told it was considerably larger than that. Can you tell me what the minimum and maximum are for the mere issue by a woman of a summons to obtain a separation order for maintenance?—I am sorry to say I could not give that, but I should mention that the history of the fees chargeable at the Metropolitan police courts is quite different from the history of the scale of fees at every other court; that is to say, they were never remuneration to clerks for the work done. They were first settled at the end of the 18th century, I suppose, when the courts were first established, though they have been revised since, and the object was to obtain a sufficient revenue to maintain the court. I think it may be said that, though in some particulars a particular fee chargeable at a Metropolitan police court may be higher than a similar fee chargeable at another court, still the total costs payable at the Metropolitan police courts are considerably lower than the average that is chargeable at other courts.

40,727. So I rather gathered. But can you give us as to the issue by a woman of a summons for separation. Can you give us the minimum and the maximum in England for that?—I am afraid I could not. It would depend for one thing on the number of witnesses called.

40,728. No, the issue of the summons?—I beg your pardon, my Lord. I am afraid not, because I do not suppose we have at the Home Office the majority of the tables. I have never seen them.

40,729. Do you know at all what they do run up to for the mere issue of the summons?—I have never seen a case where it was more than 2*s.* 6*d.*, and I should think it is improbable.

40,730. Then as I gather you have no definite powers at present to fix a scale applicable to all the courts?—No, my Lord.

40,731. Do you think it would be an advantage if that were done?—Undoubtedly.

40,732. To make it uniform throughout the country?—I think undoubtedly.

40,733. I quite understand there may be a difference in cost where you have a different number of witnesses; but with regard to the next point, the enforcing of the process by the arrest of the husband—is there any uniformity about fees charged for that?—Under the Police Act, 1890, each police force may submit to the Home Secretary a table of fees chargeable for the performance of certain duties, one of which is the execution of a warrant. A great number of forces have not submitted such a table. A table, when approved, is only in force for five years. A great number of forces having submitted a table, have certainly not submitted one within the last five years. Whether those fees are still charged or not we are not aware at the Home Office; we do not hear.

40,734. Then is there any uniformity when a woman has the order and wants to arrest her husband to enforce it; is there any uniformity with regard to the fee she has to pay?—With regard to the fee payable to the police, I do not think there is a higher fee in any force than 2*s.* 6*d.* chargeable, and I think, in the majority, no fee would be charged.

40,735. No fee at all?—I think it is probable that is so in the majority.

40,736. You mean in some cases there would be a charge of 2*s.* 6*d.*, and in others there would be no charge for enforcing the warrant?—Yes.

40,737. Is that for dealing with the warrant in the district of the police in which it is issued?—Yes. I came away in rather a hurry, and so I did not bring everything I intended to, but I can say that in some boroughs the fee for executing a warrant to enforce a summons is 6*d.* higher outside the borough than within. I think there are a few boroughs like that.

40,738. May I just follow this out. You say, "Since 1877 every clerk to justices has been paid by salary, but he has to collect the fee for the benefit of the county or borough fund." Then, "Fees for executing warrants of arrest can only be charged by the police in accordance with a table not more than five years old, approved by the Home Secretary under section 23 of the Police Act, 1890"?—Yes.

40,739. But that may be settled in many ways?—A great number of police forces do not charge fees at all.

40,740. Some do?—Some do.

40,741. That is the fee paid to get the warrant out?—To get the warrant executed. The police fee is to get the warrant executed.

40,742. To get it put into motion?—Yes.

40,743. Then you go on to say, "The costs of executing warrants stand on a different footing." What does that mean?—Well, if the warrant is executed, say, in the same borough, no costs would be incurred, but if the man is living at the other end of England very considerable cost might be incurred.

40,744. That is another point I want you to tell us a little more about. Is that cost borne by the borough out of which the warrant issues or by the applicant?—There are 190 different forces and it is impossible to make a general statement that would be applicable to all; but so far as the Home Office experience goes the general practice is that it would not be borne by the applicant. Exceptions, however, must be made.

40,745. I was informed that in some counties, the county in which the warrant is taken out charged nothing for executing it, whereas in some they did?—I am not aware of any county which, at the present time, always would charge that cost to the applicant, but I should be quite prepared to hear that there are some counties in which they do it.

40,746. That, again, should be based on a uniform system, should it not?—Yes, but you cannot have, I think, a rigid rule because there must be a certain number of exceptions.

40,747. As, for instance——?—Well, supposing the wife takes out a warrant in Cornwall and her husband is living in Northumberland, and there is only a few shillings owing, it is scarcely reasonable that the ratepayers should bear the expense of bringing him back from Northumberland to Cornwall.

40,748. Why is it necessary to do that?—Because he has to be brought before the bench that issues the warrant.

40,749. I am told that in the county courts (and, perhaps, Judge Tindal Atkinson can help us here), if a plaintiff gets a judgment against a defendant and then proceeds to issue process of execution under the Debtor Act for the purpose of committal to prison and an order is made, the debtor is not brought back to the district where the order was made, but is committed on a re-issue of the committal order in the county court district where he is found. That is one reason why I wanted you to come here, because we are told that the expense to a woman of bringing the man back to her own county was in many cases prohibitive, and I wanted to know why, if that is done in the county courts, it cannot be worked in the police court?—I have very little practical knowledge of the actual administration of the Act, but it all turns on the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and the procedure for enforcing an order under that Act is the same as the procedure under the Bastardy Acts. I think it is the case, that a wife under the Married Women Act, 1895, can apply for a warrant (when she has got her order) at any place where she is residing, and the warrant would be in the usual form requiring the police to bring the defaulter before the justices who issued the warrant. Therefore, if she is living in Cornwall, she applies to the Cornwall magistrates for a warrant in respect of arrears, and the man has to be brought before them.

40,750. I know, but I want to know why that is necessary if he is in default. Why cannot he be locked up in the gaol where he is? In the county court when a man is committed for contempt, I am told they do not bring him back to the court where the order is made, but lock him up in the gaol of——

(Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Except by leave of the judge.

40,750*a*. (Chairman) Well, that is different. They lock him up in the gaol of the district where he is found. You see there is no greater expense then than if he is locked up in his own district?—I think you would get more useful evidence on that point from some one who deals with the actual procedure of the courts; but I see some difficulty in any other procedure. The man, though he is in default, may have very good reasons in the way of extenuation of the default. He may have been out of work or ill.

40,751. All those are equally applicable to the county courts?—I do not know the procedure there.

40,752. The order cannot be made without evidence, and he has notice to attend, and if he does not attend, then the order is made, and it is executed wherever he is?—In the county court I understand a committal order cannot be made until there has been proof that the defendant has or has had means to pay. In the case of the Act of 1895 there is no proof of means necessary before the commitment.

40,753. That is true, but what I want to get at is, do you yourself see any reason why machinery should not be provided so that if a man is ordered to pay by the magistrate he should be able to be locked up in the district where he is, just as much as if he is ordered to pay by the county court judge in which case he is locked up in the district where he is found?—I think before magistrates lock up a man they should always hear if he has any excuse to offer; and, on the other hand, hear if the wife has anything to say in answer to him.

40,754. But so they do in the county court?—Would the wife go up to Northumberland then? I am thinking of a case where an order has been made, say, in Cornwall. The payments have been going on, say, for four or five years; then they cease. She happens to know her husband is up in Northumberland; she goes to the magistrates, and she tells them that he has ceased to make the payments. It would scarcely be fair that they should forthwith be able to issue a commitment, because he may have good reason for not having made the payments. He may have been ill. So at present the practice is she asks them for a warrant. The man is brought before them; she appears, and unless he shows some very good excuse, then the commitment is issued. The commitment is not issued before the man is brought before them.

40,755. I quite understand that, but I want to know why if it is not required and found requisite in the county court it need be found requisite in the magistrates' court.

(Judge Tindal Atkinson.) The creditor can send up an affidavit. Supposing a judgment was given in the county court, and the defendant were to reside in Northumberland, and the plaintiff wants to commit him, he can issue a summons in Northumberland, and send an affidavit of the means of the defendant, and the order is made there. He will not be brought back again to his original court, except by leave of the judge, or unless he tenders to the defendant the whole amount of the expenses of carrying him backwards and forwards.

(Chairman.) The substantial point is, in the county courts, having got the order that a man should pay, you can execute it by committal in another part of the country, and lock him up there.

(Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Yes, that is generally done; I do it in a great number of cases.

40,756. (Chairman.) But the point made was that in these orders before the magistrates, which are very numerous, a woman is in a difficulty if the man moves out of the county, and I want to see if we cannot get over that. I do not see why it is necessary in the case of the magistrates any more than in the county courts. I do not mean necessary now, but necessary in principle; because of course you are bound by your Acts now?—I have no doubt that the procedure under the Act of 1895 might be amended, but I am not prepared at present to say in what way it actually should be.

40,757. That is another matter, but you agree at present that in order to enforce the order obtained by the women they must get the men brought before the bench in their own district?—In the district where they have applied.

40,758. And whether that can be remedied at present you have not fully considered?—You might get better evidence from someone who is actually engaged in that matter.

40,759. Now as a fact there are counties in which these expenses of bringing the men have to be borne by the applicant before the applicant can bring him?—I do not know of any, but I think there may be. I have made inquiries of a certain number of forces, and from the answers, some of them evidently have had no cases bearing on the question for some time. One or two of them say that the rule is not to charge the applicants; and the impression left on one's mind from the official papers at the Home Office, and from some special private inquiries I have made, is that the general rule is that no woman should be prevented from enforcing the order through poverty. From one borough—the only borough that gives a quite positive and clear answer—the answer was, as though it were the general rule: Yes, we always require her to guarantee the expenses, and if she cannot, we refer her to the poor law guardians. They left it there. What the poor law guardians do was not explained.

40,760. Would your view be that enforcing these orders by women who cannot provide any means at all should be a charge on the rates?—As a general rule, no doubt, I think so. That is done by the Metropolitan Police.

40,761. I think that is all you can tell us about that. Now you have also sent in some additional notes in connection with the prisoners' position with regard to divorce. Are you desirous of giving evidence about that?—I do not think I have any evidence to give on that subject. The subject very rarely comes up in the petitions or in any official papers that I have to do with.

40,762. You get, I daresay, a great many matters about prisoners brought before you?—Thousands.

40,763. But you do not get the divorce question?—Very rarely.

40,764. Have you anything you wish to say about that part of the matter?—I would only say this for what it is worth, I think the fact that amongst these many thousands of communications we see so little trace of difficulty arising through people being sent to prison for long terms, suggests that there is not a very urgent or widespread demand for an amendment of the law.

40,765. They do not, I suppose, come to you for the purpose of getting divorce. They want to get the prisoner free, or something of that kind?—Well, they write long rambling letters about a variety of matters.

40,766. You have made some mention in your additional notes about the position of women before the law as compared with her husband. I suppose those are based on the present position of the law?—They are one or two remarks that have occurred to me, but I am not in a position to give actual evidence on the subject.

40,767. (Mr. Brierley.) Just one question. In the table of fees which you say is approved by the Home Secretary under the Police Act, that does not exhaust the amount of fees that the wife has to pay on obtaining her warrant, does it?—The fees that are strictly chargeable are, first the justices' clerk's fees for obtaining it, and then ——

40,768. Yes, there are also those for her to pay, are there not?—Yes.

40,769. In addition to the fee payable under the Police Act, do you know about how much that fee generally is upon an average—the fee of the clerk to the justices for the warrant?—One shilling or two shillings. Our model table says 1s.

40,770. I am afraid in some cases it is rather more?—I have no doubt it is.

40,771. I can tell you of a case where it is half-a-crown, for instance?—Yes.

40,772. Do you know the limits. From one shilling to what?—As I said to the Chairman, the highest I can remember having seen is half-a-crown, and I may say whenever the Home Office is ——

40,773. I am afraid in the court I know of it is half-a-crown.

(Chairman.) Would you ask him if that is uniform?

40,774. (Mr. Brierley.) That belongs to the class of fees that you say is not uniform—namely, the justices' clerk's fees?—Yes.

40,775. I understand that these fees of the clerks to the justices are quite diverse; they are by no means uniform throughout the country?—No, but I think probably you may say this, that if you took all the boroughs that existed in 1834—including Birmingham—probably all of them, or the great majority of them, have a table which was recommended by Lord John Russell, I think, in 1838, or some date like that, and when commissions of the peace are issued to new boroughs we almost invariably now insist on their adopting our model table, and I think one may roughly say that any tables that have been approved during the last 30 years—or most of them—are fairly uniform.

40,776. Yes, no doubt those that have been approved during the last 30 years, but I suppose a large number of petty sessional divisions have tables of fees that date from considerably before that time, have they not?—I do not think so. One thing, there is not a separate table for the petty sessional divisions; the table is approved for the county or the borough. I do not think there are more than three or four counties that have as old a of fees as many boroughs have.

40,777. However that may be, the fee is not absolutely uniform for obtaining the warrant, payable to the clerks to the justices. Then in addition to that you have the fee payable to the police for executing the warrant?—Yes, there may be that fee.

40,778. That, in most cases, has been approved by the Home Secretary. In a great many cases I should say it has been approved by the Home Secretary, as you have said?—Legally it cannot be enforced unless it has been approved by the Home Secretary within five years.

40,779. I am afraid it has been enforced as a matter of fact, although the table has been approved at a rather earlier date than five years ago. Again, I have before me a table of fees authorised by the Home Secretary in 1902, which is still in force.

(Chairman.) For your district?

(Mr. Brierley.) Yes, for the city of Manchester.

(Chairman.) What is that?

40,780. (Mr. Brierley.) "In respect of the execution "of any warrant where the cause of complaint has "arisen within the borough there is a fee of one "shilling. Fee for the execution of every other "warrant, one shilling and sixpence." That is for executing warrants sent from other districts, is it not?—That is so, I should think.

40,781. That is still enforced though approved in 1902?—Still enforced?

40,782. The fees are still demanded, though possibly they are not legally demanded?—I am not sure whether in strict law that is not an offence called extortion.

40,783. Possibly. However, that is what the amount of fees come to on the execution of the warrant?—Yes.

40,784. Now, with regard to what you call the costs. I suppose they are really the railway fares in most cases?—Yes, I suppose so.

40,785. It would be generally three railway fares and something over if the officer goes to the place where the husband is and back again; the return fare for the officer and the single one for the husband, and subsistence allowance for the officer if he has to spend a night away?—I suppose those would be the expenses. There might also be a fee for getting the warrant endorsed.

40,786. I suppose the view of the Home Secretary is that the police have a discretion as to whether they will demand those expenses or not?—Yes, it is inevitable that they should; even in a case of a warrant for felony (when there is a much more stringent duty on the police to arrest) we are advised that the police have to exercise their discretion.

40,787. But whether as a matter of practice some chief constables send their officers for the husband, say, in the case in question or not. It is entirely within his discretion whether he will do so or not without receiving his expenses beforehand?—Yes. It is his duty to use his discretion reasonably, and we should say it is his duty not to allow a warrant to remain unenforced simply because the woman who has taken it out is poor. We should say he was failing in his duty, I think, if that were the result.

40,788. But I thought you said there were cases where he ought not to execute the warrant?—There are some, but what I meant to suggest was that the Home Office view is it should not remain unexecuted simply because the woman is poor. I could give a case which one chief constable mentioned to me where everyone would agree it should not be done at the expense of the rates. It was a case where the woman obtained an order against her husband. For a good number of years it was enforced. She then began to lead an immoral life, and did not enforce it. After a little time she heard that her husband was living with another woman; that so much infuriated her that she at once took out a warrant, went to the police and asked them to enforce it. The police in that case said, "Well, you must guarantee expenses." I think it would be agreed that in that case they exercised their discretion rightly.

40,789. Yes, I do not suggest they do not exercise their discretion quite rightly; but as a matter of fact it is within the discretion of the chief constable whether he will execute the warrant or not without having his expenses guaranteed?—Outside the jurisdiction for which he acts.

40,790. I do not know what the view is as to the legal obligation of the constable. The warrant is issued to the constable in the district?—Yes.

40,791. And they are bound to execute the warrant in the district?—Yes.

40,792. Without asking costs from anybody, except such as they are allowed to do under the table of fees under the Police Act?—Precisely.

40,793. But the whole question arises when they have to execute it outside their district, and as to that they have a discretion?—Yes.

40,794. You have mentioned some cases where the chief constable has declined to execute the warrant where the woman is very poor, and says he refers her to the poor law guardians?—That was one borough I heard of.

40,795. You do not know what the poor law guardians do in that case?—I only got that answer a day or two ago, and I do not know quite what it means. It may mean that the poor law guardians give outdoor relief, or it may be when he says "We do this" that he only means "We have done this in a few cases lately."

40,796. You do not suggest that the poor law guardians pay for the expenses of the execution of a warrant, do you?—I cannot see how they should unless they might do it in the case of a woman who is getting outdoor relief already.

40,797. I only wanted to know the existing practice. With regard to the possibilities of executing a warrant without bringing the man, you do not wish to express an opinion about that?—I do not know enough of the county court practice.

40,798. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I wanted to ask you this on a question Lord Gorell put, as to whether the practice could not be simplified as to enforcing warrants. We are all anxious to find some way of dealing with enforcing separation orders. I gather you feel some difficulty in the proposal that in the case you put about Cornwall and Northumberland, in the process for committal taking place in Northumberland when the separation order has been made in Cornwall?—I do not quite see, speaking with very little knowledge of the subject, how magistrates could take the responsibility of sending a man to prison for what is after all a debt, unless they had heard both what he had to say and what his wife had to say. That is the difficulty that occurs to me.

40,799. It would not work that the warrant should issue automatically by any authority. There must be something in the nature of an application when somebody must exercise the discretion as to whether the warrant should issue or not?—You mean a warrant of committal.

40,800. Yes?—Certainly I should think so.

40,801. I suppose there is a difficulty in that application being made to a different tribunal from the tribunal which made the separation order?—There is that difficulty. Of course I believe part of the difficulty arises from the fact that justices make an order which may be enforced I suppose for as long as thirty or forty years ago.

40,802. That is an additional difficulty. Now, let us take an ordinary case. Here is a man living in the petty sessional area, if you like in Northumberland (to keep to the counties you have mentioned), and there is an order for committal in Cornwall, and then there is a difficulty as to who is in default. What are the magistrates to do? Is the man to be summoned before them to show cause why he should not be committed. What is the procedure? I do not mean the precise procedure, but in general, what kind of step is to be taken. That is my difficulty. I do not see how it is going to work.

40,803. (Chairman.) Has not he got to be served with the application for the warrant?—No.

40,803*a*. (Chairman.) For the warrant?—Yes.

40,804. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) But supposing the law is altered and he is served with a notice of application for the warrant. That comes before the petty sessional court who know nothing about the case—it was not made in their part of England even; is it likely that an application which in the Chancery courts I am more familiar with would be called a motion to commit, is it likely that that would be dealt with satisfactorily in the absence of the woman—assuming it is the man being committed—and in a district which has no seizin of the matter generally—no knowledge of the matter, I mean?—It does not seem as if it would be satisfactory, but I am not sure if I quite understand your suggestion; but another objection occurs to me far stronger, and that is that if you are going to serve a man with a notice that a warrant of arrest is going to be applied for, in a large proportion of cases it will not be much good to take out that warrant of arrest.

40,805. He will go, I quite follow; then another difficulty; could that be properly dealt with in the absence of the woman, suppose his answer is: "She "has committed adultery, and I am no more liable to "pay." Who is to deal with it unless you bring the woman up to Northumberland? — That particular defence would be, strictly speaking, no defence. I believe until he has the order set aside he is still liable to pay.

40,806. Oh yes, I see. Though it might not be in strictness, it would in any court which had any discretion in the matter have a good deal of effect, would it not?—It ought to. It is still a moot question whether they have got any discretion about committing to prison; but at all events they could commit that man for a single day, anyway.

40,807. (Sir William Anson.) Do you withhold approval from tables that do not correspond with the model table?—Under the Act, if once a local authority has submitted a table for approval the Secretary of State has power to alter it and approve it as altered. That we wish, of course, to avoid, if possible, and we usually try to persuade the local authority that our model table is really better than the one they have submitted; we put it from the point of view that as things are at present it may not be an ideal table, but uniformity is desirable.

40,808. And if they do not follow that counsel of perfection, what happens?—Well, we get very few tables before us. It so happens a table came up before me yesterday, and I am not sure what the Secretary of State will do about it.

40,809. There is a discrepancy between one table and another in different parts of the country?—There is.

40,810. Do you ever call the attention of the persons responsible to these differences?—Well, there is one county where we tried very hard. They came up to the Home Office—I will not mention the county—and we tried very hard to get them to submit a table to the Home Secretary for approval; but up to now they have refused to do so.

40,811. Are not they bound to submit the table for approval?—No, because they have one that is approved. It only so happened that, as to the particular county I am thinking of, we had a good number of complaints. It is a very old table dating back to 1840 or thereabouts.

40,812. Then your table is refused from time to time?—Yes.

40,813. But the local authorities are not bound to bring their table in correspondence with yours?—No.

40,814. And if they have an approved table you have no hold on them?—No.

40,815. You said you had a great many petitions pass through your hands. Is that from prisoners only or from friends of prisoners?—I think more from prisoners than the friends of prisoners, but thousands of both.

40,816. Then, if there was any general desire for divorce on the ground of imprisonment, I suppose you would come across it in these petitions?—Well, one does not like to put an argument from absence too strongly, but I think it is probable one would have heard more of it.

40,817. And you never have, or hardly ever?—Scarcely ever.

40,818. (Mr. Spender.) You said just now you were not quite certain what the Secretary of State would do in a particular case. Can you tell us what he could do?—If any table of fees is submitted to him in the statutory form, and signed by the right people, he can either approve the table as submitted or alter it as he thinks fit and approve the altered table.

40,819. And if he alters the table, can it be enforced on the locality?—Yes, the Act says he may alter a table and approve it for that borough or county.

40,820. Then, as a matter of fact, the Secretary of State already has these powers, and he could if he chose make a uniform table?—No, only when a table has been submitted to him in the statutory form.

40,821. It is only when a local authority has of its own accord submitted a table?—Yes.

40,822. In those cases the Home Secretary can alter it and enforce the alteration?—Yes.

40,823. (Chairman.) Supposing a woman had got a separation deed under which she was to get 15*s.* a week and her husband will not pay, and she goes to the county court and gets a judgment requiring him to pay 15*s.* a week; then, suppose she goes to the magistrates and gets an order for 15*s.* a week, her position in respect of what she has to get is exactly the same—in one case under a judgment, and in the other case under an order. So far we agree?—Yes, I suppose that is so.

40,824. Then, the next step is to enforce it. In the county court, if the man has not paid, she serves through the county court bailiff of the district where the man is a notice of application to commit for contempt, and on that application coming on the judge commits or not, according to whether it is a proper case. That is right, is it not? If the man does not turn up, he has had the opportunity to; and if he comes of course it is heard, but whichever it is, the order to commit is then placed in the hands either of the bailiff of the district where the order is made if the man is there, or sent to the bailiff of the district where the man is; and in that case he is locked up in the prison of the district where he is. That is how a claim for 15*s.* a week under a deed is made. In the magistrate's case the woman applies ex-parte for a warrant of arrest?—Yes.

40,825. And he is brought up on that warrant to say if he has an answer or not—for instance, whether he has paid it?—Yes.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I thought he was not brought up.

40,826. (Chairman.) Yes, he is brought up on the warrant. That is the difficulty I want to get rid of. Do you see any reason why he should not be treated in the same way precisely by the magistrate as by the county courts?—These things come before the Home Office in the most casual way, so I have great hesitation in expressing an opinion; but, as I understand it, the county court procedure gives the husband—the defaulter—a chance of absconding; that is to say, a notice is sent to him. My impression is that the difference between the class of people on whom orders are made by justices, and the class of people who are parties to a separation deed, would be considerable. In the case of a very large number of the persons on whom these magisterial orders are made you will not get any money out of them unless you arrest them without notice.

40,827. The only point of difference then is the possibility of absconding, which, of course, is a very likely thing?—Well, that struck me. I have not thought the subject over. That is the first thing that struck me—that it would give the defaulter that chance.

40,828. But, apart from that, is there any reason that you can see why there should not be a capacity to lock up the man at the place where he is?—No.

40,829. Instead of bringing him at the expense of the rates from one part of the country to the other, when he possibly does not dispute the debt?—No, I cannot see any reason.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much indeed for the trouble you have taken, and for the evidence you have put before us.*

* The following table was subsequently supplied by the witness showing the number of prisoners sentenced as habitual criminals under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1908, up to the 15th May 1911:—

FIFTIETH DAY.

Wednesday, December 7th, 1910.

Present:

The Right Hon. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The Lady Frances Balfour.
Sir Frederick Treves, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir Lewis Dibdin, D.C.L.
Edgar Brierley, Esq.
J. A. Spender, Esq.
The Hon. Henry Gorell Barnes, Secretary.

Mr. John Astley Bloxam called and examined (in camera).

40,830. (Chairman.) You are an F.R.C.S., a J.P., Consulting Surgeon to the Charing Cross Hospital and the Lock Hospital, and late Assistant-Surgeon to the West London Hospital?—Yes.

40,831. You have been good enough to attend to answer any questions which might be suggested to us on the questions relating to venereal disease as affecting the subjects on which we are inquiring?—Quite so.

40,832. Will you allow me to suggest that Sir Frederick Treves, who is so much more competent than I am to put questions on this subject, should ask you the questions which might be relevant?—I am quite agreeable.

40,833. (Sir Frederick Treves.) How long have you been connected with the Lock Hospital?—Over 30 years.

40,834. During that time you must have seen an enormous number of cases. Have you any notion of the number of cases of syphilis you have seen in hospitals?—I know I have examined 90,000 women alone. Of course that is not including what I have seen also in the Service, when I was in the Army.

40,835. In the Horse Guards?—Yes, and also what I have seen privately.

40,836. Would you speak of syphilis as a prevalent disease?—Of course it is a disease, what we term as belonging to the order of filth diseases, and it is prevalent, but how prevalent in this country one is unable to state, because there has been no real notification of the disease, and although it is prevalent, yet one would like to say that it is not quite so prevalent as I think the public imagine. I would like also to say that I am quite convinced that it is less prevalent than it was in years gone by. I am also prepared to say that it is less deleterious in its forms than it was in years gone by.

40,837. On that point will you tell the Commission your impression of the effects of syphilis, not only on the person in whom the disease develops, but on the progeny?—Syphilis is distinctly destructive of human life. In some cases rapidly so, but our evidence is in museums, and also other evidences point to the fact that it has a distinct effect on the rate of life in this country existing.

40,838. From an insurance point of view, you mean?—Yes. Syphilis also has a distinct effect on the early origin of life, I mean to say that it is a cause not of sterility but of abortion and early fœtal death; hence it is one of the great causes of prevention of over-population.

40,839. What is the effect upon the child of syphilitic parents?—When the child lives, its life is frequently a burdensome one, inasmuch as it is afflicted with distinct lesions, and those lesions, which may be prominent even early after birth, may be delayed till a later time of life so as to produce defective sight and also forms of visceral disease.

40,840. The child is very often deformed in the matter of the nose and skull?—Yes.

40,841. The contagiousness of syphilis is very marked?—Yes, distinctly so; it is a disease which is obtained by contact with the organism which produces it.

40,842. And a very slight contact suffices?—There must be some breach of surface for that organism to enter into the constitution.

40,843. The organism is the spirochœta pallida?—Yes.

40,844. That enters in all lesions?—Yes, even in what is termed the gummy or tertiary forms; it is very difficult to separate tertiary from secondary, and secondary even from primary. They are all the results of inflammatory processes set up by this organism which is known by the term spirochœta pallida.

40,845. The demonstration of syphilis by the discovery of the spirochæta pallida presents no difficulty. If you find the spirochæta pallida the matter is at an end?—Yes, if you find the spirochæte you may be certain that it is syphilis. We have other reactions.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Wassermann test, if it produces a positive result, is distinctive of the patient being the victim of syphilis.

40,846. The Wassermann test is reliable in 90 to 98 per cent. of all cases?—Yes, 98 per cent.; I think that is quoted.

40,847. As far as this Commission is concerned you can assure them that there is no difficulty in identifying and diagnosing a case of syphilis, either by the discovery of the spirochæte or by the Wassermann reaction?—None.

40,848. The incubation stage of this disease is of what period?—It varies; I should say the average is 14 to 21 days.

40,849. The secondary period of the disease, the period of extreme contagiousness, lasts how long?—I should say if a person has had a suspicious intercourse and no sequelæ follow, he might be safe after 90 to 100 days.

40,850. How long would you consider that the contagiousness of syphilis in a marked degree exists; in other words, if a patient came to you with syphilis and wished to be married, how long would he have to wait before he could be free to do so?—I should say he must undergo a treatment. I have always recommended a continuous treatment for two years, and then I have always made provision, since the Wassermann test has come out, that he should have his blood examined to see if it gave a positive or a negative result. If it gave a positive result it is necessary for him to undergo a still further course; if it gave a negative result, for all practical purposes, at least as far as we could possibly foresee, we may consider him fit and fairly capable of being married.

40,851. An individual who marries within two years of acquiring syphilis is liable to communicate the disease to the person he marries?—Yes. Although the evidence now is coming that the treatment of syphilis is becoming so much improved that I think we may put it that two years would be a safe interval; but we could not speak of it as a certainty, because the curious fact remains in syphilis that the organism escapes into the tissues generally after it has been in the blood a certain time, and then the organism seems to be locked up either by something surrounding it, or else it remains in a dormant state until, unfortunately, certain conditions arise, such as privation or exposure, or defective general health, and then this organism seems to be capable of escaping into the blood again and giving rise to symptoms.

40,852. Will you put aside exceptional cases and consider it generally?—Taking a broad view, I should say two years and a negative result after a Wassermann reaction.

40,853. Supposing that syphilis unrevealed were made a ground for nullity of marriage, you could say that marriage carried out within two years of the inoculation should come within that rule?—Yes.

40,854. I suppose such a law, from your point of view, would be a great deterrent if a man knew, in addition to the penalties of this disease, he was unable to marry for a period of two years?—Certainly. I think it would be a great thing if you could make it so that a man should not marry unless he has had two years' treatment.

40,855. Anyhow, if a man knowing that he had syphilis were to marry within two years, and not reveal the fact, he would be liable to communicate the disease. That would not be an unreasonable ground for the nullity of that marriage?—No.

40,856. And would be a great deterrent?—Yes.

40,857. The next point is a very important one: syphilis may be acquired innocently or, say, accidentally, by tattooing for example?—Yes.

40,858. By dentist's forceps, by pipes, by drinking from glasses, by a blow cutting the skin. Is it possible, in your experience, to readily exclude those cases?—No, it is not possible to exclude them, but they are so few that really they hardly need be seriously discussed, I think.

40,859. The point has been noted that whether syphilis be acquired innocently or not, the healthy spouse may be inoculated all the same?—Yes.

40,860. Two witnesses have maintained that syphilis per se should be a ground for divorce, I take it that the sore produced by accidental inoculation is usually on a visible part of the body—the face or the hands?—Yes.

40,861. In your experience you practically have no difficulty in isolating these cases?—Not the slightest. I have never seen any difficulty occur, but they are so rare.

40,862. Still, should they occur, there would be no practical difficulty, in your mind, in identifying them?—No, because almost always there is a scar which can be proved as a test to be able afterwards to satisfy evidence.

40,863. The sore being visible, is immediately noticed and, no doubt, immediately treated?—Yes.

40,864. This is another important point. You have, I take it, known of cases of men or women who have had syphilis and not been cognisant of the fact?—Yes, many.

40,865. The manifestations need not be so gross as to attract the attention, say of an uneducated person?—Yes.

40,866. Would you say it is possible for a man or a woman to communicate syphilis and honestly be unconscious of it?—I think in the male it is not so probable, but in the female I think it is.

40,867. You would not deny this, that it is possible for a male to communicate syphilis to a female and be unconscious of the fact he had done so, and, in fact, be unaware that he had syphilis?—Yes, it is possible, but it is not so probable.

40,868. With regard to the woman it is more probable?—It is more probable that she might communicate it without being aware that she had syphilis.

40,869. The Commission would like to know this. The treatment now in vogue—Ehrlich's—carries with it some possibility of syphilis being curable?—I have great hopes that syphilis in this country, by improved treatment, by knowledge given generally to people of both sexes, could be totally eradicated, the same as any other filth disease, such as rabies. There is every evidence now to make one believe that syphilis is more amenable to the treatment advised as recommended now. I have no hesitation in saying that great strides have been made, and I foresee it could be practically carried out, that by providing more general information, not by that concealment which false—what shall I say—modesty, which is so common. If only young men were taught to regulate themselves and see the importance of early treatment, and see the importance of regular and persistent treatment, and if women also were taught in some way to regulate themselves and to know the dangers to which they exposed themselves when submitting to casual intercourse, I have little doubt that considerable improvement, even in the diminution of syphilis, would take place in this country.

40,870. And apart from that what is your opinion?—I am by no means a pessimist.

40,871. This specific measure of Ehrlich as now practised carries with it a prospect of a cure for syphilis?—Yes.

40,872. That is undoubted?—Yes.

40,873. Consequently any kind of legislation based on syphilis as we knew it six months ago might have to be modified by the results of this new treatment by Ehrlich?—I do not think it could be possible to make any legislation with regard to the prevention of syphilis.

40,874. I am speaking of it more as a ground of nullity of marriage, syphilis of two years' duration. If Ehrlich's method has been applied and a man is apparently cured and the Wassermann reaction is nil, you cannot say that man has syphilis, especially if you cannot find the spirochæte in his blood?—No.

40,875. With regard to gonorrhœa, you have, of course, seen cases by thousands?—Yes, I have seen numbers.

40,876. Is that a very distressing malady?—It is very prevalent; I do not know that it is much more prevalent than syphilis. One would have thought it was, but of late years there has been a very considerable diminution even of gonorrhœa; the habits of cleanliness, and the use of disinfectant by injections by both sexes, largely in women, has diminished certainly the frequency of gonorrhœa that one sees.

40,877. Does that apply both to town and country, or do you distinguish between town and country?—I distinguish, because in the country the education, or the cleanliness education, has not extended so well as it has in towns. The women of towns where they naturally have to more or less obtain their livelihood by their sanitary condition are more careful in these days to adopt measures which prevent the frequency of gonorrhœa.

40,878. You therefore expect to get the worst cases of gonorrhœa from the country?—Yes. Gonorrhœa is a disease which affects by inflammation the structures which it attacks, and produces lesions which are inimical to the mechanical foundation of the individual.

40,879. In other words, it may produce sterility both in women and men?—Yes.

40,880. And more often in women than in men?—Yes.

40,881. Anyhow, it is a common cause of sterility in women?—It is the most common cause, and the reason why the prostitute is so rarely a mother is because of the obliteration of the tubes, and of uterine irritation.

40,882. As far as women are concerned it is apt to produce inflammation of the tubes, what we call pelvic peritonitis, and not only intense distress, but an illness that may last that woman her lifetime?—Yes. A woman may have pyo-salpinx and salpingitis for years and years, and carry the organisms of gonorrhœa over a very considerable time. She cannot be cured.

40,883. Her life is rendered hopeless and miserable?—Yes.

40,884. Moreover the gonococcus, the organism of gonorrhœa, is so easily conveyed; it may be conveyed to the eye and cause blindness, and troubles of that sort?—Yes. Frequently women become pregnant and have a child, and yet have the gonococcus in the vagina, and when the child is born the child has what we call infantile ophthalmia, and if that is not carefully treated sloughing of the cornea and total blindness may ensue.

40,885. It may lead in women to lifelong illness and infinite distress?—Yes.

40,886. It presents itself as a frequent cause of sterility, and may lead to incidental troubles such as blindness in her child, and so on?—I have seen gonorrhœa cause death in women and death in men on many occasions. I may say that I have seen gonorrhœa occur in males and within six months death. It is destructive. it creates suppuration of the prostate, perforation of the rectum, and I have seen it extend into the kidney and form an abscess around the kidney, as you have known, and the whole paraphernalia.

40,887. (Chairman.) I would like to get a few matters which occur to me in consequence of the questions you have been asked. First of all, both these diseases you have been asked about are extensively prevalent both in men and women?—Yes.

40,888. The extent through the whole country must be a matter of guesswork?—Yes, but they are prevalent. We know the statistics of what they are in the Army, and that gives us some idea as to what they might be amongst the public, but I should say they were certainly less than the Army generally.

40,889. Could you give me the figures for the Army at any time?—I believe that the statistics of venereal disease at this present moment have been reduced down to 20 per 1,000.

40,890. At a given time?—Yes, it has been as high as 160, I believe.

40,891. How is that percentage divided between the two complaints?—Unfortunately there is not a distinction. They have been returns of the total venereal disease. From my own experience I would say this, that in a regiment like my own, which consists of 406 men, the Blues—I was in the Service when the Contagious Disease Act was in force—we had 100 admissions a year at Knightsbridge as a rule, and Albany Street; when we went to Windsor, where the Contagious Diseases Act was in force, it fell to 25. It was very funny. A quarter of the regiment seemed to have been admitted into the hospital at Albany Street, or there were one-quarter of admissions for venereal and only 25 were admitted at Windsor.

40,892. That is the total?—Yes.

40,893. Is there anything which shows the difference in figures between the two diseases?—I think that gonorrhœa was larger.

40,894. We have only had those two diseases mentioned. In the course of my own experience in court I have heard others mentioned. Are there any other diseases of a venereal kind which are in the same kind of category as either of those two?—Yes. We have local soring, what we call contagious soring, a sore which is not followed by sequelæ, a sore that is contracted by contact, which spreads by contact, and goes on spreading unless destroyed.

40,895. Would that be in the same category in the sense it is communicable to the other side?—Yes.

40,896. And to children?—No. It is not an infective disease; it does not affect the constitution. It is purely local.

40,897. It affects the other party, and may be acquired?—Yes.

40,898. Is that painful, and has it any bad effects?—It is almost always followed by the suppuration of glands in the groin.

40,899. Does it affect sterility?—No; but it is very destructive of tissue, and therefore it may prevent it. I have seen it produce terrible disfigurement and deformity.

40,900. Would you categorise it for such purposes with the other two?—I would classify it as a separate and distinct disease.

40,901. I quite agree that it is a separate and distinct disease, but——?—It must come in amongst the category of dirt diseases—a venereal disease.

40,902. It would be on the same footing for the purpose of legislation?—Quite.

40,903. Does that exhaust the diseases that are worth mentioning?—I think so. I think that exhausts all the venereal diseases.

40,904. Have you considered whether notification is a practical matter?—Yes, I have considered that very seriously. I do not think it is at all practicable. It is impossible, because it would be exceedingly difficult, and it would also open a field for all kinds of blackmailing, I think, and a terrible condition of things. I do not think it is possible. It would so interfere with the liberty of the subject as at present understood that I think it is absolutely impossible by any legislative proceeding.

40,905. You could not put it on any footing like those diseases which are at present notifiable by statute?—No, it would become so inquisitorial that it could not be possible.

40,906. You look rather to an improvement in the advance of medical science and the advance of morality, I take it?—Yes, and also in knowledge.

40,907. I was rather including that in medical science?—Although it is a terrible thing to do, yet I think these subjects are not sufficiently discussed. I mean young men are not sufficiently aware of the danger. Many a young man of strong health and vigour has a natural instinct to produce himself, or to reproduce himself. It is the order of the whole animal kingdom, and man cannot be separated from that order in his position, although we may try to do it; unfortunately it exists, and it is only, I think, by drawing the attention of young men and young women to it, and by proper systematic education, that we shall be able to touch the subject.

40,908. I should like to ask this, perhaps only as a matter of curiosity. What is the origin of those two diseases?—Of course, syphilis has been supposed to have been introduced into this country from America at the time of Columbus, by the Spaniards; that is the generally accepted idea, somewhere about 1490 or 1500.

40,909. I was not thinking of its introduction, but of its origin amongst man, its foundation amongst the human being. How did it get in at all?—Dirt, I should think. It is a filth disease.

40,910. It is a living germ?—Yes.

40,911. Where has that originally been supposed to come from?—I think no one can tell that.

40,912. There is nothing corresponding with this class of thing amongst animals?—No, but there is a disease very much like it, which we cannot distinguish sometimes, and gives a reaction with Wassermann, called "yaws."

40,913. I only wanted to know if there was any real knowledge on that subject. Would you view this with favour, that if a party to a marriage was aware of the fact that they were suffering from a communicable venereal disease at the time of marriage and kept that back from the other party to the marriage, that other party might have a right to obtain a decree of nullity?—Yes.

40,914. You think that would be to the interest of the party and possibly of the children, too?—Certainly.

40,915. And it would not be too severe a penalty on the person who had concealed it?—No.

40,916. It has been suggested by Sir Lewis Dibdin that I should ask you whether that would be rightly a case for permitting the application of such a principle, although the disease had not, in fact, been communicated at the time of discovery?—No, I think you ought to have the fact that it has been communicated.

40,917. Why would that necessarily be so, because suppose it were discovered in the interval between the actual marriage and any time of intercourse that there had been the deception and the state of the disease, why should not the applicant be able to say, "I am "not going to run these risks: I ask for a nullity: "you kept it back," just as much, in fact, as if they had had intercourse and acquired the disease?—I do not quite gather what you mean.

40,918. There are two different cases. One is where the disease is existing at the time of marriage and kept back and communicated after the marriage to an innocent person?—I think that person should be able to get a divorce.

40,919. Or a decree of nullity?—Yes.

40,920. Take the other class of case, where the disease exists, is known to exist, and concealed, but the person who might complain was fortunate enough to discover it before an act of intercourse?—I think the nullity should be given.

40,921. It is exactly the same case?—Yes. I did not quite gather that.

40,922. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) There is one more case, namely, where intercourse had taken place, probably in most cases it would, but in fact the innocent party had not been infected?—I think the person is entitled to a nullity.

40,923. (Chairman.) That is because there is the risk still to run?—The person would run the risk again.

40,924. Suppose such cases as I have put of discovery shortly after marriage, how long in common run would either of these diseases be probable in duration, assuming they were existing in a communicable state at the time of marriage?—Two years we put for syphilis.

40,925. Supposing it existed at the time of marriage, how long is it possible and how long normally possible that that will continue in the case of syphilis?—I should say after two years the intercourse may take place, provided there is proper treatment. I have had many cases of this, unfortunately. Things occur so suddenly, and I have had men who have been engaged and unfortunately through some stupid affair they have run the risk within a few weeks of their marriage, and even within a week of their marriage they have come to me suffering with the evidences of primary disease, and they are going to be married in a week. Those, of course, have been very distressing cases for you as a medical man to meet, and I have always considered my duty was to at once inform the man of his condition and to point out to him that it was his duty to inform the relatives of the lady whom he was to marry; and then those people have met together and discussed the question, and in many cases the marriage ceremony has been actually performed, but the consummation of the marriage itself has not taken place for two years, until the case has been treated and the test has been satisfactory; and then, as far as my experience goes, I have not seen any cause up to the present moment of regretting that such a proceeding took place.

40,926. Two years you have spoken of with regard to syphilis; but take the other cases of gonorrhœa?—Then, of course, you can only do that by a complete cessation of all signs and the microscopical evidence of the gonococcus not being present.

40,927. How long may that normally be considered to be?—That is a very difficult point to say, it is very uncertain. I have known the gonococcus to exist in the urethra of the male for two years, and I have known it disappear completely, even when the urine has been of course most carefully examined daily for the gonococcus, in six to eight weeks.

40,928. Have you known it longer than two years?—No. I have never personally had a case go longer than two years, but I can understand in the female that it could exist for years.

40,929. Do those general considerations apply to the other disease, the sores which you have mentioned?—No, not the local spreading sore.

40,930. Would you apply the same principles of nullity to those?—I would say certainly if you could prove that a man had had gonorrhœa shortly before his marriage.

40,931. I have passed from that. You mentioned a third complaint?—The sore.

(Sir Frederick Treves.) The soft chancre.

40,932. (Chairman.) Is that a durable matter, too?—No; it generally is curable within a few weeks.

40,933. Would you apply the same principle of nullity to that if kept back?—Certainly.

40,934. You would also say this, that if that principle were applied it would tend to check the possibility of immorality which would affect marriage?—Yes.

40,935. That would be an advantage both to the woman or man, as the case might be, and to the children?—Perfectly so.

40,936. Even though those diseases became, after two or three years or whatever the time might be, curable with proper treatment?—Yes.

40,937. You would give the wronged party, if I may use the term, the right to say, "I do not hold to this"?—Yes, I would. Of course, in these days I believe even now syphilis communicated is cruelty to the woman, is it not?

40,938. If known; but it is not always known that it will be communicated?—Supposing a woman had syphilis given to her by her husband, it is admitted as cruelty, and also as evidence of adultery.

40,939. As regards cruelty, it will require him to have reasonable ground for knowing that he might communicate it. It must be something wilful?—Yes.

40,940. It would not be necessary that he should know it for proof of adultery. It would be the fact which would speak for itself. Does your experience, which is enormous, enable you to give one any notion of the number of prostitutes in the country?—No, I could not say. I should think it is impossible to give any data.

40,941. It is very large?—Yes.

40,942. I suppose in your experience you see a good many of them in the hospitals?—Yes. Of course, it is largely them that we see. There is one notable fact I think I should mention, and that is since the Aliens Act has come in there has been a distinct diminution of severity of syphilis here, and we have not had at the Lock Hospital so many aliens as there used to be. In the old days it was common enough for a woman to have come over here and to be brought to the Lock Hospital after she had been in this country only about a week.

40,943. Coming with the disease?—Yes.

40,944. Do you mean that it is probably more prevalent on the Continent?—No; but they get turned out and they cannot carry on their profession.

40,945. The reason why I wanted to ask you upon that is this. Probably you have seen the point in the Press that has been put before us, that one of the reasons why women might be placed on the same footing as men as regards divorce is that the single act of intercourse on the part of a man with an improper woman may produce a state of disease, and that that therefore should justify a wife, if she chose, in claiming it as ground of divorce, though only one single act?—Yes. I do not mean to say that one single act of intercourse with another woman should be ground for divorce unless venereal disease has thereby been contracted.

40,946. As distinguished from what has been termed habitual and continual intercourse with some other woman?—Yes.

40,947. Is it your experience that these cases of disease do come from single acts of intercourse?—Yes.

40,948. There is a real risk of that in the country?—Yes.

40,949. In your large experience have you come across a number of people, either in the hospitals or in private practice, who are respectable women who have been infected?—Yes.

40,950. By all these diseases?—Yes, very largely.

40,951. That, of course, must have been got through some immoral intercourse by their partner with somebody else, and then communicated?—Yes.

40,952. That is a real grievance and a real danger in the country?—Yes.

40,953. Is it possible to know to what extent that prevails?—No, it is impossible, because I could only give a general sort of idea.

40,954. It is enough if you tell me that it is prevalent?—Yes, it is prevalent.

40,955. In the Lock Hospital you take all classes of women?—Yes.

40,956. Both respectable and those who are not?—We do. We get a certain number of what you might call the semi-respectable, but as a rule they are treated at home and by private means.

40,957. You get them, but not extensively?—Only a small percentage. They have not entered the band of the others.

40,958. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) A respectable woman would not like to come to the Lock Hospital if she could help it?—No.

40,959. (Chairman.) She may be poor?—It is curious, but there has been a very curious move all through London with regard to the hospitals. At St. Bartholomew's, when I was there, there were 57 beds for women who were prostitutes, admissions for venereal diseases for women, and 48 men. At Charing Cross there is a charity, under which a certain number of beds had to be, in the old days, kept for venereal disease. There was a street, Craven Street, and a fund, the Craven Fund, and in the old days of the Strand the prostitutes lived in Craven Street, and when a portion of it was sold the money was divided, so much to Westminster, so much to Charing Cross, and so much to the Lock Hospital, which was then situated in the corner of Park Lane. The people of Bartholomew's had so many calls for other diseases, and these beds were not always occupied, and in consequence of that they were diminished, and at Charing Cross the public subscribed and sent patients there, and they had to be put in beds approximate to where these women were, and the consequence of this was there was a great agitation, ladies complained of their maids, suffering from some simple malady, being put next to prostitutes in beds, and the result of it was that eventually almost all the prostitutes gravitated to the Female Lock Hospital, so that most of the hospitals have a very small percentage for venereal disease treatment.

(Chairman.) I think I ought to thank you very much for the evidence you have given. It is most valuable, and we shall be much informed by it, and it will help us considerably in our conclusions.

Mr. John Pedder called and examined.

40,960. (Chairman.) You are one of the principal clerks at the Home Office?—Yes.

40,961. What particular department do you represent?—One of the four departments, and inside that department is the question of the Aliens Act and all questions of nationality.

40,962. You have certain points which you are able to present in connexion with the Aliens Act?—In connexion with the expulsion of aliens.

40,963. There was a letter addressed by Sir Edward Troup, who is at the Home Office, to the Secretary of the Commission, calling attention to certain facts under the Aliens Act?—Yes.

40,964. I do not want to read through the letter, because you can probably state the matter more clearly. Will you kindly give us the points that have occurred to the Home Office as worthy of presentation?—There are two sets of circumstances in which aliens can be expelled. One may be called criminal and the other non-criminal, and my evidence, I think, may be confined to the criminal side. Under section 3 of the Aliens Act any alien who is convicted of an offence for which the punishment may be imprisonment without the option of a fine may be recommended by the court for expulsion, and the Secretary of State may thereupon, in due course, make an expulsion order. On receiving a recommendation, the Home Secretary considers all the circumstances, frequently including points which have not come before the court, and decides whether or not to make the expulsion order. If he decides to make it, the order is made and served on the alien before he is discharged from prison, or at his discharge from prison, and the order requires him to leave the United Kingdom and remain thereafter out of the United Kingdom. The alien must then forthwith, or within a short time specified in the order, leave the United Kingdom, and never come back except upon pain of imprisonment for three months in the first instance and twelve months on subsequent occasions. If an alien is married and has children, the various members of his family must either arrange to go away with him or join him abroad subsequently, or if they desire to remain in the United Kingdom they must remain apart from him. That is where our point comes in. There is no power to compel a husband or wife or child to go with an expelled alien unless he or she has individually become subject to the expulsion provisions of the Act; but the Home Secretary has power to and in proper cases does arrange for such persons if they wish and if they are not otherwise able, to go with the alien. In some cases one of the parties to the marriage, generally the wife, declines to accompany the other out of the country, and remains here. The physical separation of the parties is then complete so long as the expelled individual does not return to this country or the party who remains here does not join the other abroad. To that extent expulsion effects a release from the conjugal obligations, and an answer to that effect has been correctly given by a police court clerk to a woman who, at the same time as expulsion proceedings were in progress, asked for a separation order. Notwithstanding that physical separation, of course the marriage tie remains, and the party left in the United Kingdom is in a difficult position. Particularly in the case of a woman the point is important, because she is an alien by her marriage—although her children may be British subjects by reason of their birth in the United Kingdom—and is unable to acquire or resume the status and rights of a British subject so long as her husband remains alive and does not obtain divorce. That is the general position which I was directed to lay before you. I only have to add on my own part details, if you desire them, of two or three cases.

40,965. You said in some cases the wife may desire to accompany her husband, and the Secretary of State would assist her to do so; but there are other cases, I understand, in which the offence for which the alien is expelled consists in living upon the earnings of the wife's prostitution, or of ill-treatment to her, cruelty?—Yes.

40,966. Can the Expulsion Order be made in either of those cases?—Yes, the Expulsion Order can be made. The nature of the offence, provided it is an offence punishable by imprisonment without the option of a fine, does not matter from the point of view of the power to make the Expulsion Order.

40,967. Compelling women to submit themselves to prostitution and living upon them is an offence ?—Yes, within the terms of the Aliens Act.

40,968. What is the punishment ?

(Mr. Brierley.) Not exceeding three months for a first offence.

40,969. (Chairman.) That is a case in which the man can be expelled from the country if he is an alien ? —Yes.

40,970. Is that a case which occurs ?—Constantly.

40,971. To what extent ?—I should think certainly 10 per cent.

40,972. Of what ?—Of the aliens that have been expelled.

40,973. How many have been expelled ?—About 2,000 since the Act came into force.

40,974. Are the women left behind ? Are they British women ?—In some cases originally British women.

40,975. Therefore a British woman might marry an alien, might be compelled by him to prostitute herself so that he may live on her earnings ; he might then be found guilty of that and expelled from the country, and she would possibly say, "No, I do not intend to go with you " ?—That is what happens.

40,976. That might occur in the case of cruelty, too ?—Yes.

40,977. Where he has been punished for a cruel act, violent assault ?—Yes. That is the most marked case.

40,978. The assault ?—The assault, or the prostitution, the most marked case of the hardship possible to a British woman married to an alien.

40,979. The point is, the man being expelled, the woman has no remedy in this country worth anything in the way of divorce ?—None, I think.

40,980. She would be obliged, if he is an alien, to proceed for any remedy she could enforce in the country where he belongs ?—I suppose so.

40,981. I take it she would probably have no domicile here, and certainly he could have none after he is expelled from the country. He is never allowed to return ?—No, the order is to remain out of the United Kingdom.

40,982. He cannot have a domicile in the United Kingdom, and thus the jurisdiction, acting on domicile, for a woman to obtain release from a man, if the grounds are such as to give it, cannot be enforced in this country ?—I suppose not.

40,983. That is the point. Is there anything in addition that you think it is desirable should be drawn to our attention ?—I think not in general terms. The instances I could give would be mainly elaborating what you have just been saying.

40,984. Are they instances which have actually been brought to your notice ?—Which actually have occurred.

40,985. Assume, for instance, that the man remained in this country, but that he had not brought himself within the divorce law, suppose he had not committed adultery himself, would the view you desire to present from the Home Office be that in those circumstances, if he is expelled for what you have already described, that should be constituted a ground of divorce ?—That was the suggestion, that if the grounds on which a woman may obtain divorce are to be extended, one of the causes might be that she has been compulsorily separated from her husband by his expulsion.

40,986. That would be on grounds affecting her. There are expulsionary grounds not at all directed towards the woman ?—Yes.

40,987. But towards the alien who has committed other offences ?—Yes. Our submission would be as broad as the grounds for expulsion.

40.988. If ever an alien is expelled on any ground, leaving an English wife behind ?—Or even a foreign one.

40,989. She should have the right to a divorce because she can no longer live with him ?—It should be a ground upon which a court might dissolve the marriage.

40,990. And should have jurisdiction to do it as well, although he were not any longer domiciled in England ?—Yes.

40,991. Is there anything else you wish to add ?—I think not.

40,992. (Mr. Brierley.) Can you give us the number of cases of expulsion on the ground of crime ?—About 2,000, I think, in nearly five years since the Act has been in force—about 400 a year.

40,993. You say 10 per cent. of those are cases under the Vagrant Act of living upon prostitution ?—I am bound to say that is an estimate only. I have only given it as what occurs to me.

40,994. Do you draw any distinction between the cases where an alien lives on the prostitution of his wife, and where he lives on the prostitution of other women ?—I should not, from the point of view of my general submission. It is expulsion in itself, that is my point.

40,995. With regard to the figure of 10 per cent., are those cases where the alien lives on the prostitution of his wife, or do they include cases where he lives on the prostitution of a woman ?—Only of the wife, I think.

40,996. You think that amounts to 10 per cent. ?—I should think so.

40,997. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I think you said when the Expulsion Order was made the Home Secretary in a proper case would assist the wife to follow her husband ? —Yes.

40,998. But she sometimes declines to do that ?—Yes.

40,999. Is it the suggestion that in those cases she should be entitled to a divorce ?—Yes, I think so.

41,000. In all of them ?—Yes, on the ground that she has very good reasons for not accompanying him.

41,001. She may or may not have good reasons ?—I should submit that would be a question for the court.

41,002. A discretion ?—Yes.

41,003. There should be jurisdiction to divorce a woman who, having been given the opportunity to follow her husband who has been expelled, has refused to avail herself of it ?—Yes.

41,004. Wht is the particular advantage that you anticipate from allowing the wife this divorce ? Let us take the case you have put, where the woman has unfortunately become a prostitute through the wrongdoing of her husband and he is expelled, and she is left here a prostitute, separated from her husband, so that there is no individual molestation or anything of that kind ; what particular advantage do you think would follow from her being divorced from him ?—Freedom on her own part to start again, possibly marry respectably.

41,005. Do you think that is a case which would frequently occur ?—Merely on the prostitution cases perhaps I should not say frequently.

41,006. We have to deal with this. I am now speaking of the prostitution cases. Do you think really a divorce would make much difference to a woman placed in that very sad position ?—I should say so in a considerable proportion of cases, on the ground that many of the cases we see are very young girls, and if they were taken in hand, as they might be by proper agencies, and free to start their life again, it might be a considerable advantage.

41,007. Supposing your suggestion were restricted to those cases, I quite feel the force of the suggestion. Would it not be a possible view that while it was right that there should be a divorce in those cases, it is difficult to defend a divorce granted to a woman who, not placed under those circumstances in which it is quite impossible to live with her husband, nevertheless refuses to follow him abroad ? It strikes one as rather startling to suggest a divorce should be granted under those circumstances, that there should be jurisdiction to do it. I follow that it is a matter of discretion ?—I do not know quite what you want me to answer.

41,008. I suggest to you there is a very considerable distinction between the cases you have put, where the alien has brought his wife and made her a prostitute, and other cases where she may, for good or bad reasons, prefer not to follow him but still has had the opportunity of doing so and has refused ?—I think there may be very great differences in the degree of the hardship which the wife is seeking to escape.

41,009. Is there any very great difference between the case of an alien whose wife refuses to follow him and the case of a man who emigrates, goes to America, and his wife refuses to follow him? You know cases of that kind occur. Would you say the court ought to have jurisdiction there to divorce a woman?—As regards emigration?

41,010. Yes?—I would not put it on the same basis as the effect of expulsion, which is compulsory. It is an act of the State.

41,011. That is in favour of the man. The man cannot help being expelled, but my emigrant can help emigrating?—The wife cannot have any influence over the expulsion at all. She may discuss whether her husband should emigrate or not: she cannot discuss whether he shall be expelled.

41,012. She can follow if she chooses in the case we are considering?—Yes.

41,013. And she elects not to?—Yes.

41,014. In the other case she elects not to follow him when he emigrates?—Yes.

41,015. Is there much distinction?—I should be inclined to base a distinction on the fact that the emigration she might be able to prevent by discussing it with her husband, and the compulsion she cannot.

41,016. (Lady Frances Balfour.) May I direct your attention to this. You have been asked about the unfortunate man who is expelled, or who emigrates. I should like to ask your attention to the woman's point of view. I suppose these alien men are nearly always expelled for some crime?—It must be some crime.

41,017. The common crime, I imagine, is using their wives in the worst form they can?

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) About 10 per cent.

41,018. (Lady Frances Balfour.) These women are 10 per cent., you say?—I estimate it at that.

41,019. You consider it the very worst form a woman can be subject to, to be sent out into the streets for the support of this kind of man?—An extreme hardship.

41,020. Even one case of that would make a grievance against the husband which is an unforgivable grievance?—I am disposed to agree.

41,021. There is no crime greater that a man can do against his wife who is dependent upon him?—I do not know that I am in a position to express an opinion on that.

41,022. Do you think there is any crime greater than using a woman as a prostitute for the living of a man?—I really have not considered it definitely.

41,023. You are uncertain if that is a crime?—Not at all. It is a statutory crime—if for no other reason.

41,024. The common reason is that they are expelled for that crime?—It is one of the reasons. I guessed it at 10 per cent. I could have the actual figures calculated if the Commission desired it.

41,025. The man has to leave the country under the laws of the country. He is expelled for crime?—Yes.

41,026. Do you think that that is to be measured with the case of a man emigrating of his own free will to one of our Colonies?—I should draw a great distinction between the two sets of cases.

41,027. In neither case is divorce to be compulsory; it is at the will of the woman. Presumably the woman, if she does not wish to follow, has some very good cause?—Yes.

41,028. Either his cruelty, of the kind we are discussing, or some other cruelty?—Yes. The man has committed some offence for which he is considered not fit to remain in the United Kingdom. The offences vary immensely, of course. The grievance against the woman will be one of degree in each case.

41,029. That, of course, is totally different from leaving the country of his own free will as an emigrant to one of our Colonies?—That is the point I wished to submit to the Commission—the compulsory nature of expulsion.

41,030. That alone comes under the purview of the Home Office; they have nothing to do with the emigration of a free citizen or his wife, who is presumably more or less a free citizen?—No.

41,031. (Chairman.) Did that 10 per cent. you mentioned present the cases of compulsory prostitution?—I guessed it only on the spur of the moment as representing the cases of men living on their wives' prostitution.

41,032. Can you tell me how many cases there have been of expulsion for other offences against the wife, for instance, ordinary violence?—I am afraid I cannot off-hand. The figures can be taken out if you wish.

41,033. Have you the figures which show during the years the Act has been in force, the cases in which there has been expulsion, and the grounds of the expulsion?—They are published yearly.

41,034. Would you find it possible to send us a copy?—Certainly.*

41,035. Does it specify in some column clearly what the offence is?—All the offences are classified and set out in tables.

41,036. That would enable us to see exactly what the figures are?—Yes.

41,037. (Mr. Brierley.) The offences of living on prostitution would be offences under the Vagrancy Acts. Could you, in those figures you are going to give, distinguish between living on wives' prostitution and living on other women's prostitution?—If that is desired I could get that done. That will not appear in the published tables, but it could be got out.

41,038. (Chairman.) One wants to get a very definite notion of how many cases there are in which the wife is treated in this way, and in which that is regarded as a ground for turning the man out of the country; secondly, how many other cases there are in which the woman is treated brutally, and he is turned out of the country for brutality, but not of a prostitution character. That is the real point?—The figures could be taken out to show that.

41,039. Could you also show, or do they show, cases of expulsion on the ground of cruelty to children?—I should be inclined to say there have not been any on the mere ground of cruelty to children.

41,040. If the tables are sent and we require further explanation, I daresay you would furnish it to us in writing?—Certainly.

41,041. We are much obliged to you for coming to give evidence. Was it by the direction of the Secretary of State himself that this matter was brought to our attention?—Yes, the letter was written by the direction of the Secretary of State.

41,042. Shall we treat that letter as part of the matters which should be appended to our Report?—I think so, if you wish.

"Letter from the Secretary of State, Home Department:—

WHITEHALL,

"SIR, 7th June, 1910.

I AM directed by the Secretary of State to request that you will inform the Royal Commission on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes that he has thought it right to bring to their notice certain facts which have come before him in connection with his duties under the Aliens Act, 1905. When he makes an Expulsion Order under section 3 of that Act, requiring an alien criminal to leave the United Kingdom, difficult questions not infrequently arise in regard to the alien's wife and children. In some cases the wife desires to accompany her husband out of the United Kingdom and in proper cases the Secretary of State assists her to do so. In other cases, including some in which the offence for which the alien is being expelled consists in his having lived upon the earnings of her prostitution or involves other ill-treatment of her, the wife decides to remain in the United Kingdom, being glad to take advantage of the physical separation effected by the Expulsion Order. This separation is absolute and life-long so far as regards the United Kingdom, seeing that it can be broken only by the wife's going abroad to join her husband or by his returning to this country, in which case he is liable to arrest and imprisonment, and at the end of any such imprisonment would be sent out of the country forthwith. But the woman (not infrequently British-born), remains subject to the marriage tie and may be exposed to considerable hardships and temptations.

"It has occurred to the Secretary of State that if the Royal Commission are contemplating any extension of the grounds on which it should be competent for a Court to grant divorce, the case in which an alien husband has been expelled from the United Kingdom for crime deserves consideration.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
(Sgd.) EDWARD TROUP.

Supplement to Mr. Pedder's Evidence.

Letter referred to in Questions 41,033–4 and 41,357–61:—

Home Office, Whitehall, S.W.,
9th December 1910.

DEAR MR. BARNES,

I ENCLOSE, as desired by the chairman, the blue books showing figures relating to the expulsion of aliens.

In Part II. in each volume you will find all available information: and in Table I. thereof you will see the cases arranged according to offences.

The column headed "Living on Prostitution and Procuring" covers the greater part of the matter which gave rise to my estimate of 10 per cent. "Keeping Brothels" has also to be taken into account, and "Wounding, Assault, &c." probably includes cases of the same nature.

For the years 1907 and onwards these columns are easily compared with the column showing the total of males dealt with. For the year 1906 males were not distinguished, and the figures are less useful.

I do not feel confident that if my 10 per cent. is to be limited to husbands living on their wives' prostitution (as I was rash enough to say it might be) the actual figures would confirm it—at all events as regards actual convictions; but I feel pretty sure from seeing all the cases as they pass through that this particular evil is not confined to the cases where it forms the subject of the charge or where it may actually be disclosed on inquiry.

If the chairman desires it, I can have all the papers searched; but it would be a very laborious and lengthy job, and I venture to think would not be likely to give any very certain or valuable result.

I did not take out the figures originally, because I wished, and (subject to the chairman) would still wish, to base the case not on the particular offence or the enormity of the offence against the woman, but on the fact of expulsion and the separation effected thereby. That, it is suggested, should be a ground for moving for divorce; the nature of the offence which led to expulsion would then be one of the considerations which the court would take into account. It might well happen that the actual final cause of expulsion was some comparatively trivial offence, possibly with no direct bearing on the woman; while the whole facts and history of the case might well justify release from the marriage tie.

I have some fear that I allowed myself to be deflected from this general intention into a discussion of particular offences. I may have failed to make clear the broad suggestion that the State having for some reason or other decided to send the man away, had a special duty to look to the woman's welfare, both from her personal point of view and from that of the community, involving as it often does the fate of British-born children. Questions of nationality, further, are important. I just mentioned them; but perhaps did not lay sufficient stress on them.

Please pardon this long letter, and understand that I am very ready to get out further information so far as possible, if thought necessary.

I am, yours very truly,
(Signed) JOHN PEDDER.

Dr. WILLIAM DAVID MOORE called and examined.

41,043. (Chairman.) You are an M.D. and Medical Superintendent of the Holloway Sanatorium, Virginia Water?—Yes.

41,044. How long have you had charge of that sanatorium?—I have been medical superintendent there for about 11 years.

41,045. You have sent us a short memorandum dealing with the question of insanity. Is that what your evidence is confined to?—Practically.

41,046. Is that sanatorium a place for the reception of patients who suffer in that way?—Yes.

41,047. A private sanatorium?—Yes.

41,048. We have had it frequently said that there is a difficulty about coming to a definite conclusion as to curability, at any rate until that has been tested for some considerable time. Is that right?—A very considerable time, in some cases.

41,049. During the last 25 years at your asylum, 1,281 patients have recovered?—That is so.

41,050. Of those, 61 had been in residence for more than three years before recovery, and, in several cases, there were no signs of improvement until the ninth or tenth year. How many cases have you had in which it has been absolutely incurable?—Probably about two-thirds of the entire number treated.

41,051. How many is that?—It would not be so much as that It would be about 4,000 altogether. We had 1,281 recoveries, and the incurable would be about two-thirds of the remainder.

41,052. Nearly 2,000?—Speaking roughly.

41,053. A very large number have been found quite incurable?—So far as we can judge.

41,054. Leaving on one side insanity as a ground of divorce if it should have been brought about by the conduct of the party applying, you think that should be eliminated?—That is my opinion.

41,055. What do you say about the insanity being a ground where there is a state of incurability duly determined?—So far as the individual patient is concerned I do not think it matters in a certain proportion of cases, but a large proportion of the patients who may be termed incurable are those suffering from delusional insanity. These patients, although they may be incurable in the ordinary way, would still feel it very acutely if they were divorced.

41,056. You have expressed it more fully in your paper. Perhaps you would read it, from "The causation of the insanity"?—The remarks about the causation do not refer to that.

41,057. I think we have had the whole of what you say in that way. Will you kindly read from there?—"The causation of the insanity is therefore a consideration of importance. 'Mental stress' was assigned either as a principal or contributory cause of the insanity in 2,671 females admitted to Institutions for the Insane in England and Wales during the years 1907–8, and during the same period it was the cause of the attack in over 30 per cent. of the private female patients admitted to registered hospitals and licensed houses. These statistics have an important bearing on the subject under consideration as, in married women, mental stress often means prolonged anxiety in regard to their husbands or their affairs. In many cases within my knowledge the conduct of the husband has not only been a contributory or predisposing cause of the wife's insanity—it has been the immediate and direct cause. The facts could not be disclosed at any inquiry that might be held, and a woman might be condemned to lifelong misery owing to an illness for which the husband was directly responsible." That is all I have said in my memorandum about causation.

41,058. That is why you exclude cases from consideration in which the applicant has been the real cause of the distress?—Yes.

41,059. Perhaps you will proceed with the rest of it?—"Divorce on the ground of insanity would entail an amount of suffering out of all proportion to the relief it might possibly afford. Only those who live and work amongst the insane can have any conception of the distress, and even mental torture it would occasion. Not only would it affect patients who may be regarded as incurable—every married woman admitted into an Institution for the Insane would suffer in consequence. It would also, in my opinion, lead to an increase of puerperal insanity. Our attention has recently been drawn to the great improvement, during the last 50 years, in the nursing of the sick and wounded. During the same period a corresponding change has taken place in the treatment of the insane. Whereas formerly the main object in view seems to have been the safe custody of the patient, at the present time our efforts are directed to his recovery and comfort. The Lunacy Acts, from time to time, have given expression to these altered conditions and, in the present Act, every section has been drawn up with a view of protecting the patient and his interests. In my opinion divorce on the ground of insanity would be a retrograde step—contrary to the spirit of the Lunacy Acts and to the principles which govern the administration of the law generally."

41,060 (Sir Frederick Treves.) In general terms you object to insanity as a ground for divorce?—Yes.

41,061. You object, I take it, from the last paragraph of your proof, to lunacy being regarded as distinct from any other kind of disease?—Yes.

41,062. That is a prominent point, is it not?—Yes.

41,063. That has been mentioned by several, and I think it would be well to make it clear to the Commission. You speak of the improvement made during 50 years in the treatment of sick and wounded. You are thinking of the time when lunacy was not regarded as a disease?—Yes.

41,064. When it was considered to be due to a demoniacal possession or to the influence of the moon, as the term implies: it was not a disease comparable with other maladies?—Or even almost criminal.

41,065. In other words, there was no scientific treatment applicable to the insane?—That is so.

41,066. The lunatic was treated as a common brawler?—Yes.

41,067. He was locked up because he was a nuisance?—Yes.

41,068. When he was put away so that his noise and brawling were not disturbing to other people, the responsibility of the State ended?—Yes.

41,069. He was not medically treated?—No.

41,070. It is on that ground you regard it as a step backwards, the once more isolating of lunacy from other diseases. You speak of it as a retrograde step. You speak of the changes that have taken place in 50 years and I gather your fear is that if lunacy be a ground for divorce it will have the effect of once more isolating lunacy from the whole range of human disease?—That is so, of course. One feels that, but that is not the only question.

41,071. It is what is in your mind, in the last paragraph of your proof?—It is part of what is in my mind.

41,072. Your well-known asylum at Virginia Water is for the well-to-do?—Yes.

41,073. I take it you have had experience amongst the poor insane?—I have.

41,074. Have you never met with any cases of hardship amongst the poor from having insane spouses?—Yes, I have.

41,075. Serious hardships?—No, I have not known much of it.

41,076. The cases of husbands with children, whose wives are confined to an asylum, who have been driven to find some woman to look after the children and have formed irregular unions?—That I do not know much about.

41,077. Amongst the well-to-do have you met with no hardships?—Undoubtedly there is hardship, but it is only a hardship.

41,078. You do not think very much of it?—No.

41,079. Or, rather, your experience has not led you to think very much of it?—No.

41,080. Indeed you have considered this matter, as I think you ought to consider it, more from the point of view of the insane than from the point of view of the sane?—Naturally.

41,081. To go to definite points, you say that it is generally recognised that it is impossible to come to a definite conclusion as to curability in some cases of insanity of long standing. We have had a good deal of evidence on this point?—Yes.

41,082. Dr. Clouston says that physicians would have little difficulty in giving a definite opinion as to incurability. It is only fair to say he had in his mind cases of from three to five years' duration?—Yes.

41,083. You do not agree with that?—No, but in the greater number of cases he is perfectly right; you generally can.

41,084. We will come to those numbers. During a period of 25 years you have had in your asylum 61 patients who have recovered after a residence of more than three years?—That is so.

41,085. That represents the comparatively small number of 2·4 per annum?—Yes.

41,086. I take it that that is a very small margin for error?—I suppose so.

41,087. I daresay you know the figures which show that the number of recoveries after five years are, according to Dr. Clouston's experience, only 1·2 per cent., and according to the evidence of Dr. Coupland, the Commissioner in Lunacy, only 1·6 per cent.?—Yes.

41,088. You must therefore allow that the margin is very small?—There is no doubt about what?

41,089. The margin for error?—Yes.

41,090. I daresay you are aware that 82 medical officers of asylums have been asked whether they would consider that insanity should be a ground of divorce, and of that number 51 are in favour of insanity being a ground of divorce. You perhaps know the mean time they agree to is five years?—Do you refer to Dr. Savage's figures?

41,091. Yes?—I think it is only right to mention, in connection with that, that Dr. Savage at the beginning was in favour of divorce and afterwards, even after he had those communications from those 51, he changed his mind.

41,092. That does not alter the figures?—No.

41,093. We have Dr. Savage's letter. You know the letter?—Yes.

41,094. And there are the figures. It does not alter them. It come to this, if you take the cases of insanity that have been in existence for five years, and realise out of that number the recovery is only 1·2 or 1·6 per cent., do you really think there is much difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to the curability of these cases?—Not as to the curability, but that is a small part of the question.

41,095. That is the only one we are considering at this moment?—That is so, then.

41,096. There is one little point one ought perhaps to put clear, because it might be the subject of error. You speak of mental stress as a cause of insanity, and you mention it in connection with this question?—Yes.

41,097. It may be inferred from your proof that the mental stress you have in your mind is due to the husband?—Of course it is not altogether.

41,098. All your lady patients are not married?—No.

41,099. There are other forms of mental stress besides that due to the ill-conduct of the husband?—Yes.

41,100. You say that a woman might be condemned to lifelong misery owing to an illness for which her husband was directly responsible. Is that a term you think quite correct in the case of terminal dementia?—No.

41,101. You are thinking of one particular class, the delusional?—Yes, but they form a very large proportion of the incurably insane.

41,102. You say divorce on the ground of insanity would entail an amount of suffering out of all proportion to the relief it could afford. Do you know there are 50,000 registered insane suffering from terminal dementia?—Yes.

41,103. That is one-third of the entire insane population of these Islands?—Yes.

41,104. The full number of registered insane given to us is 150,000, of which number 50,000 are cases of terminal dementia. Allowing 25,000 of those to be married, do you not think that possibly an immense amount of suffering on the part of the sane spouses would be involved?—I would not say "suffering"; I would limit it to hardship, I think.

41,105. Because these 50,000 people, we are told, we may regard as dead, except in the physiological sense——?—Quite so.

41,106. ——they are spoken of as having no interest in their friends, totally unable to appreciate anything about divorce, and practically as dead to the world?—That proportion of insane refers to county asylums. Amongst private patients the proportion would be very much smaller.

41,107. The figures given to us include the whole of the registered insane in Great Britain. I mention that because you say divorce on the ground of insanity would entail an amount of suffering out of all proportion to the relief it might possibly afford. In terminal dementia there is no suffering in the sense you mean, so far as the question of divorce is concerned?—No.

41,108. Another point you make is that if this became a matter of law, not only would it affect patients who might be regarded as incurable, but every married woman admitted into an institution for the insane would suffer?—Very probably.

41,109. Taking the enormous number of cases of secondary dementia, they would not suffer?—My idea there was not so much with regard to the incurable. I said every married woman admitted into an asylum in the early years of admission probably would suffer intensely.

41,110. At the beginning?—Yes.

41,111. You would apply that to every kind of insanity?—You cannot apply it to all; where you get cases of primary dementia there can be no suffering.

41,112. It is only to correct your proof. The impression left on our minds would be that every married woman admitted into the asylum would suffer in consequence. That you modify by saying it would depend on the nature of the insanity?—Yes.

41,113. With regard to it leading to an increase in the amount of puerperal insanity, with an affectionate husband that is hardly likely to occur. You rather represent that worry about possible divorce proceedings might lead to an increase in puerperal insanity?—That is so.

41,114. Do you think in the case of an affectionate husband that is likely to be an element?—Yes.

41,115. Are there not cases of puerperal insanity which are septic in their origin?—A very small proportion.

41,116. Those could not be affected by dread of divorce?—I do not suppose sepsis in itself would cause insanity.

41,117. There must be the two combined, you think?—Yes.

41,118. Supposing as a matter of practice that divorce were to be granted for insanity of five years' duration, you are not likely to have much element of error in that?—You would have a certain amount—not much.

41,119. It comes to something less than 1 per cent.?—That is so.

41,120. We are told by Dr. Clouston that he has never seen a case of secondary dementia recover when the symptoms are well developed after five years?—In secondary dementia one would not expect them to recover.

41,121. You agree with that?—Yes.

41,122. You are naturally very interested in these cases of delusional insanity?—Yes.

41,123. Those who have given evidence here, I daresay you know, think that delusional insanity, alcoholic dementia, and what is called dypsomania, might be grounds for divorce after 10 years. You would not agree with that, I know, but I want you to consider this. The Commissioner of Lunacy has only one person's interest at heart, and that is the insane?—Yes.

41,124. He is appointed by the State to look after the insane?—Yes.

41,125. That is his sole care?—Yes.

41,126. Would you not think it a safeguard if in any case of divorce proceedings brought on the ground of insanity, it were possible for the Commissioner in Lunacy to intervene on behalf of the insane person?—With regard to what?

41,127. Supposing an action for divorce is brought against a wife on the ground of insanity. It is possibly a case of delusional insanity. She has no-one to represent her interests. Would you think it well that the Commissioner in Lunacy should ex-officio be able to intervene in a case of that sort on behalf of the lunatic?—I do not see what good it could do.

41,128. Surely he could do good. In the case just imagined no one represents the insane woman?—No.

41,129. She is certified as being insane. Then comes another case where she is represented by the Commissioner in Lunacy, who says, "I know that this "poor woman will be infinitely distressed by any "divorce proceedings, and it will aggravate her "condition"?—Yes.

41,130. Would not your scruples be to some extent met if it were allowed that the Commissioner in Lunacy should have powers to intervene in any action of this kind?—Of course it would be very necessary that they should have the power to intervene.

41,131. You think if they had that power it would remove some of your objections?—No.

41,132. Some objections?—Hardly any.

41,133. It would remove this objection. It has been said the poor insane person has no one to represent him or her, and if it were officially permitted that the Commissioner in Lunacy should intervene, whether asked or not, on behalf of the insane, surely that is in their interest?—Neither the Commissioner in Lunacy nor the medical officer of the asylum would be aware of all the effects, which only that woman would know herself, and she would not be in a position to give expression to them.

41,134. Still, some expression could be given for her by the official?—I doubt it.

41,135. A Protector of the Insane?—I do not think so.

41,136. I suppose you have nothing to say about the so-called criminal lunatic?—No, I do not think so.

41,137. You have not had to deal with them?—No, not really.

41,138. It has been said that a criminal lunatic should be divorced because of the fact itself?—That is a different question; crime comes in, and it is a different thing.

41,139. You have not considered that question?—No.

41,140. (Lady Frances Balfour.) On this paragraph Sir Frederick has been asking you about, I understood you said it would lead in your opinion to an increase of puerperal insanity. I thought that kind of insanity was quite different?—No; puerperal insanity is very much like other forms of insanity.

41,141. It is conditional—from the condition?—To a certain extent. The cause is different, but the insanity itself is very similar.

41,142. Does it ever last?—Yes.

41,143. Does it last for life?—Very rarely.

41,144. Is it not the case that the patient after recovering usually totally forgets the condition of insanity altogether?—Not always.

41,145. She remembers she was in that condition?—Yes.

41,146. It is not incurable?—Not as puerperal insanity, no, certainly not.

41,147. You never would class it among the incurable forms of insanity?—No.

41,148. Therefore it would not come within our purview if it is not incurable?—I think it does, in a way. It would add very much to the distress.

41,149. If the patient knew it was curable?—The patient would not know it was curable.

41,150. If she remembers her condition she probably has intelligence to ask what form of insanity she has had?—You cannot tell a patient every case of puerperal insanity is going to recover.

41,151. You give her usually the benefit of the doubt if she asks you?—You must consider that a patient is very unreasonable. Very often you cannot reason with them at all.

41,152. You could not convince them they would not have a divorce because of puerperal insanity?—No, quite impossible.

41,153. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I suppose there are some cases of puerperal insanity which develop into incurable cases?—There are some cases.

41,154. May I take it anything which creates anxiety, what you have called mental stress, would be likely to aggravate the case?—There is no doubt about it at all.

41,155. I gather your view is that if the law were changed so that incurable insanity were a ground of divorce, that would become known, and any woman who was suffering from puerperal insanity would have the added anxiety that possibly she might be divorced on the ground of that?—Yes, and the dread of insanity is not to be despised as a factor in the causation of insanity.

41,156. In the delusional cases, those are among the incurable?—Yes.

41,157. I suppose in a great many delusional cases the incurable patient is perfectly conscious of what is going on?—Perfectly.

41,158. Perfectly capable of considering and brooding over the fact of a probable divorce?—Perfectly.

41,159. Do you think that would be likely to aggravate his condition?—Very much so.

41,160. I suppose, apart from his being cured, he may be better or worse according to the circumstances under which he is placed?—That is so.

41,161. If you add a new cause of anxiety that is likely to prejudice his condition, is it not?—I think so.

41,162. You have drawn attention to the cases where it would be highly unjust for a man to get a divorce from a mad wife whose madness has been largely caused by his own action?—Yes.

41,163. Not definite cruelty, but something which has caused her mental strain?—Yes.

41,164. Probably it will be admitted on all hands it is inequitable that the man should have a divorce, but is there not great difficulty in bringing that home to the man in any way?—It would be impossible to bring it home.

41,165. Possibly circumstances which are only known to the poor woman herself?—Yes.

41,166. And if circumstances which do not admit of legal proof in any way, they are not cruelty in any legal sense?—Yes.

41,167. But yet may be highly efficient in having produced her condition?—I would say in addition, if divorce were a ground of insanity that we would not in those cases get the history at all. At the present time we do get a history, but we probably would not get that history.

41,168. You do not deny, as I understand, that great suffering must be caused in a multitude of cases where one of the partners is insane. It is impossible to deny that?—No; there is a great deal of hardship, but in the one case it seems to me it is a hardship; in the other case, if divorce were a ground of insanity, it would be almost a calamity.

41,169. And, one may say, injustice?—There is no doubt about that.

41,170. Those conditions of suffering which take place when one of the partners is insane are, I suppose, of the same kind as where one of the partners is suffering from, say, incurable paralysis?—Yes. Of course there are differences.

41,171. Again, it is a case of great suffering?—Yes.

41,172. And calling for great pity?—Yes.

41,173. We cannot get away from that kind of thing in human affairs?—No.

41,174. (Chairman.) How many people do you have in your asylum at a given time?—As a rule between 395 and 400.

41,175. All of them paying?—All private patients; not all paying, but all private patients.

41,176. Mostly provided for by those who have been instrumental in bringing them before the Commissioners?—Yes.

41,177. You told Sir Frederick Treves that naturally you looked at this matter rather from the point of view of the patient?—Yes. I think that the medical officer who lives amongst the insane is the only person who can realise what terrible suffering would follow.

41,178. That is looking at it rather from the point of view of those who are in charge?—No, looking at it from the point of view of those who know, I would rather put it, what the result would be.

41,179. I take it, when we have to consider this matter, we must also consider the interests of those outside the wall, and who are suffering in consequence of separation?—Quite so.

41,180. What is your view of the position of a young man of 25, who finds out that, unfortunately, he has married a wife who is hopelessly and incurably insane?—I have no doubt it is a considerable hardship, but at the same time I would say that the greater the hardship the less likelihood there would be of his having a desire for divorce, that the more he was devoted to his wife the less desire he would have for divorce.

41,181. Do you think with a large number of people we have heard, that it may lead in cases to the person in such a position forming an irregular connection, persons left outside in such a situation as I have put to you?—He could not get a divorce for five years, and a man who lives a moral life for five years would probably not change.

41,182. Have you met with any cases yourself of complaint of the hardship?—Very few. I do not think there is any demand at all on the part of the wives; I am almost quite sure of that.

41 183. Of wives who are outside?—Yes.

41,184. And with regard to the men?—Exceedingly few exceptions, only one or two; and I may say that they seem rather ashamed of their position in bringing the matter up.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much for your evidence.

MR. FRANK AUSTIN GILL called and examined.

41,185. (Chairman.) You are the Director of the Lancashire Inebriate Reformatory?—I am.

41,186. Where is that situated?—It is about 30 miles north of Manchester, in Lancashire.

41,187. At what place?—Langho: that is the postal address.

41,188. What is the constitution of that reformatory? How has it originated?—It was created under the Inebriates Act, 1898, and maintained by the county boroughs and the county of Lancashire—a joint board.

41,189. How long have you been in charge?—Since the commencement: that is about 6½ years ago.

41,190. How many do you have there in a year?—175 I have to-day. The average will be about 140 to 150.

41,191. How many men, and how many women?—They are all women: I have no experience of habitual drunkenness amongst men.

41,192. Only women are sent to you?—Yes.

41,193. Are they sent sometimes compulsorily or voluntarily?—We have them compulsorily. They have all been committed by the court under the Act of 1898.

41,194. For habitual drunkenness?—Yes.

41,195. I think some have to go with their own consent?—They must be willing to be dealt with summarily. They have the option of appealing to be tried by indictment by a higher court.

41,196. We have had the Act before us but I have not it at the moment. My impression was that women charged with being habitual drunkards could only be sent with their own consent, except where there was criminality?—If they are habitual drunkards, and commit some offence such as being drunk and disorderly, offences of that class, they are brought up before a police court and must be willing to be dealt with summarily. They must be asked that question.

41,197. Being summarily dealt with is one question: consenting to go is another. Do you get both cases, those that are compulsorily sent, and those willing to go?—We get no voluntary cases.

41,198. You have put before us a memorandum which perhaps you will read, as it gives your view precisely?—My memorandum refers entirely to what may be called the criminal inebriates: they are practically the only ones I have any experience of. Habitual drunkenness, when proved to be incurable, constitutes a ground for divorce.

41,199. You mean it should constitute a ground for divorce?—Yes. Many cases of habitual drunkenness are annually cured, and every effort ought to be made to effect a cure before accepting it as a valid cause for divorce. No divorce should be granted unless the drunkard has undergone a period of detention either voluntarily in a retreat or compulsorily in a reformatory, if qualified for the latter. At present I am aware there is no law which enables a non-criminal inebriate to be detained except voluntarily, so that until there is further legislation embodying the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on the Inebriates Acts nothing can be done to compel the respectable inebriate, if I may use the word in contradistinction to the criminal inebriate, to undergo a course of treatment. The criminal inebriates committed to certified inebriate reformatories are the worst and most degraded of drunkards, and yet I have personal knowledge of cases being completely reformed, and returning to their husbands and families as good wives and mothers, so that I feel it is very necessary that every means to effect a cure should be exhausted before a divorce is granted.

41,200. How long, or in what way are you to determine that the case has proved incurable?—It is rather a difficult question to answer. I think they ought to be compelled to undergo some course of detention, and at any rate give themselves a chance to be cured. It is very difficult to say when they are cured or not cured.

41,201. You start by saying habitual drunkenness, when proved to be incurable, should constitute a ground of divorce. I want to know when the test is to be applied and how determined?—You cannot determine it absolutely.

41,202. But reasonably, perhaps?—I should say that many of these women that have been discharged from Langho, if they had never been sent there, would be still drunkards, and at the present moment they are respectable wives and good mothers of families, so that a period of detention in my opinion should at least be tried.

41,203. I want to get to the stage when the applicant for divorce would be able to say, "This is a case proved incurable." Do you define that later on? I presume you do?—Yes, I do refer to it to some extent.

41,204. Perhaps you will read on?—"Given an incurable drunkard, i.e., a drunkard who has failed to reform after a period of detention and treatment——"

41,205. What is the period you refer to there?—All I can say is that if a woman has been detained in a reformatory for a period of one or two years, if she has gone in under a sentence of three years, and she reverts to drunkenness on her discharge, I am prepared to admit, for the purposes of divorce, she is an incurable drunkard.

41,206. After trying it a reasonable time, for two or three years, three years at any rate, and relapse occurs on discharge, you have a hopeless case?—I should say probably; you cannot take it absolutely.

41,207. Is three years the maximum time?—Yes, that is the maximum sentence.

41,208. Will you kindly proceed with your paper?—"Given an incurable drunkard, i.e., a drunkard who has failed to reform after a period of detention and treatment, then I consider the disease or vice, as the case may be, is sufficient ground for divorce, and for the following reasons:—1. The injury, social, moral, and material to the sober partner is great, and demands redress. 2. The injury, physical and moral, inflicted on the offspring calls even more urgently for relief. Not only have the existing children to be considered, but a drunken parent is probably a potential source of degenerate offspring, and any action which tends to restrict the output of such should be adopted."

41,209. That is the eugenic point?—Yes. The next paragraph is this: "In attributing an inherent degeneracy to the offspring of alcoholic parents, I am aware that I am treading on debateable ground, but I am satisfied from my own actual experience that the heritage is sufficiently real to justify precautions. So far I have dealt with habitual drunkenness per se, but the women committed to the Langho Certified Inebriate Reformatory, of whom over 50 per cent. are married, are mostly immoral, and about 60 per cent. are feeble-minded in some degree. Immorality I need hardly deal with here. It is resorted to as a means of obtaining a livelihood and of procuring drink. Where drunkenness is complicated by some degree of feeble mind, then I think divorce is still more justifiable, not only for the relief it affords to the sober partner, but for the sake of the offspring, existing or potential. Taking a working man's wife of average ability as a standard, then 60 per cent. of the habitual drunkards in Langho Reformatory are unfit by reason of their mental deficiency and drunken habits to be wives or mothers of children, and should be divorced in the interests of their husbands and the race. I am assuming for the moment that their husbands would be sober and respectable, a very improbable assumption. Where both are drunkards, I presume the question of divorce would not arise.

"B.—Definition.

"So much difficulty has been made over the definition of the term 'habitual drunkard' in law courts, that I must decline to attempt a definition. I suggest the definition recommended by the Departmental Committee on the Inebriates Acts be adopted, or adapted if you wish to include drug intoxication."

41,210. Will you tell me what that recommendation is?——

(Sir Frederick Treves.) It is in Dr. Branthwaite's proof.

41,211. (Chairman.) We will get it on the note?—The definition suggested is that an inebriate is a person who habitually takes or uses any intoxicating thing or things.

41,212. (Mr. Brierley.) That is not the existing definition?—You want the existing definition?

41,213. (Chairman.) I mean the definition recommended by the Departmental Committee on the Inebriates Act?—"An inebriate is a person who "habitually takes or uses any intoxicating thing or "things, and while under the influence of such thing "or things, or in consequence of the effects thereof "is (a) dangerous to himself or others; or (b) a cause "of harm or serious annoyance to his family or "others; or (c) incapable of managing himself or his "affairs, or of ordinary proper conduct." Then with regard to separation orders. "Separation orders are of value. They afford a greatly appreciated protection against the offending partner, they protect existing children, and help to restrict the output of more vitiated lives."

41,214. That is with regard to a separation order made on the ground of habitual drunkenness.

41,215. (Mr. Spender.) Could you tell us what proportion of the inmates of your establishment are married?—55 per cent.

41,216. What proportion of those have children?—I cannot give you the percentage that have children, but the average children to married habitual drunken women, I think, speaking from memory, is 6.

41,217. I do not follow that?—The average number of children of habitually drunken married women is 6. Am I correct? I think the figure is 6. It is in the inspector's returns in any case.

41,218. You say that the sentence is a maximum of three years. Are these women sent to their homes again at the end of three years, whether cured or uncured?—Yes.

41,219. Do you follow the cases?—We follow the cases as far as we can, but it is very difficult to do so, because only a small proportion of them have a real home to go to.

41,220. Do they return into your hands? Do they come into the courts again and get sentenced to another period?—Yes, a certain number do, but not all of them by any means. Only a small proportion are re-committed to reformatories.

41,221. You find at the end of three years you cannot follow them because only a small proportion of them have regular stable homes?—That is so.

41,222. You do get a certain proportion of cases where the husband is a respectable man?—Yes.

41,223. Do you hold any dealings with the husband in those cases?—We generally keep up communication with him.

41,224. Do you know of cases in which he desires divorce?—Yes, I do.

41,225. You say in your second paragraph that no divorce should be granted unless the drunkard has undergone a period of detention, either voluntarily in a retreat, or compulsorily in a reformatory. Unless the law were altered to make it possible for that to be done compulsorily the drunkard could always avoid proceedings for divorce by refusing to submit to that treatment?—Yes.

41,226. Therefore that does not meet the case as the law stands?—No.

41,227. You propose to alter the law to make it meet it?—When I wrote this I had in mind that some legislation should follow on the lines of the Departmental Committee's Report on Drunkenness, which makes compulsory provision for those non-criminal cases, but that is not the law now. There is no law at the present moment enabling non-criminal cases to be detained against their will.

41,228. The procedure which you recommend would require, as a condition, that the law should be altered to make it possible?—As regards voluntary cases that is so.

41,229. (Sir Frederick Treves.) What do you think is the proportion of individuals who are cured in your institution?—Of criminal inebriates I should say 20 to 25 per cent.

41,230. The remaining cases are hopeless?—Practically.

41,231. What period would you yourself wish to have in order to establish the ground of incurability? You rather hinted at three years?—I say three years because three years is the maximum period that the courts have power to inflict. By giving a three years sentence you stand a better chance of reformation. If you sentenced to shorter periods I do not think your result would be so good.

41,232. Supposing you say incurable drunkenness is a ground of divorce, the next thing is to give the bases for the term "incurability"?—Yes.

41,233. I have gathered it means this, that the individual must have been confined three years, and after that time has become drunk again; in other words, it would take four years to establish a case of incurable drunkenness?—In some cases you could do it in a lot less time than three years. Give a three years sentence and you will establish the incurability shortly afterwards. A three years sentence is giving them the maximum opportunity of reformation.

41,234. As a matter of actual practice, it would take four years to establish a case?—That is so.

41,235. In the case of the incurably drunk, it would be necessary to defer proceedings till four years had elapsed?—Yes.

41,236. You would be satisfied then that the case was really incurable?—Yes.

41,237. What is meant by "a criminal inebriate"?—As the law stands at present a person who has been guilty of certain misdemeanours, such as drunk and disorderly, and drunk in a public place. If in such cases a person has been found guilty three times within 12 months, on the fourth time she is an habitual drunkard under the Inebriates Act of 1898, and can be detained compulsorily.

41,238. The bulk of your inmates are of that type?—Yes. There is also the other type under section 1, which is, that a person who commits a crime caused or contributed to by drink can be tried on indictment and convicted, although it is the first time she or he has been drunk.

41,239. What examples do you give of that?—Cruelty to children is the most common. A person need not have been convicted four times. If she or he can be proved guilty of cruelty to children, and drink is a contributing cause, they may be committed on the first offence.

41,240. The maximum sentence being three years?—Yes.

41,241. What other charges are there besides cruelty to children?—I presume larceny in a person who was drunk, wounding, attempted suicide under the influence of drink—such as those.

41,242. You have examples of all those?—Yes.

41,243. The majority are persons who have been habitual drunkards, or charged with being drunk and disorderly for the fourth time?—Yes.

41,244. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Is three years the maximum period?—Yes.

41,245. I know it is under the present law, but in your view ought three years to be the maximum period for determining whether a case is incurable? Can you say in every case at the end of three years whether a case is curable or not?—I am not prepared to say a case that went wrong after three years was absolutely incurable, but one has to get to a fixed limit somewhere.

41,246. Would you say that the length of period of treatment must depend upon the particular case?—Certainly.

41,247. In some cases it might be very much less than three years, and in some cases it might be more?—Yes.

41,248. You cannot draw a hard and fast rule at all?—I quite agree.

41,249. You have given us very clearly reasons why you think divorce ought to be allowed in a case of incurable drunkenness, and one very strong one is the second one, the danger of a person of that kind bringing children into the world—the undesirability of it. I have no doubt you have thought this out. How is a divorce going to prevent it as to that partner? First of all, would you make it part of the sentence that that inebriate is not to marry again?—I did not intend to do that.

41,250. If you did not, fresh children might be born of another partner?—I agree.

41,251. And the same evil would occur?—That point did not occur to me. I appreciate your point.

41,252. Even if marriage were prevented, in that class particularly I am afraid it would not prevent the likelihood of offspring?—I grant it would not.

41,253. Having regard to the human animal, it is almost impossible by law to say that a man or woman is not to have issue?—That is so.

41,254. I have been wondering, while you were giving evidence, supposing the law were altered in the way you suggest, whether it would have a large operation. You say that about 50 per cent. of the women in your reformatory are married?—Yes.

41,255. Of those, about three-fourths we may take as incurable?—Yes.

41,256. Thirty-seven per cent. You say, if I may say so, very naturally, divorce would be only a practical question where the husband was himself a sober and respectable man?—Yes.

41,257. Then you say that is a very improbable assumption in most cases, and that you mean, of course?—Yes. I find that in most cases.

41,258. Then the residuum of the 37 per cent. of the cases under your care, where the husband is of a character that would entitle him to a divorce, must be very small?—At present I could count them on five fingers—those cases in which a husband would be likely to ask for a divorce.

41,259. Or be entitled to one by his own conduct?—Yes, five would probably cover them.

41,260. (Mr. Brierley.) Langho is an inebriate reformatory for women?—Yes.

41,261. There is a distinction between inebriate retreats and inebriate reformatories?—Yes.

41,262. In retreats persons enter voluntarily, and in reformatories they are sent in lieu of punishment of other kinds?—Yes.

41,263. Could you tell us what proportion of your inmates are sent for being four times convicted within 12 months, and what proportion are sent under section 1 of the Act?—I do not know if I can give you the exact proportion, but I should say the proportion sent under section 1 is very small.

41,264. Are we not right in saying nearly all the inmates of your reformatory are sent for having been four times convicted of drunkenness within 12 months and of being habitual drunkards?—Nearly all.

41,265. You say 25 per cent. are cured. I was rather glad to hear that?—I should say 20 to 25 per cent.

41,266. How do you ascertain whether they are cured or not?—Two years ago I wrote to every chief constable in Lancashire, from whose jurisdiction cases had been committed, and to every charitable society who had been asked to take care of the cases, and my figures were based on their reports. A certain number of cases were untraceable—a good many.

41,267. Otherwise, you arrive at it from the fact that the women have not appeared in the courts again?—Yes, combined with the fact I have had good reports about them and no report of relapses.

41,268. Do you follow them?—To a certain extent. Those that are doing well we can generally trace, and those that are not are lost sight of immediately, probably because they have no homes to go to, and there is no place to trace them to.

41,269. That applies to a considerable number?—It does; it applies to the majority.

41,270. There is no means of tracing a large number of these women?—No.

41,271. Fifty per cent. of them are married. Could you say how many of those married women were leading an immoral life at the time of their sentence?—I have the police records to go by, but I prefer to go by what my own matron and many officers can tell me from women's confidential talks to them. I should say perhaps 90 to 95 per cent. of women sent are immoral.

41,272. In the great majority of cases there is a ground for divorce open to the husband if he wishes to make use of it, apart from drunkenness. The great majority of these women sent to you are prostitutes?—Yes.

41,273. Sent by reason of drunkenness and accosting men in the street?—Yes.

41,274. There would be nothing to prevent the husband getting a divorce?—No. As a matter of fact, there is one case quite recently, in which the husband attempted to divorce his wife, but the proceedings fell through for want of funds, but the husband did attempt to divorce his wife on the ground of immorality, whilst at the same time she was an habitual drunkard.

41,275. You do not suggest that separation orders on the ground of habitual drunkenness should be altogether abolished?—I do not, because I know of one or two cases where the husband and their children are only too glad to be rid of the wife and mother.

41,276. Or the other way round. What do you say to this suggestion: supposing a man or a woman has a separation against wife or husband, and that separation order has lasted for some time and there is no improvement. What do you say to that being a ground of divorce?—I should say it ought to be.

41,277. After a certain time?—Yes.

41,278. If it can be shown that the habitual drunkenness still continues, then there should be a ground of divorce?—I think so.

41,279. (Chairman.) You do not get cases of separation orders sent to you, because they are only made by the magistrates under the Act of 1879 on the application of a husband who proves his facts, if he can. You do not get that class?—No; they only come to us as habitual drunkards, irrespective of the separation order.

41,280. In the separation order cases there is no preliminary test at all; it simply depends on the evidence, whether the evidence can prove a case within the definition apart from detention in a home?—Yes.

41,280A. You think if that continued it might be turned into a divorce, if it became hopeless?—I think so.

41,281. Is it not because it is hopeless the separation order is made?—I presume it is, although the question of separation order never comes under my notice—the cause or the reason.

41,282. If a separation order was justified in being made a permanent one, you think if the grounds were sufficient for it you might just as well give divorce at that time as postpone it?—I agree, if they are satisfied that the case is hopeless. I am willing to admit that.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much for your evidence.

Dr. Robert Welsh Branthwaite called and examined.

41,283. You are an M.D., D.P.H., and His Majesty's Inspector under the Inebriates Act?—Yes.

41,284. Does that inspectorship cover a large area of country?—England and Wales.

41,285. Are there others besides yourself or are you alone?—I have a lady assistant.

41,286. You are really the responsible inspector?—I am the responsible inspector under the Inebriates Act.

41,287. You have been working amongst inebriates for the last 26 years?—Since 1884.

41,288. You have been during the first 15 years of that period in the personal management of three institutions for the control of inebriates; and during the last 11 years you have been engaged in supervising the management of all institutions in England and Wales?—Yes.

41,289. Altogether you have been responsible for the conduct of 51 institutions, and have had personal knowledge of between 9,000 and 10,000 inebriates drawn from all classes?—Yes.

41,290. Does all classes include upper classes too?—Yes.

41,291. Anybody confined in any home?—Yes.

41,292. Perhaps you would just continue your proof?—Yes. Of persons who have entered retreats on their own application (7,654), 66 per cent. were married, 34 per cent. single. Of the married, 85 per cent. were living with husband or wife at the time of admission to institutions, 7 per cent. were widowed, and about 8 per cent. separated or divorced. Of course that refers to persons who have voluntarily entered retreats.

41,293. How long a period does that figure 7,654 refer to?—30 years.

41,294. From the year?—1879.

41,295. Perhaps you will proceed with your proof and we will ask you about it afterwards?—Of persons committed to reformatories from courts, 62 per cent. have been married, 38 per cent. single. Of the married only about 18 per cent. were living with husband or wife at the time of committal, the remainder being separated by order of court, by mutual consent, or by the desertion of the drunken by the sober party.

41,296. You do not give us the total committed by courts. The percentage is given but not the total?—3,300.

41,297. Is that for the same period?—That is from 1898 to 1908, 10 years.

41,298. Will you proceed with the definition?—There is only one statutory definition, that in the Habitual Drunkard Act, 1879, section 3. A habitual drunkard is "a person who, not being amenable to any "jurisdiction in lunacy, is notwithstanding, by reason " of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating " liquor, at times dangerous to himself or others, or " incapable of managing himself or herself, and his or " her affairs." This definition has proved very unsatisfactory in many ways, and the defects have been admitted and discussed by a departmental committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the law relating to inebriates in England, 1908, and by a similar committee appointed by the Secretary for Scotland, 1909.

41,299. Were you on either of those?—I was on the English committee.

41,300. Is that by the Home Office?—Yes.

41,301. Could we get the report?—I have it here. The English committee suggested a definition to take the place of the above, and the Scottish committee an alternative. Would you like both of those?

41,302. We will have those two on the notes?—The English committee suggested the following as an alternative: "An inebriate is a person who habitually takes " or uses any intoxicating thing or things, and while " under the influence of such thing or things, or in " consequence of the effects thereof is (a) dangerous to " himself or others, or (b) a cause of harm or serious " annoyance to his family or others, or (c) incapable " of managing himself or his affairs, or of ordinary " proper conduct." The alternative suggested by the Scottish committee is as follows: "An inebriate is a " person who habitually takes or uses any intoxicant " or narcotic, and while under the influence of such, or " in consequence of the effect thereof, is (a) at times " dangerous to himself or any other person; or (b) at " times incapable of managing himself, or his affairs; " or (c) at times a cause of harm or serious annoyance " to his family or to any other person; or (d) unfit to " have the care of any child of which he is the parent." As a third alternative, I now recommend a definition which does not vary greatly from either of the above; but which seems to me to remove some of the objections to both: "An inebriate means a person who " habitually takes or uses any intoxicants, and while " under the influence of such intoxicants or in con- " sequence of the effects thereof is at times, (a) dan- " gerous to himself, or dangerous or a cause of terror " to others; or (b) a cause of serious harm or suffering " to members of his family or others; or (c) incapable " of managing himself or his affairs." (The expression "intoxicant" to be understood to include any intoxicant liquor, or sedative, narcotic, or stimulating drug or preparation.)

41,303. No doubt you have considered it very fully, but there is a difficulty about that definition I should have thought might occur in practice. What do you mean by habitual. All the rest is very clear?—I never intended it to be in if it could be avoided.

41,304. If you leave it out you get into a difficulty because an inebriate means a person who "takes or " uses any intoxicants, and while under the influence " of such intoxicants or in consequence of the effects " thereof, is at times (a) dangerous to himself." That might happen to an absolutely sober man, who on one occasion got hopelesely drunk, say on Boat Race Day. I am afraid you must have something in to qualify it. "Habitual" is always found difficult to define. My difficulty, on thinking about this matter, is to know what "habitual" means?—I do not think you can define the word.

41,305. You would leave that to common sense?—Yes, leave it to the discretion of a court. The Departmental Committee discussed it for days, but could find no substitute for the word "habitual."

41,306. It must be applied by common sense.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) "At times," I think he relies on that.

41,307. (Chairman.) How often? You do not think there is anything better than that?—No.

41,308. The ordinary sensible magistrate would say "this is habitual" and "this is not"?—Yes.

41,309. That would be a way out of it. Will you proceed with the proof?—

"Inebriety as a cause of conjugal misery.—Although it may be necessary to mention a few cases by way of illustration, I do not propose to submit any detailed collection of instances where inebriety, within my knowledge, has caused impossible conjugal relationship. Domestic troubles from inebriety vary considerably in character, according to the sex of the offender, and the effect of alcohol or drug upon the individual.

"In the case of the inebriate wife.—According to the action of the drug, loss of interest in surroundings, loss of self-respect, neglect of duty, personal uncleanliness; or madness, violence, delusions of suspicion, or a tendency to indecent behaviour. In any case, resulting discomfort, worry and annoyance to sober husband. I have known many women who have not only caused miserable homes, but have actually dragged down sober and hard-working men from comparative comfort to penury. I have known them to pawn movable property, pledge their husband's credit to an impossible extent, and even forge their husbands' cheques. Wealthy husbands suffer in social life, but have remedies not available to others. The working man makes his own arrangements, and no one in his own class blames him. Professional men and tradesmen, whose places of business are immovable, are the greatest sufferers of all."

41,310. About that sentence just above "and no one in his own class blames him." What do you refer to?—He just leaves his wife.

41,311. You mean taking up with someone else?—Yes.

41,312. You left out the words "most effectual ones," and I was not sure whether that was what you referred to?—Yes. In the case of the inebriate husband.—The inebriate husband has more power for active evil than the inebriate wife, the physical pain of brute force being often added to the mental and moral injury he inflicts by his habits. By neglect of business and wanton expenditure he has more power to reduce the family to penury. The woman suffers more with an inebriate husband than when the positions are reversed. Here again, the working class woman has an advantage over her better placed sisters; she is brought up to use her hands, and is therefore able to get clear of her worthless husband and fend for herself.

Should Inebriety be a ground for Divorce?—When approaching the question as to whether or not divorce may be considered a reasonable remedy for such unpleasant situations, it seems necessary to consider what effect it would have upon (1) sober partner, (2) the inebriate one, and (3) the children of a marriage. Divorce from the aspect of the sober party provides undeniable advantages to the sober party.

"Broadly speaking, divorce for inebriety would benefit the sober party only, or practically so, and would be detrimental to the inebriate one.

"Divorce from the inebriate partner's point of view.—The case is materially altered when considered from the point of view of the inebriate partner, for little but disadvantage would result to him or her. Divorce may be considered a questionable proceeding from the point of view of the inebriate because:—

"(1) Inebriety may reasonably be regarded as a diseased state for which the inebriate can hardly be held responsible.

"(2) Inebriety in some of its forms is curable.

"(3) So long as the marriage tie is binding the sober partner often exercises some power for good over the inebriate one. The withdrawal of that restraining influence results in further degradation.

"(4) To many persons, especially to women who have not been brought up to support themselves, divorce means destitution.

"The effect of divorce for inebriety upon the children of a marriage.

"In order to arrive at some sort of conclusion on this head it is necessary to distinguish between paternal and maternal inebriety as they respectively affect children.

"Paternal inebriety.—Generally speaking, if a father has rendered himself dangerous, or a sufficient cause of misery to his wife to lead her to apply for divorce, the children also would probably be safer, happier, and have a better chance of good upbringing apart from him. But financial difficulties interfere. Divorce would probably benefit the children if the mother, or both mother and children, were in possession of sufficient means apart from the father, or if the father was contributing nothing to family finances and hampering a woman who could otherwise earn a living for herself and children. On the other hand in cases where all property is in the hands of the inebriate father, or where, notwithstanding his inebriety, the father is earning something (the mother being impecunious) it is a little doubtful whether divorce on the whole would benefit the children.

"Maternal inebriety.—When the mother is inebriate the subject resolves its itself into the question whether or not her condition is sufficiently bad to justify forcible severance from her children, in their interests. As to this, I fear my experience forces me to a very definite conclusion. If irreformability of the mother can be proved, if mental or physical injury to children can be proved, I think that the best interests of the children demand separation from such a mother's bad influence.

"General Conclusions on the Desirability or otherwise of Divorce for Inebriety.

"Notwithstanding all difficulties, I am of opinion that divorce, for the inebriety of one partner to a marriage should be recognised by law; but restricted to the worst cases and under definite conditions, to prevent abuse. Under no conditions should divorce be possible when both parties are inebriate. I do not think any religious argument should be allowed to interfere with grant of divorce for inebriety; nor do I think we should refuse to benefit the sober partner because the inebriate one may suffer. The sober one deserves, and should be able to command sympathy.

"The Value of Separation Orders for Drunkenness.

"I am of opinion that the separation order for drunkenness is a bad remedy; but am not prepared to endorse the wholesale condemnation which has been hurled at the procedure by many persons. It grants some measure of relief to the sober partner, minimises molestation, and at any rate attempts to enforce a maintenance contribution. It is the divorce of the poor, the only remedy available to them. Lastly, it does not prevent reconciliation and re-union. On the other hand, permanent separation of husband and wife, without dissolution of marriage, constitutes a lasting temptation to immorality unless the parties are well past middle age, or abnormally asexual. It is a condition counter to the law of nature. No separation order should be permanent. If a separation order has been in force three years, if no reform has occurred, and if the person upon whose request the separation was granted still desires it, I think the order should be convertible into divorce. If two persons separate and remain so for three years, and still determine to remain apart, marriage becomes a useless tie, and one that is very detrimental to the sober party."

41,313. Will you allow me to say that this is such a carefully reasoned paper from a person of very great experience, I do not know that I can ask you anything upon it, except with regard to what you say as to separation orders. "It is the divorce of the poor, the "only remedy available to them." Would your experience lead you to think it would be of advantage if the poor had the opportunity of obtaining divorce in a court properly constituted for the purpose?—Yes.

41,314. Have you any doubt about that?—I have no doubt whatever. May I say that the only advantage of a separation order previous to divorce is in its constituting a sort of probationary period. That to me is the only advantage of the separation order over immediate divorce.

41,315. It ought not to be granted to begin with until a state of things has occurred in which there is habitual drunkenness?—That is so.

41,316. But still even then you might advocate letting it go for a short time, such as was reasonable, before it was converted into a ground of divorce. That is what you mean?—A probationary period in the hope of curability.

41,317. (Mr. Spender.) What sort of period would you regard as the test of curability or the reverse. The previous witness said three years?—That is an exceedingly difficult question to answer, but I should prefer two or three short periods of detention with intervening freedom before I should be prepared to say that the man was incurable. I should like to refer on that point to the report of the Departmental Committee, because the suggestions for amendment of the law on that point of curability are very important. We recommend that the sentences should be much shorter to begin with, and be followed by longer ones, as giving a better chance of cure. Not one long sentence, but shorter periods of detention with breaks in between.

41,318. So that the inebriate should go to a home for a few months and return to his own home and be on probation. Is that the idea?—That is so.

41,319. If no bad results followed he would be considered as cured?—I should like the probation period to extend altogether over two years.

(Chairman.) We will get a copy of the report of that Departmental Committee and circulate it among the Commissioners.

41,320. (Mr. Spender.) In the present state of the law, supposing there was an application for divorce on the ground of inebriety, what kind of test do you propose. A previous witness suggested an alteration of the law as a condition of changing the law of divorce?—If the alleged inebriate has not submitted to detention I would give the Court power to order his detention.

41,321. In all cases?—Yes.

41,322. In an ordinary appeal for divorce you could not give the Divorce Court the power of ordering detention?—Why not.

(Chairman.) You could give an order nisi subject to a period of detention.

41,323. (Mr. Spender.) That is the point. Your notion is that it should be part of the machinery that there should be a period of detention?—Certainly.

41,324. Before the decree was granted?—I would never be prepared to certify a person as incurable without a period of detention.

41,325. You would take probability as the guide. You would not say that there was not a chance of the case being cured afterwards?—No; but it would be unlikely.

41,326. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Following Mr. Spender's question, do we gather that an individual who wished to apply this question of habitual drunkenness as a ground for divorce, would have to wait for four years?—Yes.

41,327. In order to establish his claim?—I should make the first condition the existence of inebriety for three years before he made any application for divorce.

41,328. That being proved, how long a time would you allow in order to demonstrate that the case was incurable?—I think a very reasonable answer can be given in about two years.

41,329. That makes five years?—Yes.

41,330. A question has been raised about irregular unions, and so on?—Yes.

41,331. If you have to wait five years, it is very likely that the damage will be all done by that time?—During the first three years of the five there has been presumably no necessity for an irregular union.

41,332. Not on account of the person having been in the retreat the whole time?—No, I am assuming husband and wife to have been living together during the first three years. A man has to come and say "my wife has been an inebriate for three years." He has been living with her during those three years so the irregular union difficulty does not apply.

41,333. The two years do apply?—Yes.

41,334. If that wife at the end of three years is committed to one of these Reformatories for three years, it carries you on to six years, and if you have another year to judge of the effect of the segregation it takes you on to seven years. The only point is this.

Could you give us any reasonable limit that you think would govern the average case?—I am not prepared to let the test of incurability depend entirely upon time. I think an experienced manager of an institution should be able to give a very fair idea as to the curability or incurability of a case. I think this should be the first evidence. After that detention for periods, in the aggregate amounting to about two years, should be required. I do not think I should care to go below two years because I have known many cases recover.

41,335. Then comes your period of final probation?—Yes, the period of final probation.

41,336. What do you say for that?—6 to 12 months.

31,337. It takes it over some little time?—Yes.

41,338. Are you including cases of morphia?—Yes.

41,339. You would not view those in the same light as the alcoholic cases?—I am afraid I do. I have seen just as much misery and domestic trouble arising from the taking of morphia as I have from alcoholic cases.

41,340. Have you seen the same proportion of cures?—Certainly not.

41,341. In women?—In neither sex.

41,342. They would have to be in a separate category in the matter of curability at least. The test that you sketched out just now as applied to alcoholic persons, you would hesitate to apply to morphia patients?—I do not think so.

41,343. How long are these kept in retreats?—On the average about 9 months.

41,344. Is that the maximum?—No, two years.

41,345. In any case at the end of two years they go—under any circumstances?—Yes, but they can re-sign.

41,346. Does the husband contribute to the maintenance of the drunken wife in the retreat?—Yes.

41,347. If divorce took place that payment would cease?—I presume that would be a matter for the court.

41,348. In that case someone must maintain the unfortunate woman in the retreat. That point has to be considered has it not?—I think that might be a subject for an order of the court. It is certainly an important question as to what shall become of the divorced inebriate, I agree; but my important point, the point I want to make to-day, is the necessity for affording relief to the sober partner, notwithstanding the trouble to the drunken one. After all, we have arrangements in the country to prevent starvation even in the worst cases.

41,349. Last of all with regard to your ingenious definition, two previous witnesses were exceedingly strong on one point, that there should be no definition?—I wish we could do without it.

41,350. They were both lawyers and they went out of their way to emphasize that. You do not think that is practicable?—I do not think it is.

41,351. So far as your experience goes, which is, I suppose, really unique, you think your definition would fill up the difficulty as well as any you know of?—I think so, but it is not an easy matter to draw up a definition.

(Chairman.) I am afraid if you cannot do it after 26 years of work, nobody else can. I must thank you very much, on behalf of the Commission, for what seems to me to be extremely valuable evidence.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FIFTY-FIRST DAY.

Tuesday, 13th December 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.	Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.	His Honour Judge TINDAL ATKINSON.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.	EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, BART., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.	J. A. SPENDER, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES, Secretary.
J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY, Esq., Assistant Secretary.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES recalled and further examined.

41,352. (Chairman.) Mr. Secretary, I want you to produce some documents you have?—I have received a Return from Portugal as to the divorce laws in that country, through the Home Secretary. Those are not the Returns from that country as to publication of reports which the Foreign Office is endeavouring to get.

41,353. Those are laws passed since the disturbances?—Yes.

41,354. Well, that will go in?—Then I have the proof of Dr. Hogg, to whom I wrote asking whether he would consent to the Memorandum which he supplied being treated as his evidence as he has been unable to attend; and he says that that course quite meets with his views.

41,355. I do not know that we need read it. You put that in, then?—I put that in. I have also received from Mr. James Dunlop, who is in the Registrar-General's Office in Edinburgh, statistics which he has revised dealing with matters connected with divorce and marriage in Scotland, for the use of the Commissioners.

41,356. Some of the statistics were referred to?—Some of them have been referred to; and Mr. Dunlop has verified all his references, and they are in such form as can be used in the Appendix.

41,357. You can hand in the statistics?—I can hand in the statistics, and they will be printed and circulated to the Commissioners in due course. Then Mr. Pedder——

41,358. He is the gentleman from the Home Office?—Yes—on the Aliens Act. He has sent the 1st, 2nd, 3rd and 4th volumes of the Reports under the Aliens Act, and copies will be sent to the Commissioners.

41,359. Those are what he promised to send?—Yes. There is an explanatory letter which might be appended to his evidence, my Lord.*

41,360. What does he say?—He says he encloses the Blue Books; and then there is his explanation as to some of the details, which I do not think it would be any good detailing until the Commissioners have the opportunity of looking at the tables.

41,361. Then you would propose to put that in at the end of his evidence?—I would propose to put that in at the end of his evidence.

41,362. And then we shall have the tables?—Yes.

Memorandum of Dr. Hogg:—"I have practised "medicine for about 23 years, and for the past "12 years my practice has been entirely among "inebriates, and during these years I have been "resident medical superintendent of the Dalrymple "Home for Inebriates at Ricksmansworth."

"Q. (a) Should habitual drunkenness be a ground for divorce?—A. (a) Seeing that a separation is obtainable under section 5 of the Licensing Act, 1902, and that a permanent separation may involve hardship to the sober partner, who is obliged to live a life of enforced chastity or of adultery, I consider that habitual drunkenness (and habitual drug abuse) should be a ground for divorce. But I am of opinion that opportunity should first be given to the inebriate to reform by placing himself under treatment, and that a period of two years should be allowed for this purpose. In connection with this point, I would further suggest that in the case of the inebriate without means the State should render assistance by allowing him to voluntarily enter a certified or State reformatory without compelling him to qualify for admission by becoming a criminal. At present, under certain conditions specified in the Inebriates Act, 1898, the inebriate law-breaker may obtain treatment gratis at the cost of the country, but the law-abiding inebriate who is without means has no such refuge."

"Q. (b) How would habitual druukenness be defined for this purpose?—A. (b) I suggest that the word 'inebriety' be substituted for 'habitual drunkenness, in order that drug habitues may be included.' This was one of the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on the Inebriates Acts appointed in 1908, to whose definition of the term 'Inebriate' I venture to refer you; with slight modification of their recommendation, the definition might run as follows: 'Inebriety is the condition resultant 'on the habitual use of any intoxicating, sedative 'narcotic, or stimulating preparation or drug whereby 'the consumer, when under the influence of such pre-'paration or drug, or in consequence of the effects 'thereof, is (I) dangerous to himself or others, or '(II) a cause of harm or serious annoyance to his 'family or others, or (III) incapable of managing him-'self or his affairs, or of ordinary proper conduct.'"

"Q. (c) Your opinion as to the value of separation orders in cases of habitual drunkenness?—A. (c) I have known separations to be of value from a reformative point of view in the cases of husbands who had affection for their wives or for their children, but I consider that in the large majority of cases separation is useless unless the inebriate places himself under appropriate treatment and control."

Rev. Dr. HERMANN ADLER called and examined.

(Chairman.) Will you kindly give us your full description?—Ph.D. of Leipsic, Hon. D.C L. of Oxford, and Hon. LL.D. of St. Andrews.

41,363. I think you are the Chief Rabbi in England?—Yes, my Lord.

41,364. You have prepared a short statement of matters relating to Jewish divorce to lay before this Commission?—Yes, my Lord.

41,365. Before reading it I should like to ask you how long you have had experience of England?—My experience dates from the time that I have been Minister prior to having been appointed Chief Rabbi. I was the chief Minister of the Bayswater Synagogue from the year 1864 to 1879. Then, owing to my father's—my predecessor's—advanced age, I was appointed Delegate Chief Rabbi in the year 1879; and when my father died in 1890, I was appointed Chief Rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Empire.

41,366. That enables you to give us the benefit of a very long experience of this country, and of the Jewish questions regarding this matter that information is required about?—I hope so.

41,367. This is evidently a carefully prepared Memorandum; I should be much obliged if you will read it?—I will, my Lord. I will begin by giving a:—"1. Brief historical statement of Jewish Divorce.—The Bible, in recording the institution of marriage, lays down the principle that those who enter upon the conjugal covenant should regard this relation as permanent as their lives. 'Therefore shall a man leave his father 'and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and 'they shall be one flesh.' (Genesis 2: 24.) But the Mosaic law also recognises that circumstances may arise which render the continuance of the matrimonial relation undesirable, if not impossible, when marriage, instead of being the source of supremest happiness, becomes the origin of deepest misery. It is enacted in Deuteronomy 24: 1, 2."

41,368. May we take those verses as read?—Certainly.

41,369. They will appear in the Print?—Certainly. The following are the verses referred to:—"When a "man hath taken a wife and married her, and it come "to pass that she finds no favour in his eyes, because "he hath found some uncleanness in her: then let him "write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her "hand, and send her out of the house. And when she "is departed out of his house, she may go and be "another man's wife." "The interpretation of the "phrase 'some uncleanness' (literally the naked-"ness of a thing) used here is a point on which the "schools of Shammai and Hillel, which flourished in "the first century after the Christian Era, differed. "The former school limited the right of the husband "to divorce his wife to the case of moral delinquency "on the part of the woman, while the school of Hillel "permitted divorce for any cause that might disturb "domestic peace. Though legally the opinion of the "school of Hillel prevailed, divorce was, on ethical "grounds, deprecated by the Rabbis in general. "Stress was laid upon the denunciation of Malachi "(2: 16), 'For the Lord the God of Israel saith, that "he hateth putting away.' A Talmudic maxim is to "the effect 'Tears are shed on God's altar for him "who forsakes the wife of his youth.' It was pro-"vided by the Mosaic law, that the husband was "not allowed to put away his wife by mere word of "mouth, but a formal document was required. The "purpose of requiring this regular and legal document "was obviously to prevent precipitate action, as the "preparation of such instrument would need time and "the intervention of public authority to attest its "sufficiency and its due execution. This provision "was further elaborated by Talmudic law. To consti-"tute a valid Jewish divorce, the grounds on which "the divorce is sought must be stated before the Beth "Din, a competent Jewish tribunal. The husband, "before putting his wife away, was compelled to pay "her the amount promised in the Kelthubah (marriage "contract). The husband was required to put away "his wife when she had committed adultery, this offence "not being viewed merely as an injury inflicted on the "husband, which might be condoned, but as a crime "which saps the foundation of marriage, and makes "its continuance impossible. A divorce was also "required when marriage had been contracted con-"trary to Biblical and Rabbinical law where the union "was not incestuous, such unions being null and void "ab initio. The husband could also be compelled to "divorce his wife, if he was addicted to fornication, if "he refused maintenance and other conjugal rights,

* See Supplement to Mr. Pedder's evidence, referred to in Q. 41,034.

" if adequate proof were given of impotence, if he " maltreated her, and for some other reasons. The " Mosaic law did not permit the husband to divorce " his wife if he had falsely accused his wife of ante- " nuptial incontinences, and if he had ravished her " before marriage. To these two restrictions the " Mishneh adds three others:—(1) When the wife is " insane, (2) when she is in captivity, and (3) when " she is a minor. By a decree of Rabbi Gershon " of Mayence, who lived in the 11th century, it " was enacted that a woman could not be put away " except by her consent. To constitute a valid Jewish " divorce it was essential that a 'bill of divorcement,' " called Get, should be carefully written by a com- " petent scribe. The document is couched in an idiom " composed of Hebrew and Aramaic, and sets forth " that the husband, by his voluntary act, sets his wife " free and gives her full power to marry henceforth " any man whom she may choose. The most minute " rules are given to ensure that there may be no pos- " sible error in regard to the identity of the parties " concerned, nor as to the place where and the date " when the 'Get' is written. This document must be " signed by two competent witnesses, and must be " delivered in the presence of these witnesses by the " husband to the wife either in person, or, if she is in " another town or country, by a deputy appointed for " the purpose and duly accredited. Verbal questions " are put to husband and wife, and declarations have " to be made by them, the scribe, and the witnesses to " ensure that all the parties concerned are fully cogni- " sant of the nature of the proceedings, and that both " husband and wife are consenting parties to the " 'Get.' To ensure the most accurate compliance " with these various rules and formalities, it is required " that the entire act be conducted and supervised by a " Rabbi duly ordained and fully versed in Jewish law. " It is also deemed advisable that he should be assisted " by two assessors, also learned in Jewish law. Divorced " persons were allowed to marry anyone after the " expiration of three months, with the exception of " the individual with whom the husband or wife had " been guilty of adultery."

41,370. Might I ask one question on that. In the copy, which agrees with yours, you say "By a decree " of Rabbi Gershon of Mayence, who lived in the " 11th century, it was enacted that a woman could not " be put away except by her consent." Now, what happened supposing she was a wrong-doer—guilty of adultery—but would not consent to divorce?—That case certainly was an exception. In that case she could be put away without her consent.

41,371. Now taking the case you have already referred to, where she was insane. Then she could not give consent?—No, and as she had done no wrong, her consent was required. If the wife was insane the husband could not put her away because she would not be able to understand the nature of the ceremony and the contents of the instrument, which was handed to her; therefore in that case she could not be put away. Therefore as an insane person could not give consent she could not be put away.

41,372. But adultery would be an exception?—Adultery would be an exception.

41,373. Even though she did not consent?—Even though she did not consent.

41,374. Are there any other exceptions where she did not consent?—Public shameless, immoral, and irreligious conduct, which was viewed as equivalent to adultery.

41,375. Was the consent one which might be somewhat involuntarily given by pressure put upon her?—I do not quite understand, my Lord.

41,376. Supposing the husband said "I will make " your life unbearable unless you do consent." Was the consent then considered a good one—if given under pressure?—Under duress?

47,377. Yes?—Well, no doubt it was the duty of the Beth Din (of the Ecclesiastical Authorities) to examine into the matter to see if any undue pressure was exercised.

41,378. And if it was?—Then no doubt it was their duty to take action. At the present day; of course, this could not occur, because we only give a "Get" after decree has been pronounced by the court, and then naturally as a rule the woman always readily consents.

41,379. May I ask this also. Prior to the 11th century Rabbi Gershon of Mayence enacted that a woman could not be put away without her consent. Was the consent not required before that?—Not strictly according to law. The object of Rabbi Gershon's enactment was to prevent abuses.

41,380. I am asking because I rather think Professor Abrahams indicated that even if there was no consent the husband could for many causes get a decree for divorce?—I have carefully read over Professor Abraham's evidence, and as I say later on I agree with it in the main. I believe as far as I can judge you will find, my Lord, that there is no difference of opinion that is at all material between the evidence given by him and by me.

41,381. At any rate it simplifies my question when you say you have read his evidence over and you think that is right?—Yes, certainly.

41,382. Have you read it in one of the prints of the evidence?—I have read it in the "Jewish Chronicle."

41,383. Was that a full report?—Fairly full I believe, except with regard to the examination; that naturally was only given quite briefly.

41,384. Then No. 2?—No. 2. "The attitude of the Jewish Ecclesiastical Authorities in this country towards Jewish Divorce.—Prior to the passing of the Divorce Act of 1857, the Jewish Ecclesiastical Authorities exercised the power of granting divorce on grounds established by the Jewish matrimonial law. When the Act was passed, some eminent English jurists held that they were still entitled to dissolve a marriage that had been contracted in accordance with Jewish usage. In 1866 the then Registrar-General, Sir George Graham, decided that he could not recognise as valid a divorce a vinculo granted by the Jewish Ecclesiastical Board in London. In accordance with this decision my predecessor in the Chief Rabbinate and I have never granted a Jewish divorce unless and until the marriage previously contracted has been annulled or dissolved by a divorce decreed by an English court that has been made absolute. We hold in accordance with traditional Jewish Law, that while the decree of the court dissolves the civil marriage, it does not affect the religious marriage. To dissolve this it is necessary that the husband should deliver to his wife a bill of divorcement as before described before a competent Jewish tribunal. And I do not permit the parties to marry according to the usages of the Jews until such bill of divorcement has been delivered, because according to Jewish law, such marriage would not be valid. When foreigners who have been married abroad desire to contract a second marriage here they must furnish me with satisfactory proof that the first marriage has been dissolved. In the case of immigrants from Russia the party desirous of re-marrying here has to produce a certificate testifying that the marriage has been dissolved by a competent Jewish religious authority abroad. When such certificate, couched either in Russian or Hebrew, is exhibited to the Registrar-General, he forwards it to me asking my opinion as to the validity of such divorce. When I find that the requirements of the Jewish law have been complied with I submit my opinion to the Registrar-General, who then instructs the Superintendent Registrar of the district to enter notice of the marriage in question."

Now I would give a:—"3. Statement as to the legality of Jewish divorces in Russia and Poland. (A.) Divorce in Russia.—The following Memorandum as to the legality of Jewish divorces in Russia has been kindly furnished to me by Mr. Benjamin Grad, an expert in Russian Law, of 20, Great St. Helens, E.C.:—'In Russia there is neither Civil Marriage nor ' Civil Divorce, but any Russian, whether belonging ' to the Orthodox Faith, or not, can be divorced if ' his religious persuasion permits divorce, and if the ' religious form of divorce is duly complied with. Such ' religious ceremony of divorce, constitutes the valid ' divorce. Such divorces are registered in the registers ' of the respective religious denominations. Any person ' having been duly divorced by his own religious autho'rities can marry again and the issue of such marriage 'is legitimate. There may be some religious com- 'munities, however, which do not permit of re-marriage 'of a divorced person, and an orthodox Russian 'divorced person, if the guilty party, cannot marry 'again. So far as the Jews are concerned, the cere- 'mony of the divorce must be performed according to 'the religious rites, to the satisfaction of the "Crown 'Rabbi," who must register the divorce in his official 'register. As a matter of practice, he always consults 'the "spiritual" Rabbi (Dukhovny Ravvin), although 'the latter has no official status. In some cases the 'Crown Rabbi and the Dukhovny Ravvin are one and 'the same person. A Jew having obtained "get"— 'been divorced—according to the Jewish law, can marry 'again and his marriage, even if "stille chuppah" (or 'clandestine) if contracted in accordance with the 'Jewish law, though primâ facie invalid, could be 'proved to be valid by Russian law, notwithstanding 'that the Crown Rabbi has omitted to register, if the 'parties were bonâ fide. The penalty for non-regis- 'tration is primarily against the Crown Rabbi, but not 'so as to invalidate the religious ceremony whether 'of divorce or marriage. Lately a Parliamentary 'Commission has been sitting. It returned in favour 'of the appointment of divorce by Civil Law, but the 'reactionary party being then in the ascendant, the 'Ecclesiastical Authorities still have jurisdiction over 'divorce. The above statement refers to Russia proper. 'The Laws are different in Poland and the Baltic 'Provinces." (B.) Divorce in Poland.—The following 'statement regarding Jewish marriages and divorces 'was forwarded to the Board of Deputies by a competent 'Russian Counsel. In the Kingdom of Poland there 'is a special law for the Jews at their marriages, namely, 'that besides an ecclesiastical marriage performed by 'the Rabbi a marriage certificate issued by the Officer 'in charge of the State Register is required. If a 'marriage thus contracted, i.e., ecclesiastically and 'officially, has to be dissolved by divorce, it is necessary 'then that the Rabbi should first perform an ecclesi- 'astical divorce, according to the Jewish rites, and with 'such a document of the Rabbi the persons interested 'have to bring suit in order to be granted a formal 'divorce by the Court for civil and property purposes. 'If a marriage has been performed by the Rabbi only, 'without being registered in the State office, then the 'couple so married are given a certificate by the Rabbi 'of their Ecclesiastical Union, which is called an Act 'of Connection, and in that case the Rabbi is empowered 'to give also a divorce, and on the ground of such 'divorce, the couple are allowed to contract a new 'marriage. This way of contracting marriages in 'Poland is customary among the poor only who are 'entirely indifferent as to the consequences of their 'private and property affairs.' 4. Jewish Divorces in this country.—Cases occur from time to time in which parties, who have been married abroad and are domiciled here, apply to me to have their marriages dissolved by a Jewish divorce. When there are grounds that would entitle either of the parties to relief, I refer them to the Court of Divorce. But in most cases they are unable to defray the cost entailed by such application, even if they sue in forma pauperis. And even in the event of their possessing the necessary means they would experience the greatest difficulty in proving the first marriage. The parties thereupon resort to one of the foreign Rabbis, who have settled in this country, and who grant a Jewish divorce in the erroneous belief that since the marriage has taken place abroad, a civil dissolution of such marriage is not necessary. They also grant divorces in cases of mutual consent, or when the husband is compelled by poverty to leave this country, and there is reason to apprehend that the wife will be permanently deserted, and for other reasons. The parties who resort to the Rabbis are, as a rule, illiterate and ignorant of the law of the land, and believe that they are not acting unlawfully. But the results of this procedure are most grave. The husband learns subsequently that the divorce he has obtained is not valid according to English law. When he desires to marry, and gives the required notice to the Superintendent Registrar he describes himself as a bachelor or widower. When the deplorable fact of such false declaration having been made has come to my knowledge on a few occasions, I have deemed it my duty to acquaint the Superintendent Registrar, who of course, refused to issue his certificate. The man then has gone through a form of marriage with the woman he desires to marry, and cohabited with her. Visitors among our poor from time to time report to me the evil consequences of such clandestine marriages and unlawful cohabitation. The husband refuses to maintain his legitimate wife. The woman with whom he cohabits is unable to sue him for maintenance, so that both mother and children become dependent upon charity I am unable to say how many cases of these illegal divorces take place during the year. But unfortunately they are not infrequent. Some Rabbis, who formerly offended in this respect, have yielded to the representations made on the subject by the Board of Deputies, by Lord Rothschild, President of the United Synagogue, and myself, and have ceased doing so. The names of those known to me as at present engaged in these practices are Mr. G. in London, Mr. S. in Manchester, and Mr. R. in Edinburgh."

41,385. Do you want those names put in?—I certainly do not wish it if your Lordship does not think it necessary. I have only supplied initials.

41,386. You see they are not here to speak for themselves?—No.

41,387. And apparently you do not approve of this. Will it be sufficient to say there are cases in which these practices have been adopted?—Yes.

41,388. Without giving the names?—Yes.

41,389. I only mean that unless they are here and have a chance of saying something about it, it perhaps seems a little unnecessary to give the particular names, as long as you call attention to the particular practice? —Oh, quite so, my Lord; I am sure that this will suffice.

41,390. It would be sufficient to put it before such persons who have been engaged in these practices?— The parties concerned have certainly been warned.

41,391. Now with regard to the cases that come under it. Do you think it necessary to set out those cases?—No, not at all. I only put them in in the event of your Lordship requiring them.

41,392. What I think you mean is this; you yourself would not grant a Jewish divorce unless the parties have been properly divorced by the Law Courts of the country?—Quite so.

41,393. But unfortunately, you say, some go and grant Jewish divorces without seeing that the civil divorce has been granted?—Yes.

41,394. And you give one or two typical instances? —Yes; the reason being so as to give the motive for what follows, namely, for the request which we make that the matter should be made penal and punishable in some way. That is why I have mentioned these facts.

41,395. I think I quite appreciate the point. Perhaps it would be as well then to indicate the real point. I think it would do if you take it up at the next page: "Both the Board of Deputies"?—Yes. I only mention there that there is reason to believe in several cases that the parties imagine that a Deed of Separation drawn up by a solicitor, together with the Jewish Get, suffices to set them free to re-marry. "The Board of Deputies, Lord Rothschild and I have repeatedly warned the Rabbis to desist from granting these irregular divorces, but except in a few instances without avail, as besides informing them of the disastrous consequences of their action, we are unable to point out to them any law which they are guilty of breaking. They may also suppose that the procedure valid in their native country is valid here I would therefore ask, whether it would not be possible to introduce legislation imposing a penalty on all persons assisting at, or taking any part in, the pronouncing of a Jewish divorce except after and on production of a decree absolute of the Divorce Court of England, or proof of a previous legal divorce elsewhere. Such law would, of course, not interfere with the duty imposed upon the recognised Jewish Ecclesiastical Authorities to grant the Jewish divorce after the marriage has been civilly dissolved, so as to enable the parties to re-marry in the synagogue. The Ecclesiastical Authorities should also be permitted, when parties have been married abroad, and the husband is domiciled there and has obtained a Jewish divorce, which is valid there, to complete such divorce in the interests of his wife, who may be residing here." Giving my personal opinion on the grounds of divorce I would say, "I do not plead for any alteration on the law as to the ground on which persons are entitled to petitions for dissolution of marriage. I am painfully aware that grave hardships are inflicted by the fact that the law as it stands does not grant divorce in cases of insanity, flagrant cruelty and long imprisonment for crime; but I believe at the present day facilities for divorce do not tend to raise the moral standard of a community. At the same time I deem it eminently desirable in the interest both of necessitous Jews and Christians, that the procedure for obtaining divorce should be made less costly than it is at present. In conclusion I beg to refer to the evidence given by Mr. Israel Abrahams on November 24th. His account of Jewish Divorce during the first century of the Common era is both able and complete. With regard to the statistics which Lord Gorell has been good enough to give as to decrees nisi pronounced in 1907–8, I beg to supplement the number of Jewish marriages solemnized in those years. In 1907, when 10 decrees were granted, the number of marriages according to Jewish rite was 1,964. In 1908, when the decrees numbered 17, 1,856 marriages were solemnized. I believe that this proportion does not compare unfavourably with that of the rest of the population. If this is the case, it is due to two facts:—(1) That cases of drunkenness, so fruitful a source of domestic strife and of misconduct, are very rare among the Jewish population; and (2) That great importance is attached to the duty of endeavouring to reconcile husband and wife, this being a sacred obligation devolving on the Beth Din. It may be of interest to note in connection herewith a statement in the Jewish Ritual Code (Eben ha-ezer, 154, § 3) 'That if 'there is any doubt as to the originator of a quarrel, 'the husband is not believed when he asserts that the 'wife has commenced the dispute, as all women are 'presumed to be lovers of peace.'"

41,396. That is the completion of the Memorandum?—Yes, my Lord.

41,397. May I just ask you one question about it. You say, Dr. Adler, on the second page of your Paper, this: "The husband could also be compelled to divorce "his wife if he was addicted to fornication, if he "refused maintenance and other conjugal rights, if "adequate proof were given of impotence, if he mal-"treated her and for some other reasons." Have you got that passage?—Yes.

41,398. Would you tell me first how that was done on the part of the wife?—By the wife applying to the Jewish Tribunal, called the Beth Din, in those days when the Jews still had autonomy in the Holy Land and in Babylonia, by the infliction of forty stripes and by the withdrawing of religious privileges, which would be tantamount to excommunication.

41,399. Did that mean that by virtue of those powers they compelled him to present a bill of divorcement?—Yes. Of course there was some discrepancy between this compulsion and the fact that the divorce had to be given voluntarily by the husband; but it was assumed that although his lower nature might resist still by these suasions and chastisement, his better nature would prevail and his will would finally consent.

41,400. To present a bill?—To present a bill of divorce.

41,401. Was it correct then that she could in fact get a bill (force him to present one) if he refused to maintain her?—Yes, if he steadfastly refused maintenance after being summoned again and again and still refused, although able to do so, after the ecclesiastical authorities had satisfied themselves that he was in a position to maintain her.

41,402. Then what would be the position if he had left the country or deserted her?—Then every endeavour would be made by communicating with the ecclesiastical authorities of the country in which he dwelt to compel him to send over a bill of divorce.

41,403. But that, in fact, would be giving her the right to obtain a decree in an indirect way for desertion?—Yes, but the husband was required to send the "Get"—the bill of divorcement.

41,404. I quite understand, but he would be pressed to do it?—Would be pressed by all possible means.

41,405. Supposing the pressure was successful the effect would be that she would get the divorce from her husband because he had deserted her?—Quite so, yes.

41,406. Then the other point I want to ask you upon is this: "Also if he maltreated her." Would that be cruelty?—Yes, that would be mean cruel and persistent maltreatment.

41,407. The same course might be followed then?—Quite so.

41,408. And you say here: "And for some other reasons." What are those other reasons?—The other principal reasons are if he is afflicted with a loathsome disease, if he has become an apostate, if he has committed a crime for which he is compelled to leave the country.

41,409. Does that complete it?—Yes, those are the principal reasons.

41,410. What period was it that that particular practice applied to? Does it apply in Jewish law now?—It does apply in Jewish law now. But I would lay stress upon what our Code says as to the grounds of divorce. The commencement of our Ritual Code with regard to divorce is that the man must not divorce his first wife unless he has found in her the uncleanness of a thing; that is moral delinquency.

41,411. If a woman left the country what would be the position then? I do not know whether they had the means or opportunity of doing it in olden times?—Then the following would be the course; it would be absolutely necessary that a communication should be established by the Beth Din—the ecclesiastical authorities of the country where the husband lives with the ecclesiastical authorities of the place where the woman is, and the woman would be cited before the Beth Din, and would be asked: Are you willing to accept the religious divorce—the "Get"—from your husband; and then the ecclesiastical authorities would deem it their duty to communicate with the Beth Din of the place, giving also the names of the deputy who would there be appointed to receive the "Get" on behalf of the wife.

41,412. That would make the consent you mean?—Yes.

41,413. But suppose she said: "I do not give my consent, but I have left"?—Then it would be quite impossible to compel her. One could not compel her to receive the "Get" unless it is established that she had been guilty either of adultery or of notoriously immoral and irreligious conduct.

41,414. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Just one point I want to ask you about. You told us that now sometimes foreign Jews come to this country and want a divorce, and there may be a case for it according to our Civil law, but they cannot get it because they have no means and because it would be extremely expensive to prove their marriage?—Quite so.

41,415. What is the remedy you propose for that state of things?—The remedy is that if possible the cost should be reduced in the case of necessitous persons. The engagement of the solicitor apart from the fees, weighs very heavily upon those poor people.

41,416. I follow. That meets the difficulty of the expense of the procedure, but it does not seem to meet the difficulty of proof of first marriage?—I agree. It is necessary to prove the first marriage, but it could be perhaps regarded as sufficient if the marriage contract, which is written in Hebrew, could be exhibited, and an expert would be always willing to explain and indicate that that constitutes a valid Jewish marriage.

41,417. (Chairman.) Might I assist Sir Lewis in this way. I think you have often been before the Court when I have presided when the petitioner has produced the certificate that he has got from the foreign country, and you have said that that shows a good marriage?—Yes, my Lord.

41,418. That is the cheapest and easiest way of proving it?—Yes.

41,419. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Would that apply to every Jewish marriage abroad? Would there always be such a certificate?—Yes, certainly. But, it may be lost. When it has been lost there would be great difficulty, because in Russia and Poland no regular registers are kept, and then there would be immense difficulty.

41,420. That is what I am thinking of. There must be parts of the world where this system of certificates does not work regularly, or is not in existence?—To the best of my knowledge the Hebrew marriage contract is used by Jews everywhere; when lost, the testimony of two trustworthy witnesses who say the parties have been living together, and are reputed to be man and wife, is sufficient. Of course, I do not say we should go to the Scotch way of proving a marriage, but it would be advisable to make it a little easier than at present.

41,421. You think there might be some evidence of repute?—Yes.

41,420. (Lord Guthrie.) How many Jews are there in Great Britain, roughly?—I should think 250,000.

41,423. England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales?—I believe so.

41,424. With regard to matters of opinion that you have been good enough to give us, has there been any consultation on this matter amongst the Jews, or are you giving us your own individual opinion only?—Certainly on the main point that I have brought before you I have carefully deliberated with the Law and Parliamentary Committee of the Board of Deputies, and you will hear subsequently that they agree with me; and naturally I have also consulted my assessors—the members of the Ecclesiastical Court, on the subject, and they are fully at one with regard to the main points I have brought before the Commission.

41,425. Does that include the view yon have expressed as to increased grounds or facilities for divorce? Is that a view you have discussed with them, or is that your individual opinion?—I feel it my duty to say it is my own individual view—my personal view, and not one to which I could commit either the Board or the community, or even my colleagues.

41,426. You have given us a very interesting historical account. Can you tell me in the time of Christ what was the state of the divorce law and practice as distinct from the time before and the present time?—I believe that there is very little difference, except that one matter quoted in Mark x. 12, where the Founder of Christianity said, "And if a woman shall put away her husband;" from which it would appear that at that time a woman had the right to divorce—probably this only refers to very exceptional cases—the well-known cases of Salome and Herodias, because it was very much discountenanced that a woman should have this right, as we know from the history of the Romans what terrible immorality this led to—as proved by the satires of Juvenal and the poems of Martial.

41,427. You are aware that Christ founded His views on certain passages in Genesis?—Yes.

41,428. Are the views held by Jews with regard to marriage and divorce dependent on these passages?—I cannot with sufficient emphasis state how strongly at the present day the views of Jews are ruled by the statement, "Therefore shall a man leave his "father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; "and they shall be one flesh," and also, "It is not "good for man to be alone, I will make him a help-"meet for him." There is one point on which I did not dwell at all, which I ought to have mentioned, and that is the profound sanctity which the Jews attach to the marriage state. The first and one of the most important duties of a Jew is declared in the words at the commencement of Genesis, "be fruitful and multiply." Therefore the duty devolves upon a Jew to marry, hence the blessedness of marriage and of the marriage state. Nothing is considered more meritorious than the marriage state in accordance with the words, "It is not good for man to be alone." For that reason in the Jewish law, if now and again it would seem that there are undue facilities for divorce, it is due to the fact that marriage without happiness, and a marriage without the hope of having children, was considered as nullifying the object for which wedlock had been instituted.

41,429. You are aware that some Christians think those words you have quoted in Genesis exclude the possibility of divorce?—I am perfectly aware.

41,430. Have the Jews ever taken that view at any period of their history?—No, no real Jews; that is quite certain. A certain sect, and probably two sects, the Zadokites, concerning which there has been a remarkable document discovered by Dr. Schechter in Cairo; they certainly did not permit divorce; and perhaps also the Dositheans, but they were heretics; it was not the Jewish view.

41,431. Did those sects, or either of them, exist in the time of Christ?—They were before Christ. But probably some of the ideas must have been entertained in the time of Christ.

41,432. You told us as to the existence of the two schools, the School of Shammai and the School of Hillel; that dispute existed in the time of Christ?—No, Hillel and Shammai, the two individuals, were at the time of Christ, but the schools represented by the names of Hillel and Shammai lived a century after Christ.

41,433. But at the time of Christ there was the dispute going on, was there not, which was associated with those two names?—Probably; I could by no means say positively that there was this difference of opinion then, because we cannot say for certain that the School of Shammai and the School of Hillel represent the views of their respective masters.

41,434. Mr. Abrahams seems to put to us, Dr. Adler, what we have understood from other sources, that in the time of Christ there was an acute difference of opinion amongst the Jews somewhat representing those two schools. Is not that so?—Possibly; but I will gladly further investigate that point with regard to the evidence we have whether the Schools of Shammai and Hillel, literally the houses of Hillel and Shammai, represent the opinion of their respective teachers.*

41,435. You see that it is extremely important, because every Christian scholar, whatever his views on divorce, has assumed that in the time of Christ there was this acute question; so that, if you have anything further to tell us about it, you might kindly look into it?—I certainly will do so.

41,436. Does that difference of opinion still exist amongst the Jews, or are they now unanimous on their views of divorce?—As I said, the opinion of Hillel prevailed, namely, that divorce was not confined to those cases where the wife had been guilty of immorality. There may be divorce for other causes. Yet as a wise ethical maxim at the head of the laws concerning divorce the rule is declared that a man shall not divorce his first wife unless and except he has found an uncleanness in her—that is, moral delinquency.

41,437. It is with regard to the other causes that I ask the question. Is there difference of opinion

* The question whether the Schools of Shammai and Hillel represent the opinions of their respective teachers as to divorce is not easy of solution. The following reason disposes me to answer it in the negative. Though in the Mishneh (Eduyoth, c. I., §§ 1-3; Chagigah, c. II., § 2) several matters are cited on which Hillel and Shammai differed, the mention of divorce is not included. Per contra, on other points the Schools differed, and yet no divergence with respect to them on the part of the masters is mentioned. There is no evidence in Talmudic sources for the assumption that acute controversy existed on the subject of divorce at the rise of Christianity.

It would appear that the opinion of the School of Hillel represented the legal aspect—the right of the husband to put away his wife for any cause that disturbed domestic peace. This was the view accepted by the people, and is stated by Philo and Josephus to have been the general practice. The opposite view taught by the School of Shammai, limiting the right of the husband to cases of moral delinquency, represented the standpoint set forth in the teaching of the prophet Malachi (II., 13-16).

amongst the Jews of the present day as to what other causes should be held sufficient?—There is no difference, I believe, on that point.

41,438. Then I notice in the country of Hungary they provide separately for Catholics, Greek Orientals, Protestants, Jews, and mixed marriages. I presume the grounds of divorce which they allow for the Jews must have been at the request of the Jews. There is a special provision for the Jews?—I should think so, certainly.

41,439. They are nine in number you know. Might I just ask you to tell me whether these causes represent the causes which Jews generally think ought to be allowed. The first is on the agreement of both consorts?—Certainly, my own individual opinion shared, I have no doubt, by the majority of those in England, and also I should hope of other countries, is that that should not constitute a valid ground. I hold it would be terribly dangerous that as soon as there was the slightest dispute between the husband and wife they might say, "Oh, this is an excellent way of getting rid "of each other"; while we all know that if it is once established that no divorce could be had on such ground husband and wife would try everything in their power to heal their dissensions and endeavour to live in amity. I would certainly be opposed strongly to such a ground.

41,440. Then that first ground does not represent the general opinion of Jews as you know it?—No, sir.

41,441. Secondly, "Adultery"?—That we are all agreed upon.

41,442. Thirdly, "If one of the consorts embraces "Christianity and the other party declined to do so "and to continue conjugal life." You are agreed upon that also?—In such a case I certainly think that the husband or wife, as the case may be, and the Beth Din should use their utmost endeavours to bring this consort to the former religious belief. But there again I would say we have had such cases in this country where we have been asked to grant divorce, but as such divorce is not acknowledged by the law of the land, we have refused and said we could not grant a divorce as the Courts of Divorce would not grant a divorce on such ground. But I think it would be advisable to make this a ground of divorce after every possible endeavour had failed.

41,443. That is what is postulated in the law?—In such a case the other party should decline to continue conjugal relations.

41,444. Then 4: If one of the consorts is found to have committed a crime, does that represent the Jewish opinion generally, apart from the law of different countries?—Certainly not the commission of crime, unless it is punished by life-long imprisonment; unless there comes with it deportation, and the wife is unable to accompany her husband; then there would be ground for divorce.

41,445. Then the next is abandonment, which I suppose means wilful and malicious desertion, which is proved to be permanent. Is that considered by the Jews generally to be a proper ground for divorce?—It might seem to be a relief to the poor woman, so as to prevent her becoming a burden, either to the public authorities or to herself, through inability to maintain herself.

41,446. But is it generally considered amongst the Jews a proper ground for divorce—permanent desertion?—I could only give my own individual opinion, as the matter had not come before us as to whether we would wish to see the grounds of divorce widened and enlarged. We have not considered it, and, as I said before, I am giving my own individual opinion. But there is grave question in making this a ground. A man gets tired of his wife and therefore proceeds to desert her. If he knows that on that ground he could be divorced that would be an incentive and stimulus to him to desert his wife, and that would be a most unfortunate thing, as I hold that anything that could lower the idea of the sanctity of the marriage should be deprecated as emphatically as possible. I am certain I am giving the opinion of Jews in this country, and of all countries—that anything that tends to lower the idea of the sanctity of the marriage tie must be avoided and prevented as much as possible.

41,447. You see, Doctor, that is not quite the question. In Hungary the Jews have obtained the right of divorce on the ground of abandonment or desertion. Do you say the Jews in England take a different view from the Jews in Hungary?—No, the Jewish law is certainly strongly in favour of giving relief to a deserted woman, so that she may re-marry. But we have anxiously kept aloof from proposing desertion as a ground of divorce, so as not to touch the law as it stands, and to prevent the idea going forth that we are not satisfied to uphold the law as it stands Therefore, we have not touched that question at all.

41,448. But, Doctor, we are wanting to ascertain what would be right for everybody in the country. You are not prepared to tell us what the views of the Jews are with regard to the future laws in this country for them as well as for others?—I should certainly think that on this point there would be a difference of opinion between the recent arrivals and those that have become completely Anglicised. Those who have recently immigrated would wish, desire and welcome such an increase in the grounds. The English and the Anglicised would be against it.

41,449. Unanimously?—For the greater part. It is a little difficult to say positively, but, speaking generally, I think that division would hold.

41,450. And that would apply to the other causes as well?—I think so.

41,451. Looking at what you have said about Scripture, would that apply to insanity or would the Jews be unanimously against insanity: because you say it is only for uncleanness—moral fault of some kind, and insanity there is not necessarily anything but the act of God?—Quite so. The question of insanity naturally appeals to everyone, and it is felt to be a terrible, deplorable hardship for both parties.

41,452. But would not your Scriptural view almost exclude insanity?—There would be this difficulty. As the Bill of Divorce has to be given with the knowledge and with the consent of both parties, when either of them is insane that difficulty would arise.

41,453. Can you tell me whether you have any knowledge of the conditions in Ireland, where there is no divorce except by Act of Parliament. Have you ever had any grievance alleged—amongst the Jews in Ireland?—I have not heard that there is any grievance. As far as I can remember I can only recollect one case of a divorce that happened recently in Dublin.

41,454. Just one other question, Doctor. From what you said one quite appreciates that you believe that the facilities for divorce do not tend to raise the standard of morality. In Ireland there is no divorce except by Act of Parliament. In England there is divorce for adultery, of which the Jews avail themselves. Do you find that the existence of divorce has lowered the standard of morality amongst the English Jews as against the Irish Jews?—Certainly not.

41,455. In the Scotch Courts there is divorce for desertion, of which the Jews avail themselves (they have been in my court). Are you prepared to say the standard of morality is less high, and the sacredness of the marriage relation less high, among Jews in Scotland than in England?—I am not prepared to say so. I have not the statistics of divorce in Scotland, but only in England.

41,456. But you know the general state?—Oh, yes; and I am by no means prepared to say that the state of morality among the Jews in Scotland is lower than in England.

41,457. Then if you take the Jews in Hungary, where they have the possibility of getting divorce for cruelty and for desertion, and for crime; have these facilities, in point of fact, tended to lower their standard of morality or their sense of the permanence of the marriage tie as compared with the Jews in England?—I am not prepared to say so.

41,458. But is not that a very important question?—Yes, but I do not think it would be just on my part to say so. I can make inquiry on the subject. Dr. Büchler, who is Principal of our Jews' College, is a Hungarian. From what one hears I think I ought to say it would appear that the state of morality among people generally in Hungary compares somewhat unfavourably with the state of morality in some other countries. I have certainly heard that.

41,459. Of course it is not a mere question of morality. It is a question of whether the permanence of the marriage tie is lowered in the minds of the Jews. You are not prepared to say that these extended grounds have in point of fact, where allowed, lowered the sense of the permanence of the marriage tie?—I believe that extension of the grounds is always fraught with that great danger.

41,460. But we would like to know facts, Doctor, Are you prepared to put before us any facts showing that among the Jews where they have the extended facilities the permanence of the marriage tie has suffered. You are not prepared to do that, I understand?—No, except that I would say this, that in some of the countries in the East—in Russia and Poland—one hears, without the slightest degree impugning the morality of the people, that there is not so strong a faith in the permanence of marriage that there is in other countries where there are not equal facilities.

(Chairman.) I have to thank you very much, Dr. Adler, for your very valuable evidence.

Mr. DAVID LINDO ALEXANDER, K.C., called and examined.

41,461. You are one of His Majesty's Counsel?—I am.

41,462. And you practise at the Bar?—I retired two or three years ago.

41,463. I was not aware of that, but at any rate you have been?—For more than 40 years,—42 years I think.

41,464. Are you President of the London Committee of Deputies of the British Jews?—I am.

41,465. Which is commonly known as the Jewish Board of Deputies and which is the only representative body of Jews in the British Empire?—That is so, my Lord.

41,466. Would you kindly read your paper?—I will. "I am the President of the London Committee of Deputies of the British Jews which is commonly known as the Jewish Board of Deputies and which is the only representative body of Jews in the British Empire. The Board has existed for 150 years, having been founded in the year 1760, and it is now composed of 121 deputies, of whom 43 are the elected representatives of 27 metropolitan congregations, 74 the elected representatives of 73 provincial congregations, and 4 the elected representatives of four Colonial congregations."

41,467. Is it right what Dr. Adler stated, that there are about 250,000 Jews in the British Islands?—Yes, 240,000 or 250,000. "The Board is the recognised medium for communication with the Government, and, during the last 74 years, it has enjoyed Parliamentary recognition, the duty of certifying marriage secretaries for the registration of Jewish marriages being under the Marriage Acts entrusted to the President for the time being of the Board. Under the Marriage Acts of 1836 and 1857, Jews are permitted to solemnize their marriages according to their own usages, provided that due notice to the Superintendent Registrar shall have been given and his certificate or licence shall have been issued for the marriage; and every possible precaution is taken by the Board in conjunction with the Chief Rabbi to ensure a compliance with these statutory conditions and also to prevent the solemnization of marriages, which although allowable by Jewish matrimonial law, are prohibited by English law. Where a person intending marriage has been previously married, the Chief Rabbi always requires strict proof of the death of the former husband or wife (as the case may be), or of the legal dissolution of the previous marriage. To prove such dissolution, he requires in the case of an English domicil, production of a decree absolute of the English Court of Divorce, and in the case of a foreign domicil, production of clear and satisfactory evidence that the previous marriage has been fully dissolved according to the law of the foreign domicil, and he withholds his authorisation until such evidence is produced to him. Moreover, the Chief Rabbi never pronounces a Jewish divorce unless it is preceded by a civil divorce in this country or elsewhere There are, however, a few foreign Rabbis in this country who presume not only to solemnize Jewish marriages in the absence of the Superintendent Registrar's certificate or licence—which marriages are called "Still Chuppah" (i.e., clandestine) marriages—but also to grant Jewish divorces not preceded by a civil divorce in this country, and for many years past such irregular proceedings on the part of these foreign Rabbis have been a constant source of trouble to the Board. The Board has taken every available step within its power to put a stop to such marriages and divorces, but I regret to say with little or no success. The position taken up by these rabbis is, that it is their duty to administer the Jewish matrimonial law and that where the English law conflicts with Jewish law the former must give way. As regards Jewish divorces, these foreign Rabbis still continue to grant them in spite of their knowledge of the want of legality. Every year cases are brought to the attention of the Board and the number of these so-called divorces is decidedly on the increase."

41,468. Would you be in favour, as Dr. Adler was, of making that penal unless there was a legal divorce in this country?—Certainly.

41,469. Or in the country of the domicile?—Certainly; that is what I am going to suggest later on.

41,470. Because it places them in a false position in the eye of the law altogether?—Certainly. That is what I am going to ask for. "The evil consequences of such divorces are extremely serious, for the divorced parties are led to believe that their marriage has been validly dissolved and that they are quite free to contract a fresh marriage. Even when the divorced husband is aware of the want of legality the divorced wife is as a rule ignorant of it, for the bill of divorcement handed to her by her husband purports to give her full power to re-marry. More often than not a Jewish divorce is followed by the re-marriage of one or both of the divorced parties, with the result that the party so re-marrying is guilty of bigamy and adultery. But the mischief does not rest there. Cases frequently come under the notice of the Board in which the divorced husband deserts his second wife, or the divorced wife is deserted by her second husband. In neither case can the woman obtain a maintenance order against the man who has deserted her, and the mischief is naturally accentuated when, as often happens, there are children of such a second marriage, for besides being illegitimate they are as a rule wholly unprovided for and become dependent on charity. Such re-marriages are usually of the Stille Chuppah type but occasionally they take place at a registry office, the divorced party assuming a name slightly different from his or her own, or describing himself or herself as a bachelor or spinster. A further evil arising out of these Jewish divorces is, that unless the divorced wife can prove that she did not consent to the proceedings she can neither obtain a maintenance order against her husband on the ground of his desertion nor a decree of divorce even where he has married again, for, in the absence of such proof, she is taken to have connived at his subsequent marriage and adultery. I will here mention two typical cases."

41,471. Is not the point so plain that the cases are not necessary?—Just as your Lordship thinks fit. They are cases that came before the Courts; there is no need for secrecy.

41,472. Then we had better have them. Reported cases?—Reported cases; so I think there is no possible objection to my mentioning these two cases.

41,473. Certainly?—"In the year 1908, a case of Friedberg v. Friedberg came before the Court on a petition of a wife asking for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's bigamy and adultery. It appeared that the parties were married in 1902 at Riga, in Russia, in accordance with the law of that country, and that immediately after their marriage they came to England and settled in Manchester. In April 1907, the husband took his wife to a house in Manchester when, in the presence of a Rabbi named Schlossberg and a number of other persons, a bill of divorce or 'Get' was presented to her and a formal ceremony of divorce gone through. After that the husband left the wife with two children, and on the 4th May of the same year under the name of Frankenberg, which he assumed, went through a ceremony of marriage at a registry office at Glasgow with a Miss Stringer, by whom he had a child, born on the 3rd June 1908. Another case of a Jewish divorce came before the Court only a few months ago. From the report in the 'Times' for the 18th February 1910, it appears that one Samuel Lobe Levi was married to Sarah Levi, whose maiden name was Goodman, at Byron Street, Leeds, on 31st May 1898; that on 6th January 1903, he was granted by Rabbi Schapino, then resident at Amsterdam, a certificate of the dissolution of his marriage with Sarah Levi, and that on the 4th October 1903, he was married at Leeds to Leah Abrahams by a man styling himself Rabbi Solomon Oswer." I have the full report of the "Times" here. Quite recently another case has been reported to my Board, but I propose not to refer to it, as I have not been able to verify the facts and I should not like to state anything that I am not sure of, and it has not come before the Courts. I have inquired very carefully into that case, but I cannot get a complete answer, and I should not like to put anything before your Lordship unless the facts are quite certain; so I have struck out that case.

41,474. Yes, quite right?—"The misery caused in such cases is entirely due to the action of the foreign Rabbis in this country, for without their assistance these irregular divorces could not take place. They invariably charge a fee for the performance of the ceremony, which in many instances induces the parties to believe that he is a person having authority to dissolve their marriage legally. At the end of 1908, the Board finding itself powerless to stop such irregular proceedings on the part of these Rabbis, and in special view of a so-called divorce granted by a gentleman in the East of London, decided to place the matter before the Registrar-General. Accordingly in company with Mr. Henriques (a Vice-President of the Board) I had an interview with the Registrar-General when he asked to have the facts and the suggested legislation laid before him in writing in order that he might confer with the Law Officers of the Crown. Thereupon a statement was prepared and forwarded to him on the 16th February 1909, a copy of which I now produce, and in order to avoid unnecessary repetition, I ask that that statement may be treated as part of my evidence on the present inquiry."

41,475. Is that the statement on the next page?—Yes, my Lord. Perhaps I should read it.

41,476. I think we have all read it. It will be put in the print as part of your evidence?—Yes, I should like it to be put in the print. A good deal of what I have already said would be repetition. If it is put in as part of my evidence I think that will be satisfactory.

41,477. Yes.

The following is the statement referred to:—

London Committee of Deputies of the British Jews.

19, Finsbury Circus,
London, E.C.,
16th February 1909.

"SIR

"IN accordance with your suggestion at our recent interview, we beg to submit to you the following statement as to Jewish irregular divorces ('Gittin'), which are causing considerable trouble:—

"You are aware that the Chief Rabbi does not authorise the celebration of any Jewish marriage in the United Kingdom unless the provisions of the Marriage Acts have been complied with. When a person whose marriage has been legally solemnised in England desires to re-marry here, he requires strict proof that he or she is a widower or widow, or that his or her marriage has been previously, legally and fully, dissolved by the decree absolute of the Divorce Court of this country. When a foreigner whose marriage has been both solemnised and dissolved abroad desires to re-marry in this country, he requires him or her to prove that he or she is a widower or widow, or to produce a certificate testifying that the marriage has been dissolved by competent Jewish Ecclesiastical Authorities abroad, and when such certificates, which, as a rule, are in Hebrew or Russian, have been exhibited to you, you have constantly forwarded them to the Chief Rabbi, and he has then submitted to you his opinion as to the validity or invalidity of such divorces. But we regret to say that there are some foreign Rabbis who have settled in this country who presume to dissolve a marriage between persons residing here by granting to them 'Gittin' according to the mode prescribed in Deuteronomy xxiv. 1—4, the husband under their direction handing 'a bill of divorcement' to his wife without the marriage having been previously dissolved by the Divorce Court of this country. As a rule they do this in the following cases:—

"1. When the marriage has taken place abroad, some people are under the erroneous belief that in such cases it is not necessary for the parties to obtain a decree of the Divorce Court of this country.

"2. When the marriage has taken place here, and the wife has been guilty of adultery, the Rabbis in question holding that, according to the Jewish law, it is the duty of the husband to divorce the wife, having found 'some uncleanness in her,' and that as a Rabbi it is his duty to grant the 'Get.' He probably fails, however, to inform the parties that a decree of the Divorce Court of this country is still essential for the dissolution of the marriage.

"3. When the marriage has taken place either here or abroad, and there is incompatibility of temper between the parties, or the husband threatens to leave his wife, the Rabbi in such cases considers that he is releasing the woman by granting 'Get,' and therefore is doing her an act of charity.

"But these Rabbis, unfortunately, do not realise that their action involves great hardship, as neither party is enabled, according to the law of England, to re-marry after a mere religious divorce, and as a result it often happens that they either go through a form of irregular marriage or simply cohabit without even a marriage ceremony. These Rabbis have been warned that they are directly assisting at these undeniable results, but without avail. It may be taken as a fact that in the majority of cases Jewish couples seeking the assistance of these Rabbis for the purpose of 'Get' have not the slightest suspicion that the ceremony does not entirely release them from their marriage obligations, and, generally, either one or the other of the parties subsequently seeks to contract a fresh marriage. Even in those few cases in which the husband has some knowledge of the fact that the ceremony has no legal value, it is unlikely that the wife is similarly well-informed. Our Board has on several occasions been informed that these irregular divorces are being granted, but finds itself quite impotent to check them. Our Board generally does not get information of these divorces until the wife, who has subsequently re-married, finds herself deserted by her so-called second husband and without any legal remedy for maintenance, or otherwise; for even if she can trace her first husband, should she endeavour to obtain restitution of conjugal rights from him, she will probably find it beyond her power to strictly prove in a court of law her first marriage, for in the majority of cases it will be found that it was solemnised abroad. Moreover, should she succeed, she will have proved her own bigamy and adultery. In such cases the woman and her children usually become dependent on charity. We were some time ago informed of a case in which the same person underwent several successive 'divorces' in each case followed by a further 'marriage.'

"The number of these divorces tends to increase. Last year, as a test case, a Russian-born woman named Friedberg, who had been married in Russia, was assisted to bring civil divorce proceedings against her husband, on the ground that after divorcing her by 'Get' in this country he had subsequently re-married, and had thus committed bigamy and adultery. She established an English domicile to the satisfaction of the court, proved that she was not a willing party to the 'Get,' and obtained a decree nisi. The husband's second union having taken place in Scotland (where he is now resident), the Procurator-Fiscal was asked to prosecute him for bigamy, but he has been advised that he is unable to collect sufficient evidence to secure a conviction, although the facts as to the divorce and re-marriage are clearly established. The wife is now dependent on charity. The real fountain-head of the evil in this and similar cases is the Rabbi who conducted the religious divorce ceremony (without which the husband could not have married), and this Rabbi will still remain unpunished, for it is difficult to convict him of a punishable offence in granting the divorce. The Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 86 vests all jurisdiction then vested in or exercisable by any ecclesiastical court or person in England in the Court for Divorce and matrimonial causes, but the Act contains no penalties for the pretended exercise by any person of the powers so vested in the Divorce Court. We have never heard of any attempt to punish proceedings here described as a violation of this provision, and therefore a contempt of court, and do not know whether the Government authorities would be willing to initiate such proceedings. If such a course is thought impracticable, we venture to suggest that legislation is needed for penalising the pronouncement of Jewish divorces in the United Kingdom with the following exceptions:—Jews are not permitted by Jewish law to re-marry, even after a civil divorce, unless the religious ceremony of 'Get' is super-added, and therefore, complete prohibition of the Jewish divorce would constitute an impediment to the re-marriage even of the innocent party to a civil divorce. Moreover, the Jewish ecclesiastical authorities find it essential in the interests of a wife who may be in this country to complete in this country a Jewish divorce granted abroad which is already legally binding on the husband abroad. We therefore suggest that a convenient form for the proposed amending Act would be to impose a penalty on all persons assisting at or taking any part in the pronouncing of a Jewish divorce, except after, and on production of, a decree absolute of the Divorce Court in England, or proof of a previous legal divorce elsewhere.

"The penalty for the offence to be effectual should be severe, so as to prevent it being considered merely as an additional fee imposed by law on the ceremony.

"We may add that the foregoing statement has been submitted to the Chief Rabbi, and meets with his entire approval.

"Commending our suggestions to the early consideration of yourself and the law officers of the court,

We are, Sir,
Your obedient Servants,
(Signed) DAVID L. ALEXANDER, K.C.,
President.
H. S. Q. HENRIQUES,
Vice-President.
CHARLES H. L. EMANUEL,
Solicitor and Secretary."

The Registrar-General,
Somerset House, Strand, W.C.

"Legislation is undoubtedly needed to suppress the irregular proceedings of these foreign Rabbis and I submit that such legislation should proceed on the lines indicated in the statement sent to the Registrar-General (that is to say): A severe penalty should be imposed on all persons assisting at or taking part in the pronouncing of a Jewish divorce except after, and on production of a decree absolute of the Divorce Court in England or proof of a previous legal divorce elsewhere."

41,478. I just want to see if you want to leave out any particular case?—I do not.

41,479. You do not desire to strike out the case which you have already struck out?—Oh no; that case is not referred to in the statement sent to the Registrar-General.

41,480. That deals entirely with this point of the irregular divorces?—Yes; there is nothing in that statement or letter which I want struck out.

41,481. You would like the letter printed?—Yes, my Lord. I point out in the letter to the Registrar-General that the question whether the Act of 1857, which transfers the whole of the jurisdiction of every Ecclesiastical Court in matters matrimonial, does not transfer the jurisdiction of the Jewish court as well; and, as a matter of fact, it suggests for consideration the question as to whether a person who gives a "Get," or a Rabbi who grants a Jewish divorce without it being preceded by a divorce in this country, does not commit a contempt of court.

41,482. Before the Act of 1857 what was the position the Jews occupied?—Before the Act of 1857 the "Get" was given by the Jewish Rabbis, and they continued to do so until 1866. The history of this is very clear. Your Lordship will probably remember that in 1854 there was a Bill in Parliament which proposed to transfer the jurisdiction, or to give jurisdiction, to the Court of Chancery. When that Bill was before Parliament it was submitted to some legal gentleman on behalf of the Board of which I am now president, and they said that that Bill did not interfere in any way with the power of Rabbis to grant divorce according to Jewish law. When the Act of 1857 was passed the opinion of three eminent gentlemen of the Bar was taken as to whether that Act made any difference. The unanimous opinion of those gentlemen, which I have here, was that it made no difference and no doubt, from 1857 until the year 1866, the Ecclesiastical Court—the Beth Din—did grant divorces under the impression, I believe, which was founded on the opinions which had been obtained—legal opinions—that the Act made no difference whatever. But in 1866 the then Registrar-General, Mr. Graham, refused to recognise that practice; and I think you may take it that from 1866 the Jewish ecclesiastical authorities in this country have always refused to grant any Jewish divorce unless it is preceded by a decree of this country, or, if the domicile is foreign, unless proof that according to the foreign laws that the marriage has been legally dissolved is furnished.

41,483. You say the Act of 1857 established for the first time that the Court could grant divorce. Transferring the Ecclesiastical Court power could not have done that?—That is so.

41,484. What was the actual position with regard to a Jewish divorce before 1857. Did the law take cognisance of it?—My own view is—and Mr. Henriques' evidence will go to this (in which I entirely concur)—that a Jewish divorce was invalid before; that you could only get divorce by Parliament, of course.

41,485. Still, you say the Ecclesiastical Jewish authorities acted ——?—But I do not think if a case had ever come to be contested in a court of law in this country the English Courts would have acknowledged the validity of such a divorce.

41,486. Well, since 1866 it has always been required by the Jewish authorities, before they would act, that the law had acted; and your point which you wish to have notice taken of is, that it should be made quite clear that these illegal divorces should be stopped?—Yes, I want to stop them.

41,487. Whatever the law of England is, that that should precede any religious interference?—Yes. Of course, we do not want to have the religious divorce entirely stopped. It may follow the civil divorce, but it must not precede the civil divorce.

41,488. Is there anything else you wish to add?—Yes, there is one statement, my Lord, I want to add: Since I prepared my statement which is before your Lordship, it has come to my knowledge that in the State of New York there does exist at the present day a law based very much on the lines on which I suggest legislation is needed in this country, and I have got here ——

41,489. Are you now speaking of legislation for the Jews, or generally?—This is general legislation, but it would really make the proceedings on the part of these foreign Rabbis a punishable offence. The law is to be found in Article 136 of the Penal Laws of the State of New York, Section 1450, and the provision is in these terms:—"Until a marriage has been dis" solved or annulled by a proper tribunal or court of " competent jurisdiction any person who shall assume " to grant a divorce in writing purporting to divorce " husband and wife, and permitting them, or either " of them, to lawfully marry again, shall be guilty of a " misdemeanor punishable by fine for the first offence " not exceeding five hundred dollars, and the second " offence one thousand dollars, or imprisonment not " exceeding one year."

41,490. That is confined to a divorce in writing?—Yes, I said on the lines, my Lord.

41,491. I can quite conceive a divorce not being in writing, but effectively pronounced verbally?—Yes, but this makes it punishable ——

41,492. You would recommend some legislation on those lines?—Yes, I do. Then, might I call attention in this connection to a case which came before the Court of New York on a charge of bigamy against a Jew in New York who, after obtaining a divorce from a local Rabbi, married again. I think it might be useful. I have taken the trouble to make inquiries as to the sources from which this report comes, and I think I am justified in saying that the report which appears in the "Jewish World" for the 15th July, 1910, is perfectly reliable.

41,493. Will you tell us what point it establishes?—Well, the judge, in giving judgment, refers to this practice of the Jewish Rabbis who come to New York that they administer this Jewish law, and that they are not ministers in any shape or way in charge of congregations having places of worship or synagogues under their control, but that they come and cause this mischief. They point out the mischief which arises. They come and make a living out of the money they can obtain by these irregular marriages and irregular divorces.

41,494. It is more of a business than an ecclesiastical profession?—I can give your Lordship this paper.

41,495. No, the point is clear, I think. Was the effect of it to sentence someone?—Yes; imprisonment, I think, for 10 months for the bigamy.

41,496. On a man who had gone through the form of marriage?—Yes, on the man; but the Judge says it was a hardship; that the real offender was not before the Court; the real offender is the Rabbi who does this thing for a money payment and leads people to think they can re-marry; and the judge says, "It is a " matter of great public importance that the laws of " the State relating to marriage and divorce should be " observed and those conscientiously committing the " crime of bigamy should be adequately punished."

41,497. Does the information lead you to find out if the authorities prosecuted the Rabbi?—In this particular case I have not been able to ascertain that, but there is no question about it that the real offender in all these cases is the Rabbi, because without his assistance these irregular divorces could not take place, and the parties, no doubt, by the payment of the money, think they have got to a tribunal which can give them a legal divorce; and very often the woman is quite innocent of the illegality, even if the man knows it. What I do ask this Commission to do, is to suggest and recommend legislation which will put a stop, once for all, to the practice of these Rabbis in this country. Your Lordship quite understands the Jewish Ecclesiastical Authorities in the country never do it. It is only these foreign Rabbis that come over here who resort to the practice complained of.

41,498. I think you have made the point quite plain, and it is one not called attention to before, until Dr. Adler mentioned it. Now you have made it very plain?—And I ask to have this practice put a stop to.

41,499. We can recommend, but we cannot stop it?—Well, it leads to an immense amount of misery and trouble.

(Chairman.) I think the point is quite plain.

41,500. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) If the opinion of these three eminent Counsel is accurate, then these foreign Rabbis are not committing any offence at all?—That is so. If the view taken by these three eminent gentlemen is correct, then, of course, the Rabbis did nothing illegal.

41,501. And these divorces that they grant are perfectly legal?—Certainly.

(Chairman.) No, he does not say that. The difficulty would be just the same. Mr. Alexander said he thought they were not legal.

41,502. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) That is Mr. Alexander's opinion. I understand, among the Jews before the Act of 1857, these divorces by the Rabbis were considered legal and binding and good?—They considered them.

41,503. But the Jews generally?—I suppose they did before 1857; but my own personal view is, having considered the matter and having had the advantage of reading through the evidence which is to be given by Mr. Henriques to-day, that these divorces were bad according to English law.

41,504. (Chairman.) Bad according to English law?—Yes.

41,505. Though the Rabbis thought they were right?—Quite so.

41,506. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) That is not the opinion of these three Counsel?—Well, I think these learned gentlemen were wrong.

41,507. (Chairman.) At any rate you want it put straight now?—It is quite immaterial whether it was right or wrong before; but I bring before you a serious evil—an evil attended with very serious consequences both to the man and wife and the issue; and this is an opportune moment, when you are considering the whole question, to have the matter put straight, and to prevent a practice which I say is bad in its inception and has been bad throughout.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much for your evidence. You have very forcibly drawn attention to an important point.

Mr. Henry Straus Quixano Henriques, B.C.L., called and examined.

41,508. (Chairman.) What is your occupation?—A barrister, my Lord.

41,509. You have written on these questions that you have dealt with in your paper?—Yes.

41,510. You are also representative of the West London Congregation of British Jews at the Board of Deputies, and Vice-President of that Board?—Yes.

41,511. You have prepared this with some care, no doubt, and I would venture to ask you to read it?—" Before the expulsion of the Jews in the year 1290, questions as to the validity of Jewish marriages undoubtedly came before the English Courts, but I have been unable to find any trace of any authoritative legal opinion as to the effect upon such marriages of the process of Get or a Jewish Bill of Divorce. Since the return of the Jews in the reign of Charles II., the earliest instance in which the Courts were asked to grant a divorce in the case of a Jewish marriage is the suit brought by the Baroness d'Aguilar against her husband in the year 1793."

41,512. That would be a divorce a mensa et thoro?—Yes, with a view to a Bill, which I think was afterwards obtained. "In that case, upon an objection being taken to libel, Sir William Scott (afterwards Lord Stowell) is reported to have said: 'This is a 'suit brought by Lady d'Aguilar against the Baron, 'the parties being Jews and married according to 'the Jewish rites, but the Court is under the same 'obligation to interfere and grant aid on violation of 'any duty arising out of such marriage as well as 'any other';[1] and in his final judgment, delivered the following year, the same learned judge says: 'This is a cause of separation for cruelty and adultery 'brought by the wife against the husband. The 'marriage took place in March, 1767, according to 'the rites of the Jewish nation, both parties being 'Jews. The Court does not remember any pro-'ceedings between such parties in a case of this 'nature; there may have been such, but whether 'there have been or not, there is no doubt that the 'suit may be entertained. The marriages of Jews 'are expressly protected by the Marriage Act, and

[1] Hag. Cons. Cas., p. 134 (note).

'the persons of that persuasion are as much entitled 'to the justice of the country as any others; for I 'take the doctrine to be that all persons who stand 'in the relation of husband and wife in any way the 'law allows as by a foreign marriage or by a domestic 'marriage not contrary to law, have a claim to relief 'on the violation of any matrimonial duty. Jews in 'this country have the same right of succession to 'property and administration as other subjects; and 'they come to the Ecclesiastical Court in order to have 'such rights secured. Many of them are possessed of 'considerable personal property and they have the 'same right to transmit as others. It would be hard 'then if they had not the same mode of securing the 'legitimacy of their children, and, consequently, if the 'same rights of divorce did not belong to them. I 'have, therefore, no doubt that it is the duty of the 'Court to entertain such a suit between Jews, as 'between others of a different persuasion.'[1] From this time forward the Courts competent to deal with matrimonial causes (the Ecclesiastical Courts, the Divorce Court, and the Divorce Division of the High Court) have dealt with the marriages of persons professing the Jewish religion in precisely the same way as with other marriages. In respect to the proof of the ceremonies necessary to constitute a marriage according to the usages of the Jews, they have inquired into and given effect to the provisions of the Jewish law,[2] because both the common law and the marriage acts recognise the validity of such marriages although the formalities which would in other cases be necessary have not been complied with.[3] But it is a well-settled rule that no other evidence of Jewish law can be admitted; for the special privileges conferred upon Jews by the English law are strictly confined to the method of solemnizing marriage, and in every other respect a Jewish marriage is in the same legal position as other marriages.[4] Thus, in the d'Aguilar case above referred to, it was contended that a guilty husband might avail himself of the ancient Jewish law in answer to a charge of adultery.[5] Such a principle has never been admitted by the English Courts and would be repudiated by Jewish law."

41,513. What was that?—It was polygamy, or having concubines; I forget which. I have given the reference.

41,514. They acted on the English principle?—Yes, my Lord. "Dr. Adler in his evidence says that, prior to a decision of the Registrar-General given in the year 1866, divorces had been given by his predecessors in the office of Chief Rabbi, although no decrees had been obtained from a court having jurisdiction in matrimonial causes. These Jewish divorces were granted in the belief that they were valid by the law of the land and would enable the parties so divorced to marry again. This belief was founded upon an opinion given by Dr. Addams, Sir Travers Twiss and Mr. Baddeley, who had been specially consulted by the Jewish Board of Deputies upon this point. However, in 1866 the Registrar-General informed the Board of Deputies that, guided by the best legal advice accessible to him, he could not recognise such divorces as valid. This view was accepted by the Chief Rabbi and the other Jewish authorities and the practice of granting such divorces has since been discontinued as far as the competent Jewish authorities are concerned; it has, however, of late years been revived by certain foreign Rabbis resident here, with disastrous consequences, which are referred to in the Board of Deputies' letter to the Registrar-General of February 16, 1909."

41,515. That is the one Mr. Alexander referred to?—Yes, my Lord. "In my view such divorces never had any legal effect in this country; for the English law did not recognise the possibility of dissolving a marriage once validly contracted except under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, and, although the law was avowedly founded on the principles of the lex Christiana, I can find no authority for saying that an exception would be recognised in the case of marriages solemnized in accordance with the lex Judaica, although such marriages themselves were allowed to be valid. A careful perusal of the words of the statutes which make bigamy a crime punishable by the civil courts, namely, 1 Jac. I. c. 11, 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 22, and 24 and 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, makes it clear that a divorce of this kind is no answer to a charge of bigamy. There is, however, an opinion in certain sections of Jewish society that a marriage contracted according to the usages of the Jews can be dissolved by a Jewish rabbi without the intervention of the civil courts. This view seems to be founded upon the fact that in some foreign countries such divorces are valid, that Jewish marriages are exempted from the provisions of the Marriage Acts and that at one time such divorces were granted by the official head of the Jewish hierarchy in England. Two cases in the Reports are also referred to as bearing out this view, but I do not think that they lead to any such conclusion. The first is Moss v. Smith, which came before Erskine (J.) in 1840. It was an action of assumpsit, in which the plaintiff, Mrs. Moss, sought to recover damages in respect of certain goods deposited in the defendant's pantechnicon for safe custody. During the course of the trial it appeared that the plaintiff's husband was still alive and it was accordingly objected that the plaintiff, being a married woman, was not entitled to sue. To this it was answered that the marriage had been solemnized by the Jewish ritual and put an end to by a Jewish divorce. Dr. Solomon Hirschel, chief rabbi, and other subordinate officers of the synagogue, were called. 'The Book of Divorces,' kept by the superintendent of the synagogue in Brooke's Gardens, containing an entry of the divorce in Hebrew, was produced by the superintendent, who was present at this divorce; but it also appeared from the evidence of Dr. Hirschel that to constitute a valid divorce under the laws and usages of the Jews a written document of divorce must be delivered from the husband to the wife; and that the delivery of this document is the operative part of the ceremony, which must, however, take place in the presence of the high priest and of ten persons at least. This document of divorce, which is attested to by two witnesses, may be retained by the wife, but it is more frequently handed over by the wife to the high priest. This document was not produced by the plaintiff, and the high priest stated that he had not been requested to bring it with him. Upon this evidence it was contended for the defendant first, that, although Jewish marriages are excepted out of the Marriage Act, yet by the common law a marriage, whether Jewish or Christian, if once validly contracted, can be dissolved only by Act of Parliament, and that supposing a Jewish divorce to be capable of effecting a dissolution of the marriage, yet in the absence of the document of divorce, there was no evidence that any divorce had taken place. The learned judge was of opinion that a divorce had not been established.[1] It does not appear on which of the two conditions the judge based his decision, but at any rate he did not overrule the first contention, which it is submitted was well founded. The other is Ganer v. Lady Lanesborough, which was tried by Lord Kenyon in 1791. That was an action for debt, in which the defendant pleaded in abatement that she was married to John King. The plaintiff in answer proved the marriage of King with a former wife and that she was still living. The defendant then offered to prove that King had been divorced from his former wife at Leghorn according to the rites and customs of the Jews. 'She produced an instrument under the 'seal of the synagogue there, whereby they were 'divorced from each other. But Lord Kenyon held 'this to be no evidence, for before he could take 'notice of any proceeding in a foreign court he must 'know the law of the country, which was matter of 'evidence and should be proved by witnesses. The 'defendant then called King's former wife to prove

'the divorce. She was objected to as an incompetent 'witness, but, the objection being overruled, she swore '(without producing any instrument) that she was 'divorced from King before the rabbi at Leghorn 'according to the ceremony and customs of the Jews 'there. On this evidence the defendant had a verdict.'[1] As to this case, I think it must be taken that the judge was satisfied that the parties to the divorce in question were at the time domiciled at Leghorn, and that the law in force there recognised and adopted the principle that a Jewish marriage might be dissolved by a Jewish divorce. The decision does not seem to me to have any bearing upon the effect of a Jewish divorce pronounced in England. I have accordingly come to the conclusion that no special privileges in the matter of divorce have ever been granted to the Jews by the English law, nor do I believe that there is any widespread desire among the Jewish community in England that such special privileges should be granted, at any rate at the present time, when the indissolubility of the marriage bond is no longer strictly insisted upon. Some, perhaps many, members of the Jewish community would like the causes for which divorces are granted to be extended, the procedure to be modified and the expense to be decreased, but they wish that these reforms should be made for the benefit of all, and do not desire any special enactments to be made in favour of their co-religionists. With regard to the question of Jewish divorces pronounced by foreign Rabbis living here, and the means of preventing the evils they produce, I have to refer to the statement presented on behalf of the Jewish Board of Deputies to the Registrar-General on February 16th, 1909, in which I fully concur."

41,516. Is that the letter which I had before?—Yes, my Lord. Your Lordship will see I signed the letter, and, as far as I remember, I think I drafted it, but I cannot be quite certain about that.

41,517. (Lord Guthrie.) Can you tell me this, Mr. Henriques: if you happen to know whether, amongst the Acts of Parliament before the 1857 Act, any was obtained by a Jew?—Yes, the Baroness d'Aguilar was. I am not sure if that was the second, but I think that is the only one. I think I ought to add this, as to this particular thing we are asking for, making it penal to pronounce these divorces: we have had a number of hard cases in which we have tried to punish the offending Rabbi, and have been consulted about it; but it is impossible to find any Act of Parliament under which that can be done.

41,518. (Chairman.) You support entirely the view that has been presented that something should be done to prevent these irregular divorces?—Yes.

41,519. And you would make it in some form penal?—Yes.

41,520. There is one question in the last paragraph but one of your paper where you say, "Some, perhaps "many, members of the Jewish community would like "the causes for which divorces are granted to be "extended." Would you tell us what views you desire to express about that, and to what extent they are representative?—Well, I have no wish myself one way or the other, but, as far as I know, the Jewish community is practically divided in the same way as the English community is, that there are a number of people who say, "We would like the law for the husband and "wife to be made the same," and so on; but that is very much because they mix with English people and have much the same ideas.

41,521. And also you mean that to apply with regard to increasing the grounds?—Yes.

(Chairman.) Thank you; I am very much obliged to you for your paper.

Rev. William Isaac Carr Smith called and examined.

41,522. (Chairman.) I think your name has been furnished to the Commissioners, through the Secretary, by Sir Lewis Dibdin as likely to give us some information about New South Wales?—Yes, my Lord; I should like to make it clear it was at the personal request of the Archbishop of Canterbury that I came. I should not like my friends in Australia to think I wished to foul the nest where I have lived so long. I was not eager to come and give evidence.

41,523. Well, that is how you came here?—Yes.

41,524. You have only sent a little memorandum of these heads, and the first is, "The present Divorce "Law of New South Wales with the differences as "applied to husbands and wives." Before dealing with that, how long have you been in New South Wales?—I was Rector of St. James', Sydney, for over 13 years.

41,525. The Anglican Church?—Yes; it is one of the most important churches in Australia; and I should like to make it clear that New South Wales is the oldest and most populous State, and has taken the lead in certain matters; this amongst them—the question of divorce.

41,526. Is that in Sydney?—Yes.

41,527. Well, what is the present state of the law there? I have just sent for the book. I think there has been some amendment of it lately?—Might I just refer to the marriage regulations?

41,528. I think if I get the law first it will shorten matters. When did you return to this country?—About 12 months ago.

41,529. And are you taking up official duties here?—Yes. I had been in England over 16 years before I went to Australia, so that I knew something about the condition of things here.

41,530. What is your position here now?—I am vicar of Grantham now—in Lincolnshire.

41,531. We have it abstracted; but perhaps you will state in your own way what you wish to say under Note 1 of your memorandum?—Before I do that may I just remind the Commission that the general regulations with regard to marriage are so different from what they are in England. I was very startled when I lived there to find a person could choose when they would be married, and by whom, without any restriction hardly. St. James' is a central church in the heart of the city, and that has given me an unusual experience. No banns are required, and no notice really. You can be married at once. I have married many persons immediately. They can choose amongst all those who are recognised for the purpose of taking marriages by the State. They can choose anyone they like. It is not that you must reside in a certain parish or neighbourhoood. I have married people from anywhere in consequence.

41,532. You can marry without notice?—A person to take a marriage service can demand a certain notice, but he is not obliged to ask for it.

41,533. And is no public information given?—No. I was very much startled, as I say ——

41,534. Who can perform marriages?—Ministers of religion, who must have, at the time they make application to be recognised, a certain number of people that they consider their congregation. When once they have got on the Registrar-General's List they can be kept there. Their congregation may be dispersed, or it may have been got together, I am sorry to say, for a particular purpose; but when once they are on it is almost impossible to remove them.

41,535. Is there anybody else besides ministers of religion who can marry people?—The Government officials, the registrars; but that is discouraged by the Registrar-General at any rate, I am glad to say. The Registrar-General's office was in our parish, and I know frequently when people went in to ask to be married there the official would say, "Have you a "conscientious objection to being married with a "religious ceremony"? "No, I do not know that I "have, but I thought I would come here." And then he would say, "Then I cannot marry you."

41,536. Do you mean with regard to the registration no form of notice is required?—No.

41,537. And no residence?—No. He can demand notice if he thinks he ought to make inquiries, but he is not obliged to. After having been there many years, and having had a long and varied experience, I do not know that there is any great abuse of it, and I certainly have found very great advantage in it. I married a man, for instance, within half an hour of his death. I had been chaplain to the Sydney Hospital, the biggest hospital in Sydney, and he had been seriously injured, was brought hurriedly to the hospital, and he told me at once that the woman he had been living with for 17 years, and by whom he had a large family, he had never been married to, and he was most eager to be married before he died. I had, as I thought, sufficient proof of his penitence, and I married him.

[1] 1 Peake. 17–18.

41,538. Did that legitimatise the children?—That legitimatised the children and made the wife the possessor of his property.

41,539. Does not it rather suggest that hastily-conceived notions of walking into a church or registry to be married might lead to detrimental marriages?—It may; and perhaps others' experience may be different from mine; but I have not had cause to think that any of the cases where I have married people there has been any abuse of it.

41,540. You can tell me this I daresay. Is this provision about how marriage may be celebrated in New South Wales statutory?—Oh, yes, I believe so, my Lord.

41,541. Then we can get the exact provision?—Yes.

41,542. Now, going back to No. 1 of your paper, you refer to the present law of divorce?—Until 1873 there is no divorce law; the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction in divorce. I suppose then anybody had to journey to England.

41,543. Are you sure about that? Because my impression is that they had the same jurisdiction as in England up to 1887?—I quote from the New South Wales Year Book: "Until 1873 the Supreme Court of "the State had no jurisdiction in divorce."

41,544. And from 1873 to 1887?—Then from the 1st July of that year 1873 down to the year 1892 the number of divorce decrees made absolute was 447.

41,545. Then there was a law, you say, introduced in 1873?—Yes, in 1873.

41,546. What was that?—That was simply that "Any husband"—or the terms were about the same with regard to the wife—"may present a petition to "the Court praying that his marriage may be dis-"solved on the ground that his wife has since the "celebration thereof been guilty of adultery."

41,547. The statement I have is that in 1887 the grounds for divorce were "the same as in England "with the exception that a wife could sue because of "the adultery of her husband if he was domiciled in "the colony at the time the suit was brought." But the grounds were the same as in England?—Yes; I am quoting from an earlier date. I am afraid I do not reckon very quickly.

41,548. Well, what is the law now? We have it shortly?—It is almost the same for husband and wife. Desertion, habitual drunkenness and neglect of duties, sentence for crime, attempted murder and repeated assaults.

41,549. Yes, we have the list of that accurately?—With only just the trifling difference in the case of habitual drunkenness and cruelty that of course neglect to support on the part of the husband is added.

41,550. With regard to the wife there is some question about domicil which does not deal with what is material at the moment?—No, that is so.

41,551. Then, "The extent to which it is made use of," is your next note?—The number of cases of divorce between 1873 and 1907, which are the figures I have, is 3,958. The population of New South Wales now is about a million and a half—rather more, it has grown more rapidly in recent years of course.

41,552. Can you give us the annual figure for the last year or two?—For the years 1903 to 1907, which are the last figures I have, the number of decrees made absolute were 830.

41,553. Is that five years or four?—It must be five.

41,554. And the population what?—Rather more than a million and a half, of which about 650,000 is congregated in Sydney.

41,555. Can you say how many of those were men's suits and how many were women's?—I am afraid not.

41,556. What are those taken from?—The Year Book.

41,557. The New South Wales Year Book?—Yes.

41,558. Then the next head—No. 3—is Personal experience?—I wanted to say with regard to the other point that the causes pleaded for divorce were most numerous on the grounds, of course, of adultery and desertion.

41,559. I think we have most of the statistics. Would you kindly give us your personal experience?—Of course, I did not come from Australia prepared with any figures of my own. I could have brought the exact number of marriages that I have taken during those years. As it is, I can only quote from the general impression that is left upon me. I should suppose I have taken from 50 to 60 marriages in the course of a year; and I think probably five or six times each year I have been appealed to by people who, after a little inquiry, I found were proposing to be married after divorce. I have always refused, and I think I can honestly say that in no single case were those people poor.

41,560. What does this lead to?—The point I wanted to make clear is, that so far as Australia is concerned there is no hardship with regard to poor people. None of the people that have appealed to me to marry them after divorce have been poor people.

41,561. What provision is there for poor people suing in courts?—Oh, they can sue in formâ pauperis. And also the reports of the cases may be forbidden by the authorities.

41,562. That I think we have already heard. The publication of the details?—Yes.

41,563. Now what is the general view you want to present; that is what I want to get?—My own strong impression is (but, of course, I can do no more than give you such evidence as the Year Book gives, and from many conversations with people) that the facility with which divorce can be obtained has had a very considerable influence in the decline of the birth-rate. The Chairman of the Royal Commission (on that particular matter) in Sydney, was a friend of mine, and I have had many talks with him on the subject, and my impression is that that is one of the elements that have had a very considerable influence. I do not know whether you have noticed, my Lord, the figures with regard to the children of marriages where divorce has been sought for, but out of the number 3,958 there were no children in 1,281 cases.

41,564. You mean those cases in which marriages have been sought to be dissolved—with children and without children?—Yes.

41,565. We have got those figures for England?—But this is New South Wales; 1,281 with no children, 961 with only one child.

41,566. But what does it all lead to. I do not quite follow at present?—My impression is that the decline of the birth-rate has been very largely due to the facility with which divorces can be obtained. People knowing that they can probably get a divorce have remembered that the children will add to the difficulty of the situation.

41,567. Do you mean that this has led to a deliberate abstention from having children?—I think so. Another cause——

41,568. Do you really mean that during the time they are living together, without any idea of divorce apparently, that the possibility that there might be divorce has led to the restriction of having children?—I do.

41,569. One would have thought it would have led to the restriction of marrying at all?—I am sorry to say I have had a very sad experience in that particular matter.

41,570. In what?—Regarding the decline of the birth-rate.

41,571. What are the figures you have: are they all in the Year Book?—All those figures I have quoted are in the Year Book.

41,572. Is there any other point to which you think attention should be drawn. I have no information of what you desire to say, you see?—No. I asked a lady whom I have known many years in New South Wales, who is the widow of a leading doctor, and herself was a nurse for a number of years at one of the principal hospitals in Sydney, what she thought was the principal cause of the large number of divorces sought for in Australia; and she said, love of luxury, and dislike of work.

41,573. Might I ask you this: What year was this Act passed giving these extended facilities? What is the last Act under which the present law stands?—There has been no change, as far as I know, since 1892.

41,574. What was the law prior to 1892?—Prior to 1892 the same as the English law.

41,575. Prior to 1892?—Prior to 1892.

41,576. Then there are all these different causes of of desertion and maltreatment and so on. We want to be accurate about this. Up to a time (it does not matter about the accurate date) the courts had no jurisdiction?—That is so.

41,577. After that they had jurisdiction according to the law of England?—Yes.

41,578. After that they had jurisdiction extending it?—Yes.

41,579. Why was it the Colony decided to introduce extended causes?—It was very largely, I am told, under the influence of Sir Alfred Stephen, who for 22 years was a Judge of the Supreme Court, and he very largely favoured this.

41,580. Are there two houses there?—Yes.

41,581. That was passed by both Houses?—Oh, yes, my Lord.

41,582. And no doubt fully discussed?—I suppose so. I might add, since the Commonwealth came into existence—I cannot remember the year; I wrote to our High Commissioner, Sir George Reid, a day or two ago, and asked him if he could give me the year, and I have not had a reply——

41,583. Well, we have all the statutes about it; I do not think we need trouble about the exact details?—No. There was an attempt made to bring in Federal legislation—to assimilate all the States of Australia to that of New South Wales, to the best of my recollection; that was to be made the standard: There was such strong opposition on the part of the other States and so much was said in New South Wales that that attempt dropped.

41,584. May I suggest that your evidence is too general to be strictly of use; because Victoria, which is one of the largest colonies, has the same law, substantially, as New South Wales; Queensland, Tasmania and South Australia the same as England?—Yes.

41,585. You said there was so much opposition by all the colonies?—In all the colonies, I should say, then.

41,586. Well, the most important, Victoria, is the same as New South Wales; and then that is recently changed I think?—I could not say about that. I have been in Victoria frequently but I do not know the state of the law there.

41,587. I cannot ask you more definitely because I have no proof of yours; but is there anything else you wish to add?—There was one other point I wanted to mention (it is not strictly germane to this); and that was the fact of publishing some of the evidence with regard to the decline of the birth-rate, brought before the Divorce Commission, seems to have had a very wholesome effect on the life of the community; that matters have improved very much since.

41,588. In what way?—The decline is very much less than it was.

41,589. What was that caused by do you say?—The Government appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into all matters that had to do with the decline of the birth-rate, which was very serious indeed.

41,590. And is there a report on that?—Yes, there is.

41,591. Have you got a copy of it?—I have not, but I am sure it could be obtained from the Agent-General of New South Wales.

41,592. What year was that in?—I think that was about six years ago.

41,593. The Agent-General would no doubt know?—Yes.

41,594. Is there anything else?—No, my Lord.

(Mr. Spender.) With regard to your figures; you said, I think, there were 3,000 in 13 years. Your first figures were 3,000 covering 13 years.

(Lord Guthrie.) 3,958.

41,595. (Mr. Spender.) Then that gives an average for those 13 years of about 250 divorces a year?—That is from 1892 to 1907.

41,596. That gives a yearly average of about 250 or 260 divorces?—Yes; the report in the Year Book calls attention to the fact that it was in the early years of that period that they were so numerous; probably people taking advantage of the increased facilities; and the later part they declined.

41,597. Then in the last part there were 830, which gives 166?—Yes.

41,598. That is a considerable decline from the early years?—Yes, and the reason I have just stated is the one that is put forward as an explanation.

41,599. Then do not we arrive at this point, when you have made full allowance for that, that the increase of the causes for divorce have not, in the long run, increased the number of divorces?—No, I think that is probably a fair inference.

41,600. Then with regard to poor people, you said they can sue in forma pauperis. Can you tell us, as a fact, whether many poor people do sue in forma pauperis in New South Wales?—I cannot say; I can only speak of my own experience, which leads me to the conclusion that not one of the people that asked me were poor people; and some certainly were very wealthy.

41,601. That might be due to one or two causes; either that the poor live in a comparatively lax condition which did not require divorce or re-marriage, but contracted irregular unions; or it might mean that they were strict in their morality, and neither applied for divorce or desired marriage after divorce. Can you give us any idea which of those two things it was likely to be?—I cannot say.

41,602. Then with regard to the limitation of child-bearing; it is pretty clear from your argument that the fact that marriage was childless might be a cause for divorce; but do you think that argument can be reversed, and do you think you can say that divorce is a contributing cause to childless marriages? Because the obvious form of the argument is the other way round from the method you have taken it?—Yes, the other point I had not at all considered.

41,603. Do not you think it is a more obvious inference from the facts?—I am not at all sure.

41,604. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You state that the diminished birth-rate is very likely due to the extended grounds of divorce?—I say I think it is possible; it cannot be much more than opinion.

41,605. Then how do you explain that this diminished birth-rate is so conspicuous in certain countries which are Catholic, where no divorce exists?—Well, of course, I know there are many other causes that are supposed to contribute to it. I am afraid I am not prepared with an answer on that point.

41,606. But you admit the fact that the diminished birth rate is, I think I might say, most conspicuous in countries which are Catholic?—Well, nominally Catholic.

41,607. Well, nominally Catholic, where no divorce exists?—Yes.

41,608. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Mr. Carr Smith, your church at Sydney, I think you said, was one of the chief churches of the place?—Yes.

41,609. What is the character of the congregation there; is it a working class parish or a rich parish, or what?—The parish is like an old City parish in London, only with the advantage that the trams and the boats converge on it from every point, and it is probably the most mixed congregation you would find anywhere, from the Governor-General to the loafer.

41,610. Was your church one of the chief churches for marriages in Sydney?—Yes.

41,611. So that the number you had would be probably more than the other churches?—I should think so.

41,612. Were they varied in point of view of class, or were they mostly church people?—A considerable proportion were people in the social world. I married a good many poorer people.

41,613. Then I suppose you moved about among all classes in Sydney?—Yes, amongst all classes.

41,614. And do you think you knew what was going on in Sydney, and understood the opinion there?—I think I did. I was chaplain, as I say, of this big hospital. I was in constant touch with the labour party. I was chosen by 1,500 tram employees out on strike to be the arbitrator, and I have had experience of all classes.

41,615. And your attention was particularly drawn to the law of divorce in the Colony, I understand?—Well, I knew that there were facilities, and that numbers of people who had been divorced were constantly going about wishing to get married, and I was always on the alert to avoid having anything to do with them.

41,616. It was a matter brought before your mind?—Yes.

41,617. Did you form any opinion as to the effect of the law of divorce on the moral condition of the community?—Well, I deplored, of course, the slackness that it was evidence of, but that is to be seen in many other ways.

41,618. But did you connect that slackness at all with the condition of the law?—Oh, yes, I feel perfectly certain that the fact that the facilities existed made many people wish to avail themselves of them.

41,619. Had you any reason for that beyond opinion?—Only conversation with many people.

41,620. It was the conclusion you came to as the result of your life there?—Oh, most decidedly.

41,621. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) I suppose you consider, where they wanted facilities for divorce there was good ground for divorce. It would not be much use having facilities for divorce if you had not a ground for it?—Oh, no, there were grounds.

41,622. Then the facilities that you say people required and wished for were facilities for getting a divorce where there was good ground for divorce?—What they considered good grounds, of course.

41,623. It would be for the Court to decide what were good grounds?—Yes.

41,624. A man could not get a divorce unless the Court knew there were good grounds for it?—No.

41,625. Then how could the facilities for divorce create an amount of mischief, because the mischief is created already, is it not?—I think the thing reacts on itself and that it leads to the desire—the fact that it exists.

41,626. Are the costs of obtaining a divorce in Sydney very great?—I am afraid I do not know anything about the costs.

41,627. Are the costs beyond the reach of the poorer classes?—That I really could not say. I can only say that they can sue in forma pauperis, and a large number have availed themselves of that.

41,628. (Chairman.) Just with regard to the statistics, Mr. Carr Smith. I have them now from the United States Census. I see, taking 1887 and 1891, they were 29 in 1887 and 66 in 1891; and then they are given separately from 1892 to 1896. In 1892 they are 102, in 1896 they are 233. Now comes a change. In 1897 they are 245; in 1896, 174?—Oh, yes.

41,629. So that the longer your Act, with the increased causes, is in operation the lower seem to become the total number of divorces?—Yes, that is so. I called attention to that and said that the reason urged for that is that there were many people who had been waiting for the increased facilities and at once took advantage of it.

41,630. Yes, but the "at once" is in 1893?—Yes.

41,631. They had 305, and in 1894, 311. From that time down to 1906 it has gone down to 174?—Yes.

41,632. Steadily declining?—Yes.

41,633. What one would rather gather from that is that the increased causes have not had any deleterious effect on the morality of the place?—Still, the number is very high in proportion to the population. I do not carry the figures in my mind, but I remember a year or two ago when the agitation was on about increasing facilities in the whole Commonwealth, New South Wales stood at the head of all communities in the British Empire.

41,634. Well, we have figures that hardly agree with that, I am afraid. Yes, they are higher in 1893; and in 1894, 1895, 1896, and 1897 they are continually going down, and there is only one difference between them and Victoria in 1896?—Of course, New South Wales has a larger population than Victoria.

(Chairman.) We are obliged, Mr. Carr Smith, for your evidence.

The Right Hon. Sir EDWARD HENRY CARSON, K.C., M.P., called and examined.

(Witness.) My Lord, I am sorry I have not been able to write out the evidence, but the evidence I have to give is very short.

41,635. (Chairman.) You have not, as you say, sent any proof in?—No.

41,636. That relieves me from a great deal of trouble. Then I will ask you if you would express what you have to say?—Well, my Lord, I practised, as your Lordship probably knows at all events, in Ireland, before I came to England, for many years, and I was a King's counsel there as well as here, and I had some experience—not a very large one—in such divorce work as there was in Ireland. I propose first merely to state something about that country, and may I say that in stating about Ireland I adduce what I am going to say as to Ireland as a very strong argument against further facilities—a matter on which I have a very strong opinion that there ought not to be further facilities, and as to which I will say a few words afterwards. Now, my lord, in Ireland there is now no real matrimonial division of the courts at all. There was a President of the Probate and Matrimonial Division, but that was altered, and now there is simply a judge told off—as there is in England in Bankruptcy—to do whatever is necessary in relation to applications in matrimonial matters; and the ordinary cases that have to be tried, which I will show in a few moments, are quite insignificant, are sent with ordinary actions—commercial or tort actions—to be tried before the ordinary King's Bench judges in their rotation, without any special arrangement in relation to them. The Commission are probably aware that the courts in Ireland have no power to grant what we call divorce—that is a divorce a vinculus. They can grant a divorce or a separation a mensa et thoro; and then the procedure is that, having got a separation a mensa et thoro it is generally thought necessary, in the ordinary case of a man taking divorce proceedings against his wife, to take the old action of crim. con.—criminal conversation—asking for damages against what we call the co-respondent over here. Then, upon obtaining these two decrees—one the separation and the other damages in the crim. con. case—a petition is filed to the House of Lords; and it goes then before the House of Lords on a Bill, and is investigated there, and, if it is passed by the House of Lords, then it comes down to the House of Commons; who have a Standing Committee for Divorce of which, I am sorry to say, I am a member myself; and then, if it passes the House of Commons, who make a somewhat perfunctory examination into the facts, then the marriage is annulled by Act of Parliament. That is the procedure.

41,637. That is the old procedure which applied to England?—The old procedure that used to be applied before the Act here. Now, in Ireland I have got the figures for the last eight years, from 1902 down to the end of last year, and I will give them in detail in a moment; but may I state that, roughly, you will find the average of the eight years for petitions a mensa et thoro is about 22, and the number of decrees granted in Ireland come, roughly, to about four in the year. You may take it that the average that go to the House of Lords—an average for the years that I have from 1902 to 1909—is about two; the first four years I find there were none, and then afterwards I find there were a few. Now, I take more specifically this: in 1902 the petitions for divorce a mensa et thoro were 27; decrees were granted in three, one was dismissed, and there was no Bill in the House of Lords. 1903, petitions for divorce a mensa et thoro, 16; decrees for divorce, 2; dismissals, none; and divorce bills, none. 1904, petitions for divorce a mensa et thoro, 20; decrees for divorce a mensa et thoro, 4; no dismissals, and no Bills in the House of Lords. In 1905, petitions for divorce, 18; decrees, 4; dismissals, 1, and 4 Bills in the House of Lords. 1906, petitions for divorce, 29; decrees, 5; dismissals, 2; Bills in the House of Lords, 1. 1907, petitions, 25; decrees, 6; dismissals, none; divorce Bills in the House of Lords, 4. 1908, petitions for divorce a mensa et thoro, 29; decrees, 6; dismissals, none; divorce Bills in the House of Lords, 1. Petitions for divorce a mensa et thoro in 1909, 18; decrees for divorce, 3; dismissals, 1, and divorce Bills in the House of Lords, 1. I should also add that I have inquired as to whether there was any proceedings by which a party could appear in formâ pauperis, and I am told that there is such a provision, with regular rules laid down, but that in the years I have given nobody has ever applied to proceed in formâ pauperis. I may also add that the Act giving the magistrate power to make separation orders does not apply to Ireland, and I think the reason that that was not made to apply to Ireland was that the Irish members generally would have opposed it, and, therefore, it was not included in the Bill in the House of Commons. I may say I have made inquiries and had inquiries made, as to whether there is any demand whatsoever for any further facilities in Ireland, and I do not believe there is any whatsoever in either of the Churches. Of course one would expect that, probably, in the Catholic Church, as they set themselves against divorce very strictly—particularly over there. I have also had inquiries made with regard to the Protestant Church, and a gentleman, a King's counsel, whom I saw and asked to go to make a particular inquiry, consulted, amongst others, Dr. O'Hara, the present Bishop of Waterford, and who himself knew Belfast and knows the working-class; and, as that was a Protestant district, I thought one could get something from him, and he said, so far from there being need for further facilities the working classes were very opposed to any relaxation of the divorce laws. I think it may be taken, so far as Ireland is concerned, that there is not what I may call a divorce question there at all; and I put that forward before this Commission, of course with great diffidence and great respect, as an illustration of how things work where for years and years—in Ireland I may say for all time—there have been really no great facilities at all, and where the people have settled down in their homes and in their houses with the knowledge that they have not got these facilities, and that it is best for them to make the best of the engagement they have entered into. As regards the question in England I know there is a very great variety of opinion. Of course, I have been reading things that have appeared in the press from time to time, and I may say I have had some practice myself in the Divorce Court here. My own view is that, although I see there is a good deal to be said on each side, it would be a very fatal mistake to give any increase of facilities. I think the first thing one has to do is to make up one's mind as to what is to be the policy of the State—whether the policy of the State as to facilities, in consequence of the inconveniences that arise, is to give power of getting a divorce, or whether the State ought to set its face as far as possible against divorce with a view to making people settle down as best they can and try and come to terms and arrangements.

41,638. Might I suggest as to that a difficulty which has been put to us on one branch is an illustration is the desertion cases. It is no good to talk about settling down in cases where one person has gone to America and started a new life, and the person behind is left?—I quite agree. I am not putting it as a one-sided thing, but I am taking it as a whole for the State—weighing the benefits of the one side and the disadvantages on the other.

41,639. But take that class of cases; what advantage to the State is it to maintain the tie?—No, but I say you cannot create these facilities without, in my opinion, rendering these cases much more numerous.

41,640. Do you really think that follows?—I do. In my opinion the more facilities there are the more people will take the opportunity of bringing themselves within the facilities. That is my view. I do not say there is not a great deal to be said on the other side.

41,641. Might not the view also be that if you have a law which does not fit the facts the opinion of the community does not reprobate the people acting contrary to the law; whereas if you have a law that does fit the facts, and people depart from it they would meet with the disapprobation of society?—I do not think so. I think every facility makes divorce less of a blot on the character of the person who is divorced; and that to my mind is a great calamity. I think that we should come in this country to look upon divorce as an ordinary every-day proceeding would be a very great calamity. May I also mention this, as I have also had a good deal of experience in advising people professionally who have come to me in this kind of trouble: I find a very growing feeling amongst young married people of restlessness, and I know that over and over again when early squabbles arise they begin flinging the Divorce Court at each other, threatening the Divorce Court, and feeling that there is a way out; and I think very many of them at a very early stage make up their minds that they will take the first opportunity or the first chance they can of trying to get rid of the marriage. I have spoken very seriously to many of these people that have come before me, and I have often asked young people suddenly—whether a young husband or a young wife—"Are you perfectly sure now that you have lost all love for your husband?" or, "That you have lost all love for your wife?" and, putting the question suddenly, some of them certainly have sometimes said, "Well, I never looked at it in that way; I was much too angry." And I have very often said, "Well, go home and before you see me again think that well over," and certainly, on several occasions, they have come back and said they were glad they had thought over it.

41,642. Might I ask if you have considered the class about which we have had an immense body of evidence—the working class—where a man has children and only one or two rooms, and his wife goes away and leaves him, and lives with somebody else, and he takes somebody to look after the children with the usual consequence; or the case of a woman who is left to look after herself, and takes a lodger with the usual consequences. I do not quite follow why you think in all that class of case the facility for a re-establishment would necessarily tend to shake the present state of things?—Well, of course, divorce would become such a common thing. Look how we do in Ireland; that is why I started with Ireland. All this does not arise in Ireland.

41,643. Is Ireland a country in which nobody goes to live with anybody else in an immoral state?—No, I do not say that, but it does not lead to any desire to alter the divorce laws. I think Ireland is a very moral country, but I do not set it up as absolutely free from immorality.

41,644. All I meant to indicate was that that is one of the points that have been very seriously put before us, and whether what you suggest sufficiently meets it?—Well, I started by saying you would have to leave, of course, a good deal of difficult ground whatever policy you adopt; but suppose you adopt that policy of making facilities for working men—that will be open to everybody. Not only the working-man, but the highest people in the realm, if they are ever guilty of these things, can go in the same way. It will be a common thing to walk into your police court, or county court, or district court or whatever it is; you cannot draw the line; and nobody will think anything more of divorce. If I am told that the working classes have not got the same facilities as other classes who can afford to take proceedings—well, I would much rather see the facilities cut down for the so-called rich people.

41,645. You would not extend the opportunity and say the people in Liverpool could have their cases heard there?—I would much prefer not. I think these are cases—anybody who has been in divorce business must know there is tremendous temptation with regard to collusive cases—I think these are cases that require to be very very seriously dealt with by a particular tribunal.

41,646. We have had a class of case put before us of where people have waited and saved up for years to get money together to come to London?—Yes.

41,647. Would you be against the opportunity for their bringing those cases in their own district?—I would, because I would not give any facilities. I admit the result of my evidence is to leave a number of people without divorce. I admit that frankly. But I say of the two evils—making the thing a common everyday matter and allowing these people to be still bound when they have been so married—I say the lesser evil ——

41,648. That would have been an answer to the passing of the Act of 1857?—I daresay. I would go the full length of saying that I think things would have gone on better without that.

41,649. I should like to hear you on publication?—Yes, there are two other matters I should like to say a word about. The question of publication: In my opinion the publication ought to be allowed to go on. I think some of the newspapers very grossly abuse the right of publication, but I am perfectly sure that the fact that the case has to come before the public and be reported is of itself a deterrent; and I think it is much better to have that. Of course one would like to see the reports in some cases—I think the majority of what I may call the higher class papers take a good deal of care about the matter—but one would no doubt like to see the reports somewhat curtailed. You sometimes see because parties happen to be particular parties——

41,650. The details you would like to see reduced?—Yes, I should like to see the details reduced. There is one other matter: I do not know whether it comes within the scope of the Commission, but I should like the opportunity of saying this. In my opinion the damages given in divorce cases, where there is a co-respondent, are entirely inadequate as a rule. If a man has his home broken up, and his wife, who may be his greatest treasure, taken away from him—deliberately taken away from him—very often by a friend who has been admitted to his own household, he does not get as much damages as he would get for a picture of the same wife by an eminent artist; and in my opinion the damages have been utterly inadequate, and I think it would be a salutary thing that the damages should be made heavier than they are in these cases.

41,651. The Court could hardly lay down a rule with regard to that. That is a jury matter?—Yes, but I think the Court can encourage the jury.

41,652. Do not you think it does so, when it thinks it is a bad case?—You see 5,000*l.* is looked upon as very large damages in a divorce case. Well, take the case of a wealthy man—I have one in my mind who has 20,000*l.* or 30,000*l.* a year—deliberately thinking he would like to have possession of another man's wife and taking her away. In my opinion, in that case the damages ought not to be 5,000*l.* but at least 100,000*l.* for breaking up the man's home.

41,653. But how would you get at that? Most of these cases, even in the special juries, are not men of very large means?—No, but the thing has gone in a kind of line.

41,654. Would you suggest that that should be a matter left to the judge, who would have all the facts of income and everything before him?—Well, I do not think the judges are ever liberal in the question of damages. I think judges are inclined to be more parsimonious even than juries.

41,655. Then I do not see how you can get at it?—I only want to put my point. It would be a great deterrent. It is absurd. A man's wife's picture is painted by Sargent, for instance, might be worth a thousand pounds, and if somebody rammed a sword through it, or tore it, that might be the amount of the damages; but you would not get as much for the loss of your wife altogether perhaps.

41,656. There is another view, you know, taken—on the contrary—that it is a shocking thing a man should ask for damages at all?—Well, I do not care what becomes of the damages. You may do what you like with them; you may frame your law in any way you like.

41,657. Would it meet your view that the judge should have power to make orders with regard to the property of the co-respondent like he has with regard to the husband's property, to provide for the wife and children and possibly even for the husband. Not in the nature of damages——?—To be brought into court and settled as the Court should provide.

41,658. You know how we deal with settlements now?—Yes, I am going to say a word about that in a moment.

41,659. Would it meet your view that the judge should make orders in that way?—Yes, that would meet my view. I do not mind really what is done with the damages; but it always seemed to me that in certain cases (of course there are different circumstances in every case, but I am talking of really bad cases) the damages are quite inadequate.

41,660. Is there anything more you want to say?—Well, I want to say this: that I think, where a wife divorces her husband, the rule of the Court is to give to the wife, by varying settlements or giving alimony, an entirely inadequate sum. If the wife is a blameless wife and has been a good mother to her children and has done nothing, I cannot see why the husband should be left in possession of the greater part of the income, and she should be sent to a lodging and have all the worst of it, while the husband has all the property.

41,661. You do not think the Court exercises the power sufficiently in favour of the petitioner?—Yes, that is so.

41,662. And leaves to the husband too much?—Yes.

Adjourned for a short time.

41,663. (Chairman.) May I just ask you two questions before you proceed. What view does your experience lead you to take with regard to the marriage of the two guilty persons?—I myself, as the tenour of my evidence is to do everything that is possible as a deterrent, should certainly think it would greatly minimise the cases if the guilty party were not allowed to marry again, and I should be very strongly in favour of the alteration of the law in that respect.

41,664. Do you mean that that present power to re-marry may be used as an inducement to go wrong in the first instance?—I have no doubt about it.

41,665. With the expectation of righting it?—I have no doubt about it.

41,666. You have seen enough——?—I have seen enough of it. I believe in many cases—and I think they worked for it—they themselves very often obtrude the immorality on the other party so as to make it almost necessary to have a divorce; because there is a sort of so-called chivalry that it should be put right after.

41,667. And the prevention of re-marriage would put a stop to that?—Yes.

41,668. The other point is that for these causes which have been under our consideration—or at any rate for some of them—at present there is a right to obtain a decree of judicial separation which we are told in many cases produces immorality afterwards. What view do you express about retaining that right?—Do you mean, my Lord, in a case where the man, for instance, has committed adultery?

41,669. Yes?—Well, I should be very loth to alter that. I think myself that a state of facts may arise where the adultery of a man may amount to cruelty. For instance, it is not an uncommon case which is,

I think, to be distinguished from what I might call a momentary aberration, where a man is flaunting his immorality in the face of his wife and bringing another woman about, which is the grossest insult, and must have an effect upon her health and everything else. I think that ought to come within the category of cruelty.

41,670. There are two questions there. Would you be in favour of placing men and women on the same footing?—No, I should not. I do not believe it is the same thing.

41,671. Secondly, would you be in favour of retaining a right to obtain a decree of judicial separation simply, in cases where it is obvious that the life of the two people was definitely separated; or would you allow a decree of divorce?—I would not allow a decree of divorce. I would maintain the other view.

41,672. It is said, as to that, that it only leads to disaster?—I think it probably does in some cases, but I weigh the whole thing, and I think the balance is in favour of not adding greater facilities.

41,673. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) There are one or two questions I should like to ask you. I suppose, if you could have opposed the Act of 1857, you would have done so?—I would.

41,674. With regard to facilities for divorce, may it not be rather injurious to the State that you should have compulsory condonation of adultery. You see, if you grant no facilities for divorce, it is a compulsory condonation of adultery really?—Well, you mean that the parties are bound to live on together afterwards?

41,675. Yes?—Well, even that I think is better than having the facilities.

41,676. Of course, as regards the parties, you fully admit the injustice of the situation?—Oh, I admit the injustice in many cases, and I think you can get extremely hard and extremely difficult cases; but I look at it as a whole as to which is the best, the one or the other—to make it a common practice or not.

41,677. We have had very strong evidence that in large cities this want of facilities leads to a number of irregular unions, and that a great number of people are living together unmarried in consequence of not being able to get a divorce?—I am not at all sure you would have as large a minimising of that state of the facts even if you had the facilities. In many cases when they go and live together, even if there was a divorce, I do not believe they would marry — the working-classes. I believe they do it openly.

41,678. I suppose, in your opinion, it would be better that they should be married than living in that state?—Oh, of course.

41,679. Then you think there would be some danger of collusion if facilities were granted for divorce?—If the facilities were extended all over the country you mean?

41,680. Yes?—I think there would be great danger of collusion.

41,681. Earl Desart, I think he was the King's Proctor, gave evidence here that, though collusion could be suspected in a good many cases, "our suspicions "may be ill-founded. There is, no doubt, a certain "proportion of cases in which collusion is suspected. "(Q) Would one or two cases suggest such collusion? "(A) That is about it. I think it works out hardly "more than two. There might be three one year and "one in another"?—Yes, detected collusion is very small; but that there is a great deal of collusion I have no doubt.

41,682. If the High Court judges could not detect it, the others could not?—No, you would have to have a King's Proctor in every place where you had a divorce court.

41,683. No, he said also the King's Proctor could deal with the local courts——?—That would be by having an agent, which would be the same thing.

41,684. A little more expensive, that is all?—Yes.

41,685. (Lord Guthrie.) Sir Edward, have you any notion of what the total cost of an unopposed Act of Parliament in an Irish case is?—Very roughly, 500*l.*—I do not think it would come to more than that.

41,686. Including the two parliamentary investigations?—If absolutely unopposed that would be the outside.

41,687. But it would cost that?—I think it would cost about that.

41,688. Do you know whether, prior to the date you told us about—say, prior to 1857—there were any Acts of Parliament got in the British Parliament from Ireland?—Not that I am aware of. I think the old English procedure always acted in Ireland.

41,689. But there were Acts of Parliament got before 1857. Do you know whether all those related to Irish people?—That I cannot tell you. I do not know of any; I do not remember any special Act.

41,690. In Ireland do I understand there is no procedure before the magistrate for separation?—No.

41,691. There is only a method for judicial separation?—That is all.

41,692. Did you give us the total number or only the number of judicial separations got with the view of going on to divorce?—No, I gave you the total number and you see there is a great difference between the number of petitions filed, although they are small, and the number of petitions adjudicated upon; and I am told in a good many of these the parties arranged the suit together; and in others no doubt they may merely execute separation deeds.

41,693. Apparently, Sir Edward, it looks as if those that come to a decision were really in reference to further procedure, because, for instance, in 1908 there are 29 applications, six judgments, and then four House of Lords Acts?—29 petitions; six judgments and one House of Lords Act.

41,694. Then I am wrong. Well, take 1907. 25 applications, is it not?—25 applications, six granted by the Irish Courts and four go to the House of Lords.

41,695. Apparently therefore, except in connection with ultimate divorce proceedings, there is almost no judicial separation?—There is very little. I think the figures show that.

41,696. You suggest very interestingly, Sir Edward, that the Irish experience with regard to divorce had an important bearing on England, and showed that it was not necessary in England?—That it would not be necessary if the people got accustomed to know that they had not the facilities.

41,697. Apparently that would go even further, would it not, and a separation in Ireland—if you can argue from one country to the other—would not be necessary either?—I think the difficulty of drawing conclusions about separations is that it may be where you know—taking a country like Ireland—you cannot ultimately get a divorce without a Bill, that, instead of filing petitions, a good many people may agree by deeds to separate. That may account somewhat for the small number and therefore it is very hard to draw conclusions as one does not know of course what has happened out of court without filing any proceedings at all.

41,698. Suppose it is a fact that the Roman Catholics in England freely avail themselves of separation, does not that seem to show that there must be some difference in the conditions between the two countries?—Well, you see I have not got the data to know what separations take place by agreement—outside the court. I do not think myself there are very many in Ireland, and it may be that the Catholic Church in Ireland has more influence in preserving people from separating at all. Of course one knows that the Church sets itself very greatly against that.

41,699. But in your view, you would be opposed to anything that would cause the married persons not to live together?—I would, yes. I would give as little State countenance to that as possible and I would put the people as far as possible into the frame of mind from their earliest childhood: that when you marry it is your duty and obligation—not merely as a question of religion but as a question of citizenship—to make up your mind that you have to hit it off together, to use a common expression.

41,700. You see, we have had no evidence, Sir Edward, from anybody who differed from that. Everybody agrees with every word you have said, but then, if it be the fact that we have, laid before us, evidence showing that there are a large number of cases where no self-respecting innocent person could live with the guilty spouse either because such offences have been committed that further union is morally impossible, or because physically the one spouse has taken himself or herself permanently away, would not a good deal depend on the number of such cases that we think have been proved to exist?—Well, of course, it must always be a question of degree; but, for my own part, I should have to see a very overwhelming case before I thought the general benefit to society of the State steadfastly settling itself against any such separation was outweighed.

41,701. In short, we should have to consider three things, should we not; first, the number of cases of what you have called hardship?—Yes.

41,702. Secondly, the bad effect of divorce?—Yes.

41,703. And, thirdly, the bad effects, if any, of no divorce?—Yes, you will have to weigh those in the balance, and in my opinion, as far as it is worth anything, I think the balance is in favour of leaving the cases of hardship rather than making divorce common.

41,704. But it is a question of balance?—I quite agree. It must be a question to a large extent of degree.

41,705. Suppose it was thought that your view—which one quite understands—against divorce altogether is not practicable, and that the 1857 Act must be continued, do not you think in that case it is reasonable that there should be some facilities, that the poor should be put on an equal footing with the rich or the well-to-do?—It greatly depends on what the facilities are going to be, but I should think proceedings in forma pauperis or something like that—even, if necessary, supplemented by State aid—would be far preferable to opening up a large number of courts with jurisdiction. Of course we know the State has passed a Poor Prisoners' Act, so as to put a prisoner in a position of being defended; therefore the principle would not be a very novel one, if the case was so overwhelming that it was thought that there should be these facilities.

41,706. Supposing they had in England what we have in Scotland, with a counsel and agent appointed who act for nothing, and there are no reporter or court fees, and that no case in forma pauperis can be prosecuted which has not passed an independent body of legal reporters, would you see any objection to that?—Not if it was brought up into the Probate and Matrimonial Division.

41,707. (Mr. Burt.) There is just one point, Sir Edward, on which I should like to put a question to you. First, I should like to know if I quite understand your general position. I take it you are opposed not only to the extension of facilities for divorce, but absolutely to divorce?—Well, I do not say I am absolutely opposed to divorce, but I should certainly not increase the facilities beyond what they are at present if I had the doing of it.

41,708. Then a question I want to put to you is: assuming divorce to be permissible, would you place the sexes on terms of equality?—No, I would not. If you mean would I abolish the law which necessitates something in addition to adultery in the case of a man—either desertion as it stands at present, or cruelty—I would not.

41,709. That is exactly what I mean. You would not place the unfaithful husband on the same footing as the unfaithful wife?—No, because I do not think it is the same thing. There are many reasons if one were to go into all the reasons. In the first place one must look at facts as they actually exist, and no doubt by reason of the results of immorality the whole thing has become quite different. Everybody knows a great number of men—I will not say the majority of men—before they are married have been accustomed, at all events at times, to have relations with women. Such a thing cannot arise in the case of women, and therefore I think one naturally gets to look upon it in a somewhat different way—by reason of the difference in the results which happen in the one case and the other. I am not defending that as a matter of morality, but it is an existing fact. Then, in addition to that, the serious nature of a woman committing adultery and the probability of passing off children which are not the children of the husband at all, seems to me to make a very vital difference. And, thirdly, I believe—though of course it is only a matter of opinion—that men who have committed these matrimonial offences from time to time (I do not mean habitually immoral men, but who have done so from time to time) do not get degraded in the same way that a woman does. If a woman gives herself away, whether she is married or unmarried, I believe her own moral sense in every way becomes far more degraded than it does with a man. I hope nothing I am saying will be taken as any justification on my part for the existence of this sort of thing. I only put it as the actual existing differences which I think arise out of the physical condition of woman as compared with man, and the results that follow.

41,710. My question had reference to what took place after marriage. That was the first point. Do you think it would tend to raise the standard of male morality——?—I do not think it would in the least. Might I also say this, that I am very doubtful whether it would be to the advantage of women that they should be able to divorce a man merely for an act of adultery—though that may sound very strong. But it is for this reason that I believe, if that were possible, men who wanted to get the marriage contract annulled and get a divorce might very often commit these crimes and make it almost essential for the wife to divorce them, But they will not commit cruelty. I have had over and over again in my practice men come to say: "I am quite willing to come into court and "admit I have committed adultery; but I will not "have it said that I committed cruelty—that I was "cruel to a woman." I have over and over and over again heard people say that, and I believe myself if the law were altered in that respect, and a man took it into his head to say: "I would like my wife to get rid of me," that he would bring it about in such a way that the wife would have to divorce him for adultery. But I believe the same man would cut his right hand off before he would strike or do anything cruel to a woman or desert a woman or do those things which are looked upon as unmanly on the part of a man.

41,711. With regard to family life and confusion that an adulterous woman brings into it. Would not that apply also in some degree to the adulterous husband?—No, I do not think so. In the case of the adulterous husband the children would not be acknowledged in the eye of the law. In the case of the adulterous wife it would be impossible to know. If the husband and wife are living together and she is committing adultery, the child is presumed to be the husband's. Although it may not be, the law presumes so.

41,712. (Mr. Spender.) Might I ask one or two questions about the statistics in Irish cases which you gave us, just to clear up what Lord Guthrie asked you. 29 petitions, I think you said, in one year and 6 decrees. Does that mean that 23 applications were unsuccessful. I did not quite follow that?—No, in that particular year there were no unsuccessful cases, but these are petitions that are filed in the court. Some of them may come to a hearing and some may not. Some of them may never be proceeded with; some of them may be settled by the parties agreeing to a deed outside the court, and then they would never be heard of in court.

41,713. Then it is the normal proportion in Ireland, that of petitions filed only about a fifth go on to trial?—About that.

41,714. Can you say how many of those that come on for trial succeed?—I gave the figures in each case. 1908 was the one you asked me about, I think; the whole six that year that were brought to trial succeeded. Very often, I may say, after a petition is filed, friends may intervene and the clergy may intervene (which is not unlikely in Ireland), and the parties may be brought together again, and then the petition would not go on.

41,715. Then one point I am ignorant about. Are there any considerable number of Irish cases in which the parties become domiciled in England or Scotland and pursue their suit here or in Scotland?—I think there are a few cases. There are certainly some in which the parties come specially and become domiciled in England for the purpose of getting a divorce so as to do it without going to the House of Lords at all. But, I think, you may take it that that is a most negligible quantity. The courts are now very particular in taking care of that—that the domicile is really an English domicile.

41,716. (Chairman.) I introduced a rule that everybody filing a petition must swear that he has an English domicile?—Yes, there were one or two cases where very disastrous results happened, where the domicile was Irish, and they came here and went through without being noticed. I know of a case where, after eighteen years, counsel raised the question on resettlement whether the other marriage was ever legally annulled, and there was a large grown-up family in the meantime.

(Chairman.) The only case I knew of was where a judge, not of the Divorce Division, took the work for a certain time.

(Witness.) I think though, with regard to what Mr. Spender asks me, there are a very few cases where people come over like that.

41,717. (Mr. Spender.) There are a certain number of Irish people who have domiciles in both countries?—You cannot have domiciles in both countries.

71,718. Well, who have residences and can acquire it?—They can acquire one by coming here, but they have to swear that they have come to live. There was a case the other day, I know, where there was a domicile acquired for the purpose of divorce.

41,719. Then I think you said, if facilities were granted, the cases would be more numerous; that is your opinion?—Yes.

41,720. Now, if one might take such a cause as desertion—do you mean that desertion will be more common, or that the actions for divorce on the ground of desertion will be more numerous?—Well, you do not get divorce for mere desertion.

41,721. I am supposing that we had the Scotch law in this country. Would you suggest that desertion would become more common?—I do indeed. I am perfectly certain if you had the mere desertion as a ground for divorce you would have them very often. I should think they would be greatly increased.

41,722. Do you mean the actual number of suits in which people applied for divorce would be increased, or that the actual practice of desertion would be increased?—I believe it would increase desertion.

41,723. Is that the experience in Scotland?—I do not know anything about Scotland, but I know people come and consult one as to how they are to get rid of their wives, and wives as to how they are to get away from their husbands; and it would be very easy.

41,724. Even if you take all the precautions they do in Scotland?—I do not know anything about the Scotch procedure.

41,725. The figures do not show that?—Well, we have a very large population here in England.

41,726. Who might be more prone to do that?—Yes.

41,727. (Lady Frances Balfour.) You said you thought that Ireland was entirely satisfied with the condition of its law, but I think I have come across cases, I happen to have an Irish friend who had to get a divorce through the House of Lords—a most scandalous case—and it cost her a thousand pounds? Very likely.

41,728. Do you think that is satisfactory?—No, but I do not think you can legislate for one person.

41,729. But we may presume, wonderful as Ireland is, there are more than one person who would take advantage of the law?—I daresay there are, but I talk of Ireland as a whole.

41,730. Do you think it is wrong that divorce should be granted for adultery?—You mean adultery by a man?

41,731. Or by a woman?—No, I do not. I do not see anything wrong.

41,732. Do you think it is just that a man or a woman should get release from marriage because of an act of adultery?—I think certainly, as the law stands at present, a woman should be divorced for an act of adultery.

41,733. That is an act of justice?—Yes.

41,734. Then do you think it is just that the law in Ireland should be such that you cannot get it under 1,000*l.*?—Because the general community there do not require it.

41,735. They do not require it because they cannot get it?—They do not ask for it.

41,736. You do not ask for the moon. If you cannot get a thing you do not ask for it?—I do not know; I think that is the time I do.

41,737. If it is a piece of justice, surely it should be within reasonable reach of those who want it?—But very often in legislating for individual acts of justice you may cause great pain and inconvenience and great public detriment; and, in my opinion, divorce is exactly one of those cases; although I have admitted all through my evidence there may be cases where it would be what you call an individual act of justice to individuals, still I believe the detriment to the community in making divorce cheap and common would outweigh it.

41,738. I do not call it individual justice. I said if it was a just law, ought it not to be within reach of all individuals?—I do not think so for the reasons I have given.

41,739. You prefer it should remain an act of injustice—that you cannot get justice?—Yes, if you please to put it in that way.

41,740. Yes, I do please to?—If you wish to legislate, I think the benefit to the community of making them think and reflect how sacred a thing the marriage tie is, ought to be considered—educating their minds to the belief that that is what they must preserve and see no loophole out of. I think that far outweighs any advantage that individuals may have in hard cases for having a lax law.

41,741. What part of the marriage tie do you think is sacred—the contract or the service?—Oh, I leave religion out altogether.

41,742. You used the word "sacred"?—Yes, well I do not take that from the religious view. I mean the greatest and most serious act that a man and woman can do in their whole lives and the obligations they take—not from a religious point of view, but the obligations that arise; I think it is most sacred.

41,743. I do not know what meaning you attach to sacred?—The meaning I have told you.

41,744. A serious act is a sacred act?—Yes.

41,745. Then, when we come to the question of cruelty, we have had some very interesting views on that. Do not you think it is possible, if you should have equal justice between men and women, that the man would more often think it more cruel to be unfaithful to his wife—which you do not seem to think very much of?—No; I do not think you should say that, Lady Frances. I do not think that is a justifiable observation.

41,746. Well then I withdraw it if you say so. From my point of view and most points of view it is an act of cruelty to go about with various women?—I agree. I said so.

41,747. Then when these men come and say they do not mind being adulterous, but they do mind being cruel to a woman, what do you say?—You see I am a lawyer, fortunately or unfortunately, and when they talk of cruelty, they talk of legal cruelty. The other is a matter that I think is cruel, but not legal cruelty.

41,748. It is morally cruel?—It is not my business to lecture them about these things. I tell them what is the law.

41,749. But you lecture them in the sense of telling them to go home and think about these things?—Yes. If I am consulted as to cruelty, I cannot tell them that a thing is legal cruelty that is not.

41,750. I again ask the question, if it was made equal as between men and women, do not you think you would be able to show that it was cruelty?—Well, I said before, that if a man flagrantly goes about and it becomes part of his life committing acts of immorality, and in that way causing his wife pain and annoyance, I say I would bring that within the definition of legal cruelty. I do not know whether you were here when I said it.

41,751. No, I am sorry I was late. You would bring that within it?—Yes, but I should make it as cruelty.

41,752. You would not give divorce for adultery alone?—I would in that case, but not a mere act of adultery——

41,753. What has been called here "accidental" adultery?—Yes, well call it accidental adultery. As I said before, I think if a man takes a woman about and flaunts her in the face of his wife and allows his wife to suffer in that kind of way—I think that is just as much cruelty as if you went and hit your wife a slap in the face.

41,754. And yet you say these men draw a distinction between that and striking their wives; that they regard that as cruelty and the other not?—I say the law draws that distinction.

48,755. If the law were made equal, do not you think it would raise the standard?—To that extent I would account that cruelty—that if a man is leading a persistent life of immorality or flaunting a woman in the face of his wife, I would count that cruelty and give a divorce. But what you call "accidental" adultery—which has happened over and over again, and the man and woman have been on good terms after—I would not bring that in for the reasons I have given.

41,756. Even with all the dangers that it would bring to the wife?—No.

41,757. You would not alter it in that respect?—No, because I do not think it would deter him. I think those accidental cases stand by themselves.

41,758. Would not it be very difficult to make out how much or how little would amount to that cruelty?—I do not think we could define it. We are not able to define how much, in a general life of interference, constitutes cruelty. It may be often a long series of small and petty acts that amount to cruelty, which taken by themselves would be no cruelty at all; and the law does not find any difficulty in that.

41,759. Probably, if the law were altered and made equal, you would not very much object yourself?—Personally?

41,760. Yes?—Except that I have a dislike for increasing divorce. But with regard to myself, as I have no anticipation of being divorced on any ground, it would not affect me personally.

41,761. No, but I think it would affect the lives of a great many women?—I think they will find they are wrong for the reasons I have given.

(Lord Guthrie.) My Lord, the witness used the word "Bill" throughout. I suppose they all passed into Acts.

(Chairman.) Yes, I just want to ask two or three questions.

(Judge Tindal Atkinson.) My Lord, I do not know if I may put one question.

(Chairman.) If there is anything new, by all means.

41,762. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Do you think that the fear of going into the Divorce Court acts as a deterrent against immorality?—I am very doubtful whether it does. It may with some women.

41,763–4. (Chairman.) May I just clear up one or two points. Lord Guthrie wishes to know when you refer to Bills whether you meant the Acts which had resulted from those Bills?—Yes, I did.

41,765. Then there are just these questions to ask you. Do you think that the views which you have very clearly expressed take adequate consideration of the interests of the children? Let me put what is passing through my mind, for instance—cases of gross cruelty, cases of habitual drunkenness, cases where the husband has deserted and gone to another country, and the woman has no means of bringing up her children. Do you think that the absolute retention of the tie in such cases as that takes adequate consideration of the interests of the children?—I have not very much considered that question, but I am very doubtful whether in those cases—I am talking now of the working classes—the thing can be a happy thing for the children at all.

41,766. We are told—we have had such a lot of evidence about it, and there is still more to come—that the effect of a woman being unable to sever the tie between her husband and herself is so disastrous on the children who are affected by remaining, that the children's interest must be considered and largely considered, in any views we have to express about it?—Do you mean that the woman marrying again would get a husband who would be willing to spend his wages on the other children?

41,767. Yes, it has been said by an enormous number of witnesses?—Well, I do not know enough about it to say that.

41,768. Would you differ from the view that that consideration ought to be borne in mind in dealing with these questions?—Yes, but I should like to satisfy myself as to how far and to what extent the children of a former marriage were likely to be benefited by any such remarriage.

41,769. That is a matter to judge of on other materials?—Yes.

41,770. The other point is this. A question was put to you by Mr. Spender with regard to desertion, if made a ground in England, probably increasing the inclination to people to desert?—Yes.

41,771. Do you think there would be a great check possible upon that if the desertion involved the court's dealing with the property of the husband as if he were dead, or ordering money to be paid as long as his wife lived?—No doubt, in a case where there was property, that would be so.

41,772. And where there was none, if there were an order made to pay?—Well, those orders to pay, where there is no property, as your Lordship knows, are very difficult to enforce.

41,773. Well, they shut a man up in prison?—I know they do, and there is always a great agitation going on to stop it.

41,774. Do you think that that would have to be taken into consideration in thinking whether, if desertion were added as a ground, there might not be strong temptation not to desert if the effects of orders of that kind were severely pressing upon the deserter?—Well, in my opinion, if you make desertion a ground of divorce as apart from separation, I think myself it will be a disastrous revolution in the whole matter; but you see you could bring about all that without granting divorce—all that you are saying—by saying that in a case where a man deserts his wife, upon a petition to the court, either for separation or anything of that kind, you would have full power to deal with his property. In point of fact you have now.

41,775. I know, but there is this further difficulty about that particular subject, that we have had a lot of evidence that these deserters go to countries like the United States and Canada and the other Colonies and set up new homes of their own. Now the sanctity of marriage is absolutely gone in a case of that kind, and the unfortunate woman left behind remains tied for the rest of her life, while the man is living what I suppose he thinks is a happy existence in another country. I only want to know whether you think any great harm is done, or would be done by legislating to enable a woman in that case to be free?—If you enable it in that case, you would in every case. You would have to enact that if I walk away to-morrow because I am tired of my wife, that then a divorce can follow.

41,776. The reason I am putting it a little more fully than necessary perhaps is that that happens every day now under the present dispensation. We have had proof from almost every place in England of that happening?—Yes, but then you have tied the man. Suppose a man falls in love as they call it with a woman, and he says: Now I can desert my wife, and that is a ground; the other woman he is in love with may be a perfectly proper woman in the sense that she would not be guilty of immorality as long as there is no divorce. Then he can go and make a ground of divorce with a view to marrying this woman by a mere desertion. That would be calamitous.

41,777. He does it now?—No, he does not.

41,778. Yes?—He does not make it a ground of divorce. I do not say there are not cases where it might not be very well, but I take the general view. If you can limit it to certain cases, it might be all right; but you open up a floodgate of new divorces and new opportunity of getting divorce.

41,779. But we are told that that ground in Scotland works perfectly well?—Well, I do not know anything about that.

41,780. And we have had the statistics to show it?—Yes, well I do not know anything about that.

41,781. And that it has been in operation for 300 years?—My belief is it would work very badly in England in the class of people I have to do with.

47,782. Then following out one other matter that Lady Frances Balfour put to you as to this position between men and women. At present, as I understand it, a woman can for any single act—accidental or otherwise—obtain a decree of judicial separation?—Yes.

41,783. Does not she by that punish the man more than if she gets a divorce from him?—Very likely. Yes, I think she does.

41,784. Then why should not it be equally available for a decree of divorce?—Well, because I am opposed to allowing a divorce in that kind of case.

(Chairman.) I think those are all the matters. Thank you very much for coming, Sir Edward. It must have been inconvenient, and we shall have to weigh your evidence with the greatest care.

Mr. ALFRED JAMES SHEPHEARD called and examined.

41,785. (Lord Guthrie.) Mr. Shepheard, you have been in practice as a solicitor for upwards of 40 years in London?—Yes.

41,786. And you have had a considerable connection amongst Nonconformists?—Yes.

41,787. You are secretary of the Protestant Dissenting Deputies, a body which has existed for over 170 years, and is made up of lay representatives from Nonconformists in London?—Yes.

41,788. In London only?—Yes.

41,789. And you have been a member of the Congregational Union for many years, and its governing committee and council?—Yes.

41,790. And at present you are Chairman of the General Purposes Committee?—Yes.

41,791. In that way you are in a position to know the views of Nonconformists on the questions we are considering in this Commission?—I think so, particularly amongst the Congregational body.

41,792. I think a communication was sent by the Secretary of this Commission to the Congregational Union asking them if they desired to have their views expressed, and you are here in answer to that communication?—I am here with my colleague the Rev. Mr. Jones who is coming to-morrow. I very much regret he is not here first, because when he was appointed he was the Chairman of the Union, and I am only chairman of a Committee. Therefore I should have liked him to be the first witness.

41,793. I understand in your proof you refer to a resolution which you produce. What body was that resolution passed by?—It was passed by the Council of the Union.

41,794. That represents the Congregational body only?—The Congregational body only.

41,795. Neither Presbyterian, Baptist, nor Methodist?—No, my Lord.

41,796. Have you a copy of the resolution?—Yes.

41,797. When were these resolutions passed?—About March this year.

41,798. At a meeting the Congregational Union as a whole?—No, a meeting of the Council of the Union.

41,799. How many does that consist of?—200 to 300. It may be taken fairly to represent the view of the Union just as much as if the Assembly had spoken.

41,800. Coming from different parts of England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland?—Not Scotland and Ireland, only England and Wales.

41,801. Is it composed partly of ministers and partly of laymen?—Yes, and of men and women.

41,802. What would be the proportion of ministers to laymen and laywomen?—I could not give that right off.

41,803. Roughly?—I should not like to give it; I have never looked at it.

41,804. Would the majority be laymen and lay women or ministers?—I should think the members attending would be a majority of ministers.

41,805. Will you read that resolution?—I may say it was passed with the express view of putting before this Commission.

41,806. Unanimous?—No, but by a large majority.

41,807. Can you give the figures?—No. I can get them.

"(1) That no extension of divorce be made beyond the one ground of unfaithfulness.

"(2) That no one should be debarred, owing to excessive costs, from obtaining a Divorce Order of the Court, and that in any necessary revision of charges the case of the very poor should have special consideration.

"(3) That the only report of Divorce Court proceedings to be allowed, be one furnished to the press by an authorised officer of the Court; such report to make clear on whom the guilt rests.

"(4) That the moral guilt being the same in the case of the men as in that of the women, husbands and wives in respect of marital infidelity to be placed on a legal equality."

41,808. May I ask whether there was any difference of opinion except with regard to the first of these resolutions?—Yes, I was not there—I should like to say that.

41,809. Was Mr. Jones there?—Mr. Jones was there. Perhaps you would not mind postponing that question till he comes; but I believe there was a difference of opinion on number four as well as number one.

41,810. As far as I understand, the Council were unanimous with regard to the poor having the same remedies as the rich; and with regard to the publication question?—I think so, yes, my Lord.

41,811. Would you tell us to what extent you yourself have had any experience amongst the classes among whom divorce proceedings at present originate?—My personal experience is very limited. It is a curious fact, but I have been casting my memory back as far as I can with a view to appearing here to-day, and I do not know a dozen cases of divorce amongst Congregationalists that have come to my knowledge—either professionally or as a member of the body. I do not say there have not been a larger number than that, but I could not put them down or remember them.

41,812. Have you had in your practice any case of divorce between Nonconformists?—I have only had a very few cases in my practice. One was a case that went to the House of Lords—a divorce with regard to people who had been Nonconformists but were not at that time.

41,813. Have you known cases of that kind where persons who have once been Nonconformists, have had recourse to the Divorce Court after having joined other bodies?—No, I should not like to give an answer to that; I do not remember.

41,814. Have you yourself worked amongst the poor apart from Congregational interests?—I have had a great deal to do with the poor, but I have not worked myself as a poor man's lawyer; but I have in my firm a son who is a poor man's lawyer in London, and a nephew who is another poor man's lawyer at another Settlement.

41,815. Is your son at Claremont Mission, Islington, and your nephew at Whitefield's, Tottenham Court Road?—Yes.

41,816. What is their experience with regard to divorce as you understand?—They tell me when people come to consult them—as they very often do—that as soon as they hear what the expense of a divorce is, they give it up almost invariably; and then I am sorry to say, they go on to add, the result is that they very often live in illicit intercourse, either the man with another woman, or the woman with another man.

41,817. Are those persons who allege that they have grounds for divorce because of adultery?—Yes.

41,818. You have no knowledge as to whether and to what extent there are other persons who desire divorce on other grounds, and are told that by the law of England there is no other ground available for them except adultery?—I only have general knowledge that when a woman is deserted by her husband she naturally wants to know if that is not enough for divorce, but I cannot speak of specific instances.

41,819. Have you any opinion as to whether the cases are many or few where, apart from anything else, divorce would benefit the innocent spouse and the innocent children?—No, there again I could not give you specific instances.

41,820. Or whether the cases are many or few?—No.

41,821. Now to take your resolution, with regard to the first matter, that no extension of divorce be made beyond the one ground of unfaithfulness. Is that based on a single ground, namely, either scriptural or public policy; or on a combination of grounds?—I should think, my Lord, it arises originally from the scriptural ground or the idea drawn from scripture that that is the only ground that ought to be allowed for divorce. But I do not think that is the only ground on which it is held. I think it is held on general State grounds that the facilities for divorce should not be extended too far.

41,822. With regard to the scriptural ground, is there any difference of opinion amongst the Congregationalists on whether Christ's command was absolute, without exception, or whether it allows one exception, or whether there may be more than one exception?—Yes, I should think there are all those views held amongst the Congregationalists.

41,823. Now on the question of public policy, could you just state how that strikes those whom you represent?—Those who feel with myself would feel that we should wish to keep the principle of the marriage tie as not to be violated on any account whatever. Acting on this principle, we say that divorce should only be allowed where it was felt that adultery had been committed, and that therefore there was no longer a marriage existing. I should put it in that way myself.

41,824. No marriage existing in fact?—Yes, it has been broken by one of the parties committing adultery. But on the State ground I should think I am representing the majority of my colleagues in the Congregational body in saying that we are exceedingly averse to extending divorce.

41,825. As far as you know, has the question been considered of whether in the case of desertion proved to be permanent, wilful—abandonment of the marital relation—there is not exactly the same ground as there is in the case of adultery; namely, that the marriage has terminated in fact and finally?—I do not think so, my Lord. In the one case the moral aspect comes in very strongly, and in that other case not so strongly. For myself I do not hold desertion is the same breach of the marriage state as adultery is, by any means.

41,826. Why not, Mr. Shepheard?—It may be sentimental partly, but the old view and the view that commends itself to me is that a man and wife are one flesh, and having become so, if any part of the body is used to unite with another, that is a breach of the marriage-ideal. But in desertion that does not come up—it is only that a man or a woman goes away.

41,827. One quite understands; they become one flesh, and if the man commits adultery, that has ceased to do?—Yes.

41,828. But apart from scripture, do you see any difference so far as failure in the one case to fulfil one of the conditions, namely fidelity, and failure in the other case to fulfil all the conditions?—Yes, I think in one case fidelity is the main condition of marriage, and adherence is a subsidiary condition—a very important one, but a subsidiary one. Therefore I do hold there is a difference between the two.

41,829. Does that express fully your views on that?—May I just say one thing. I notice lately you have been taking the case of lunatics. If I am asked to express my own view, I should say that a confirmed lunatic ceases to be a normal being; and on that ground I should be prepared to think divorce might be allowed.

41,830. Do you think that expresses the common view amongst the Congregationalists?—I do not think it has been thought of very much amongst the Congregationalists. I think the idea is a new one, and wants a lot of consideration amongst us. I am only expressing my own view.

41,831. How do you reconcile that with what you have previously said, that it is only where there is a moral fault leading to the idea of the "one flesh" coming to an end?—Well, I take this view, that the man or woman by becoming a confirmed lunatic is no longer a man or woman—not a human being. A confirmed lunatic is not an ordinary human being, and therefore should not have the rights of an ordinary human being or compel anybody to deal with him as if he were so.

41,832. Even though the fact was that it was a lunacy on one point?—Yes, I can see the point. I am thinking of a lunatic who is taken away from his family and separated in an asylum, and we are told he will never be in a state to come back again. It seems then a great hardship that the one left should be tied to that sort of person.

41,833. If, however, we are to go upon the consideration of hardship merely, I suppose you would extend your area so as to cover systematic cruelty, habitual drunkenness, long sentences of imprisonment?—Those are very difficult points, my Lord, to form an opinion upon. I grant that in those cases the hardship of not allowing divorce is exceedingly great. At the same time I have to balance the thought in my mind, and if you extend divorce in that way, are not you doing what I should consider an injury to the idea of the marriage tie in the view of society?

41,834. In general?—Yes.

41,835. Then with regard to the second point. You have spoken about the excessive costs, and the resolution quite tallies with the information you have had from these poor men's lawyers?—Yes.

41,336. With regard to the third point, how far do you propose to go? What is this report by the authorised officer of the court to include?—My idea would be that it includes simply the result; the fact that the divorce was brought; the names of the persons and the fact of the decree, and stating on whose fault the decree is granted.

41,837. Supposing the decree is not granted, would it not be fair that the judge's opinion, which may free the respondent entirely, should be published?—I think it would be.

41,838. Have you considered whether the Court should be open or shut in such cases?—I do not think you can shut a public court. I have a great idea that justice should be done in public, and I would not therefore shut it, but I should hope that every endeavour would be made to keep out those whose mere object in coming was curiosity. But I should not advocate the shutting of the Court.

41,839. Would it not be sufficient, in your view, if any persons interested in the case—relatives or others—were allowed in, and the mere outside public kept out?—You mean, including the press?

41,840. I will put it in this way. If the persons interested directly or indirectly only, and solicitors or barristers that chose to come in were admitted, would not that be sufficient publicity to satisfy your view?—I think it would be.

41,841. Then with regard to the last point. Perhaps Mr. Jones would know better if there was any substantial difference of opinion on the question of equality?—I do not think so. That view is held very fully amongst us.

41,842. And what is your own view?—My view is distinctly that. Of course I know what is said, that the results of the infidelity in the one case are very different from the other; that I have realised, and a lawyer can appreciate it; but that the moral guilt is the same in the one case as the other, I hold most strongly.

41,843. And is it your view that the wife is the best judge of whether it would be in her own interests or the interests of the children to take proceedings or not, if there is adultery?—I do not quite see who else is to be the judge. It must be the wife, must it not?

41,844. But at the present moment, whatever the wife's view of the indignity is, she cannot sue unless there is something else conjoined with it?—Yes.

41,845. Do you think, if it is a question of indignity, that she is the best judge prim̀ facie of whether the indignity is sufficient or not?—Quite so.

41,846. And it is the fact, as known to you, that women in such matters are extraordinarily long-suffering?—Oh, undoubtedly; that is common knowledge, I should have thought.

41,847. With regard to adultery and cruelty and drink?—Yes.

41,848. What is the practice at the present moment, or is there any, amongst Congregational ministers if an innocent party has divorced a guilty spouse, and he comes there-after, asking a Congregational minister to marry him to some third party altogether. What does the minister do?—If the guilty one comes?

41,849. No, the innocent?—Oh, they would remarry him. I do not think you would find an exception.

41,850. What about the guilty?—I think they would in that case also.

41,851. Supposing the guilty person proposes to marry the paramour, in connection with whom he or she has been divorced, what then?—I think they would marry them.

41,852. On what view is that done?—I think they would accept the fact that the marriage tie had by law been loosened altogether, and that therefore the re-marriage was allowable; and also that it would be desirable that the guilty ones, if they desired, should live together as man and wife.

41,853. Now, it has been suggtsted to us that while in the interests of the guilty person that is clearly so, in the interests of general policy it is more desirable to prohibit such marriage because you would then take away a considerable temptation that leads to adultery in the expectation that it will be made all right by subsequent marriage. How does that strike you?—I appreciate the weight of that argument very much. It is a very strong argument indeed; but I have to take the fact that the former marriage has been dissolved, and that two guilty persons wish to live in a better state—in a state of marriage as man and wife—and I take the simple fact as I find it, that they wish to do it and therefore should be allowed to do it, and I should facilitate it.

41,854. And I suppose it is your view that it is in the interests of the State to prevent illegitimacy as much as possible?—Clearly.

41,855. And if that were not allowed, you would have them living together and having illegitimate children?—Yes.

(Lord Guthrie.) Thank you, Mr. Shepheard, we are much obliged to you for your evidence.

Mr. RONALD PERCY CLAYTON, called and examined.

41,856. (Lord Guthrie.) Would you kindly tell us what you are, Mr. Clayton?—I am solicitor to the Liverpool Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and also a member of the committee of that society.

41,857. For how long have you been so?—Eight years.

41,858. You have forwarded a copy of the Report of the Liverpool Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?—Yes.

41,859. That shows that you deal with a very large number of children who are in necessitous circumstances from a great many reasons unfortunately?—That is so.

41,860. And I see at page 9 there is an account of the society and then at page 26 there is a table showing the causes that bring the children unfortunately within your knowledge?—That is so.

41,861. Divided under cases of violence, cruel neglect, begging, vagrancy and exposure, and fourth, immorality?—That is so.

41,862. One or two questions on these figures. I notice with regard to the violence an extraordinary discrepancy in the number of cases. Take 1897, 312; then in 1909 only 97. How does that arise?—Those cases are the cases of what I may call active violence—actual brutal ill-treatment as distinguished from passive neglect. The class of those cases is distinctly on the decrease. We do not meet such violent cases of cruelty as we did in years past.

41,863. What do you trace the decrease to?—I trace it to a better state of life amongst the poorer classes of Liverpool, where the slum districts have been very largely wiped out. Secondly, to the operations of the society, and to the fact that the inspectors are getting very well known in the poorer districts, and the people are afraid of having these cases brought up by the society if they cruelly ill-treat their children. And, thirdly, I may say that these cases of brutal ill-treatment are generally the climax to a course of ill-treatment which is stopped in the earlier stages by the operations of the society.

41,864. It is not from your officers merely driving the people away to other places?—Oh, dear, no.

41,865. Because other societies operate elsewhere?—Yes, our society operates in Liverpool only. The National Society operates practically elsewhere.

41,866. Do you attribute anything to the diminished facilities for getting drink?—No doubt that has an effect. I think the amount of drinking in Liverpool is on the decrease.

41,867. Then in the cases of cruel neglect, you have an increase there. If you take the same year, 1897, you have 4,141, and in 1909, the same year for comparison, 10,754; how is that?—Increase in the supervision, a more systematic inspection of the town and the finding out of more cases. I do not think it is due to an actual increase in cases, but it is due to the detection of more cases.

41,868. Then begging, vagrancy and exposure. There is an extraordinary increase in 1909, when you had 227 cases as against 34 in 1907. What is that due to?—That is due to periodical attempts to put down begging in the streets. It is an almost impossible thing to put down, but every now and again an attempt is made to do it, which shows an increased number.

41,869. Then you cannot infer much from that?—No, I do not think anything can be inferred from that.

41,870. And then, last, immorality. One sees a diminution on the whole, because in 1897 you have 111, and then in 1909 you have 31. Can you deduce anything from that?—I think that is due to the fact that the police are stricter with regard to the immoral houses in Liverpool, and the amount of the immorality in connection with the immoral houses and the children there is not as large as it was.

41,871. Can you say, Mr. Clayton, to what extent those children so dealt with are deserted by their parents?—Comparatively few cases. The vast number of the cases are those of neglect in the way of not making sufficient provision for their food and clothing, and so on; and, with regard to the women, lack of cleanliness—allowing them to get into a verminous and dirty condition.

41,872. Have you a considerable number of women who come and tell you their husbands have deserted them?—The majority of our cases—in fact, I may say nearly two-thirds, I think—are on reports by one parent against the other. The society is very well known in Liverpool now, and is looked upon as a friend of the children in such a way that if the parents have any cause of complaint one against the other which is acting deleteriously to the children, they come at once to the society and invoke its aid.

41,873. Then the remaining one-third consists of children, of widows, and of deserted wives?—Two-thirds would be the remainder. I should have said one-third in the other matter.

41,874. One-third would be one parent informing against the other?—Yes.

41,875. And what is the other two-thirds?—Any other complaint. They are all set out on page 30 of the Report.

41,876. Then does page 30 enable us to have any idea of the number of cases of desertion?—No, that would give no information on that point.

41,877. We cannot get that?—No, it would not be possible.

41,878. You see we have had to consider the bearing of desertion on divorce, and whether there are many cases where a man goes away to the Colonies?—Yes.

41,879. You cannot give us any information?—No, I am afraid I could not give you actual figures on that point.

41,880. Could you give us any views as to whether in the interests of the children there are cases where, if women, let us say, could get a divorce from their husbands, they would do so beneficially to their children?—No, I cannot think that it would materially benefit the children.

41,881. What would be the result, do you think, of enabling the poorer classes, where there is adultery, to get a divorce? Do you think they would avail themselves of it to any extent?—I think, with regard to the class with which we are dealing, it would be perfectly inoperative. Divorce could not possibly be made cheap enough to deal with their cases.

41,882. How would you define the classes you deal with; you would not call them the submerged tenth, would you?—No, I should call them——

41,883. A little above it or below it?—Well casual labourers of a migratory class, dock labourers and so on.

41,884. Well, that is very near the submerged tenth?—Yes, they are very near the border line.

41,885. You do not meet with skilled labourers?—We do not get much trouble in those cases.

41,886. Or labourers in regular employment?—Yes, a certain number of those.

41,887. But that is where there is drink, I suppose?—Yes, almost invariably drink.

41,888. Then with regard to the Children's Courts, to which you refer on page 17; are those courts shut to the public? On page 17 you refer to the Children's Acts, and to the provision that there should be separate police courts for trying children. Are those shut to the public?—Yes.

41,889. Except to persons interested?—Yes.

41,890. Are they shut to reporters?—They are shut to reporters.

41,891. And is that found to work well?—Yes, I think so. Perhaps I am not right about the reporters; I do uot think the reporters are there, but I am not sure.

41,892. (Mr. Brierley.) I think they are open to the press?—Yes, well I am not certain. I will go so far as to say I do not think I have ever seen a report of any case of the Children's Court in Liverpool.

41,893. (Lord Guthrie.) Does it ever come across your knowledge, Mr. Clayton, of efforts being made to reconcile the parents of these children to get them to live together again?—Perhaps if I may be allowed to explain exactly how we work these cases. The cases which are found by the inspectors not to be amenable to persuasion by them are in almost every case brought before the Visiting Committee of the society. The Visiting Committee sits every Wednesday at the society's shelter for children. The parents are warned to be present, and in most cases come. The inspector states the case against them, and they are entitled to answer.

41,894. Both parents?—The parent in fault particularly. Then an effort is made by the Committee to reconcile the parents, the main object being not to break up the home.

41,895. Is that often successful?—In a very large number of cases. In fact last year the number of cases brought before the Visiting Committee at the shelter was I think 528; of those 93 were ordered for prosecution, and those are the worst cases. The whole number of investigations would be largely in excess of those, because they would not be actually brought up by the inspector to the Committee, but of 528 only 93 were ordered for prosecution. The rest were cautioned, advised, and helped to get employment and sent back again, frequently the children cleaned and clothed and given back again in a condition in which it is hoped they can be kept nicely in future.

41,896. In your view, that was for the benefit of the children?—We attribute a very large part of our success to that personal investigation of each case by the Committee.

41,897. Then, in your opinion, is the desirability of keeping the family together sufficient even to counterbalance the drawbacks that may arise from occasional drunkenness and so on?—I think so.

41,898. Or even occasional cruelty?—Or even occasional cruelty. We see many cases where after warnings by the society—even drunkenness and cruelty—the home has ultimately become a happy one.

41,899. There is a case of that I see on pages 19 and 20, where apparently a very bad case had, through the agency of your society, been put right?—Yes.

41,900. Where the mother pawned everything she possessed?—Yes.

41,901. And do you think that more could be done in the way of trying to reconcile these people who are quarrelling, to the drawback of their families, than is done?—It is difficult to say if anything more could be done.

41,902. But wherever it is possible it should be done?—Yes.

41,903. Have you any experience of the difficulty, where there is an order made on the man to pay something for his wife and children, in recovering it?—Yes, many cases.

41,904. How does that arise with you?—Well, the experience of the society is that an order on a man merely for payment of money—a maintenance order—is very largely inoperative. The man does not pay—either refusing deliberately or because he cannot. Then a warrant is taken out for arrears, and rather than go to prison he goes back, frequently, to the wife and induces her to allow him to cohabit again—either voluntarily or forces his way in, and breaks the maintenance order.

41,905. Have you any suggestion to make as to any better method than is now possible?—In our society, in a number of cases where there has not been actually a maintenance order and separation by the Court, but where the facts would justify such a case, we get the guilty husband to pay the money to the society, and the society passes it on to the wife. I think we are acting like that in about 20 cases at present, and we have found that very effective, because the wife has not to go and ask the husband for the money, and they are kept quietly apart for a short time to think over their difficulties, and to realise that the faults were not all on one side. The wife has the opportunity of getting a nice clean home together again, and we find in perhaps half the cases they ultimately come back and live happily.

41,906. Do you get the money from the man?—We get the money from the man and pay it over to the woman on her signing a counterfoil.

41,907. You have no cases where you get the money direct from the employer?—No.

41,908. Would not that be practicable?—Not with the class of people we deal with, because the employment is of so casual a nature. One man may be employed by three or four different people each week; he may get one day's work here, and one day's work there.

41,909. So that if by the law it was possible for the order to be made, for payment to be made to the woman, it would not come to much?—No, not in the class we deal with.

41,910. Do you find both women with their husbands and husbands with their wives stand an extraordinary amount?—Yes, an extraordinary amount.

41,911. Is it your experience that they are ready for trivial causes to rush for separations, or not?—No, far from it.

41,912. You have not found in your experience cases of that kind the other way?—No, it is generally a far-reaching case before they want to break up the home.

41,913. After a course of ill-treatment?—That is so.

41,914. Do you find that these women are largely moved, or at all moved, by the interests of their children even when they are in conflict with their own personal interest?—Oh, I think so, unless they are the actual persons in default.

41,915. I mean the innocent women?—Oh, certainly, I think, certainly so.

41,916. Is not that generally the primary interest in the case of the innocent woman?—I think so.

41,917. (Mr. Burt.) I notice that in all these cases, covering about six or seven pages, drunkenness has been the cause of the neglect of the family?—I should think in certainly 90 per cent. of the cases drunkenness is the primary cause.

41,918. I want to know whether these were specially selected. They represent a large percentage of cases of neglect and cruelty?—Yes, in 90 per cent. of all the cases the primary cause of neglect and cruelty is drink.

41,919. In one case it is mentioned that laziness as well as drink was the cause?—Yes.

41,920. I suppose the two often go together?—Very frequently, but you do get occasional cases of laziness without drink, but they are few and far between.

41,921. I suppose you find many cases in which an intemperate husband and an intemperate wife may be industrious?—Yes, but with always very bad effects on the children. They become neglected in the case of drink on both sides.

41,922. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I understood by your evidence you did not wish to give any statistics with regard to desertion. Of course, you see a vast number of cases in Liverpool?—Yes.

41,923. Could you say without giving any figures whether there is a great proportion of cases of desertion amongst these people that come under your notice?—No, I should not say a very great proportion.

41,924. And that, although the Liverpool population is largely casual labourers, Liverpool being a seaport and necessarily a very migratory class?—Yes, that is so.

41,925. That is rather remarkable. Then I wanted to ask you with regard to the separation orders not being applied for except under great provocation. Does that apply to people of all ages or to the mature men and women who have families? I will tell you exactly what I am thinking of. We have had a good deal of evidence here of mere lads and girls who have got married and then in a few weeks, without any provocation almost, going off to the magistrate to get a separation order?—Yes, that does occur.

41,926. That comes within your experience, too?—Yes.

41,927. But in the case of really adult people with families, your evidence is that they stand a great deal before they apply?—Yes.

41,928. Then with regard to reconciliations, I thought I heard you say that about 50 per cent. of your cases after separation orders, where you had an opportunity of receiving the money yourself, ended in reconciliation?—Those are rather selected cases, perhaps. They are cases where there has been no separation order; not cases which the court has ever dealt with, but where they are living apart and want to get a separation, and arrangements have been made instead for the husband to pay the money to the wife through the sheltering home.

41,929. But the parties have never been separated?—No, but they are given the opportunity of living apart and settling their differences.

41,930. Then they are separated de acto for the time?—Yes.

41,931. And your reconciliations are really bonâ fide reconciliations?—I think I may say half become reconciled, and perhaps four-fifths of those remain happily reconciled.

41,932. With regard to separation orders, I suppose you have come across a great proportion of cases where the order lapses?—Yes.

41,933. And of those I suppose a considerable proportion are reconciliations in a real sense?—Oh, no doubt. A considerable proportion.

41,934. That comes within your experience?—Oh, yes, but not by any means all: a great many are deliberately broken by the husbands.

41,935. And there are sham reconciliations of course?—Yes.

41,936. But putting those aside, your evidence is that there are a great number of real reconciliations?—Oh, yes, no doubt.

41,937. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Do you think that if divorce could be brought within the reach of these casual labourers they would avail themselves of it?—Well, sir, I cannot imagine any conceivable method of bringing it within their reach.

41,938. Suppose you take Liverpool, and they could reach the County Court there?—That would be prohibitive. I am speaking of a class of people to whom the separation fee of two shillings is prohibitive. They have to apply for a summons free.

41,939. Then if a system of formâ pauperis were granted?—They must cost something. There must be costs of witnesses and bringing the witnesses to the court—actual carriage expenses.

41,940. Assuming they could get to the Court, would they avail themselves of it?—It is a subject which it is almost impossible to judge of. I should hardly think it is likely. I do not think they would realise they could get it for nothing; and it would have to be absolutely for nothing.

41,941. But realising that fact, would it not be probable?—I have no doubt they would if they could get it for nothing at all.

41,942. (Mr. Brierley.) Just one word about the statistics in the answers you gave. You told Lord Guthrie that the rise from 4,141 cases of general neglect in 1897 to 10,754 in 1909 was owing to the greater activity of your inspectors?—Yes, and partly to the increase of the area.

41,943. I was going to suggest that. You work within the City of Liverpool?—Yes.

41,944. And as that extends so does the sphere of the operations of your society?—Yes.

41,945. I take it the population of Liverpool has increased at least one-third in recent years?—Yes.

41,946. In 1901 there was a sudden rise?—Yes.

41,947. Was that the year that Garston was taken in?—I think there was an incorporation in that year.

41,948. They had taken in a very large district?—Yes.

41,949. And it is partly accounted for by that?—Yes.

41,950. (Lord Guthrie.) Just one point. I notice in your proof you have a reference to cases under the Incest Act and the Criminal Law Amendment Act, and you say you report these to the police?—Yes.

41,951. Can you give us any figures as to the numbers you report?—No, we merely report the cases after a preliminary and very slight investigation to see if there is a primâ facie case; we report them to the police and leave them entirely in their hands.

41,952. Do you get many complaints?—Not a great many; perhaps six or seven a year.

41,953. Under both Acts?—Yes. Well, mainly under the Criminal Law Amendment Act. The Incest Act is so recent that one hardly has had any cases under it.

41,954. That is true. Then have you any notion of the number of those that are bonâ fide?—We only report them. We cease actually to be concerned in them after reporting them to the police.

41,955. But unless you think them bonâ fide you do not report them?—No.

(Lord Guthrie.) Thank you, Mr. Clayton; we are much obliged for your evidence.

Adjourned.

of cases would be smaller, as there are sometimes several children involved in one case.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FIFTY-SECOND DAY.

Wednesday, December 14th, 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir WILLIAM ANSON, Bart., M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORGE WHITE, M.P.
His Honour Judge TINDAL ATKINSON.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.
The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES, Secretary.

Rev. JOHN DANIEL JONES, called and examined.

41,956. (Chairman.) Are you a Master of Arts and a Bachelor of Divinity?—Yes.

41,957. What is the body to which you belong?—The Congregational Union of England and Wales.

41,958. Where are your own special services?—Richmond Hill, Bournemouth.

41,959. Do you hold at the moment any official position in the Congregational Union?—Not exactly. I am ex-Chairman. I was Chairman last year, when the request for evidence came before the Council.

41,960. That is how we had your name before us?—Yes.

41,961. Is that a yearly office?—Yes.

41,962. You have only sent a very short memorandum; probably you will expand it when you give evidence. First of all, I would like to ask you, what is the extent of the Union?—We number half a million communicants, about one and a half millions of adherents, members of congregations, and about 3,000 ministers.

41,963. Does that mean 3,000 churches?—Yes, fully that: more than that.

41,964. Do some ministers have more than one place?—Yes.

41,965. Is that scattered over the whole of England and Wales?—Yes.

41,966. The first point you propose to deal with is the question of the grounds on which divorce should be granted. Do you express individual views, or views which you were delegated to present?—I am delegated to express what is in the minute here.

41,967. Perhaps you will give any individual view you hold if asked about it. First of all, with regard to the grounds of divorce, what do you say about that?—Speaking generally, the Union is not in favour of multiplying the grounds of divorce. The general view would be that adultery is the only ground the Union would recognise.

41,968. Is that based on Scriptural reasons?—Partly, I think.

41,969. What else?—The general conception of marriage that obtains amongst us.

41,970. Is that a unanimous opinion, or is there any divergence about it?—We are the most individualistic of all denominations. I should not like to say for one minute that that was unanimous, but that is the general trend of feeling amongst us.

41,971. Has it been discussed at all, and have any resolutions been passed?—Not in General Assembly, but in what we call the Council, which is the business Executive Committee of the Assembly.

41,972. Has any resolution been passed about it?—These resolutions were passed by the Council.

41,973. The first is "That no extension of divorce "be made beyond the one ground of unfaithfulness." That does not necessarily express the whole individual opinion?—No, because even at the Council at which this matter was discussed several expressed the desire that divorce should be granted, say, for insanity and in the case of habitual criminals. Those things were mentioned specially.

41,974. Was desertion mentioned specially?—I think it was. One or two magistrates mentioned desertion.

41,975. Was this a meeting partly of clergy and partly of laity?—Yes.

41,976. Some magistrates expressed a view in favour of desertion being made a ground of divorce?—Yes.

41,977. The next resolution is with regard to means. Perhaps you would read the resolution and say anything further upon it you wish to say?—"That "no one should be debarred, owing to excessive costs, "from obtaining a divorce order of the Court, and "that in any necessary revision of charges the case of "the very poor should have special consideration." The Council felt that in case of infidelity the poor should have a chance of relief on the same terms as the rich. I presume they meant that the cost of divorce should be brought within the reach of the poor.

41,978. The means of doing that is a matter they did not consider?—No.

41,979. But that it should be done was unanimous?—Yes.

41,980. What is the third resolution?—"That the "only report of Divorce Court proceedings to be "allowed be one furnished to the Press by an autho-"rised officer of the Court; such report to make clear "on whom the guilt rests." The feeling the Council had was that there was a certain profit in publicity in the way of putting a stigma on the guilty party, but at the same time it was strongly felt that full publication of details was injurious to morality.

41,981. Have you been able to notice any effects of that character?—If I may speak quite frankly, we have very few illustrations of that kind. Divorce amongst us is almost unknown. In all my 21 years I have come across no case of this kind.

41,982. The Union is really a Union of a highly moral class of people?—I do not wish to claim for them any superiority over any other body, but as a matter of fact we have very few cases of divorce amongst us. I think that those of our men who live in London districts have felt that the full publication of divorce reports has been found injurious, for instance, to young folk. That has been found.

41,983. What is the last resolution, No. 4?—"That "the moral guilt being the same in the case of the men "as in that of the women, husbands and wives in "respect of marital infidelity to be placed on a legal "equality." Of course we recognise that the social effects are not necessarily the same, but looking at it as Christian men we felt the moral guilt was the same in both cases, and therefore that men and women should be put on a footing of absolute equality.

41,984. Leaving them to exercise their right if they thought it was a case in which they ought to do so?—Yes.

41,985. Was that a unanimous view?—Yes. Upon the last three resolutions we are unanimous; it is only on the first we differ.

41,986. What was the number present when these resolutions were passed?—The Council numbers 300. We met at Lincoln in March of this year. I should think there would be present perhaps 200 to 250.

41,987. Both clerical and lay?—Yes; they are representative. We represent one another by counties.

41,988. Is there anything else you yourself would add to what you have already said?—I do not think so, unless members of the Commission wish to ask me questions.

41,989. I have no doubt they will?—I think these resolutions represent my own personal views very much.

41,990. (Mr. Brierley.) Could you tell me, as to the question of desertion, what sort of division of opinion there was in the Council?—The division did not come to a vote; I could not tell you the proportion. Several of our laymen especially hold that insanity even more than desertion should be a ground. Some would grant it in the case of desertion, the habitual criminal and the insane.

41,991. There was no division about it?—No.

41,992. (Lord Guthrie.) I understand the general feeling was that nothing should be done which might affect the general idea of the permanency of marriage?—Yes.

41,993. Was there any consideration of whether any particular proposal such as desertion would affect the idea of the permanency of marriage?—I do not know that that precise point was debated at all. The general conception of marriage that prevails amongst us is a high and an ideal one, and the feeling was that, although possibly the present law presses hardly on individual cases, and those were recognised frankly, desertion and the habitual criminal and the insane, yet the general feeling was that it was better that there should be individual suffering than that by a lowering of the Christian ideal of marriage damage should be inflicted on the community at large.

41,994. The idea was it would not be desirable to run possible risks?—Yes.

41,995. But whether the area of suffering was so large as to make it necessary to run risks was not considered?—No.

41,996. Out of the 200 to 250 present how many would be ministers? Both men and women were present?—There are no women on the Council, I believe.

41,997. Then Mr. Shepheard was wrong; he told us yesterday there were women?—Not at the Council.

41,998. He was not present, but you were?—I was in the chair.

41,999. How many were ministers, roughly?—Roughly, half and half.

42,000. In point of attendance, Mr. Shepheard said that the ministers were more numerous?—Yes, there would be a majority.

42,001. Mr. Shepheard said—he is evidently wrong—that there was a division of opinion, not only in regard to No. 1, but in regard to No. 4. That is a mistake, is it?—I do not think there was any division about it.

42,002. He was not present?—I was there.

42,003. You said you had not known a divorce case. Was that in connection with members of your own congregation?—That is so; I have never known one in my own congregation. I have had two congregations.

42,004. Where was the other one?—Lincoln.

42,005. Have you known it in connection with other Congregational churches?—My only recollection is of two divorce cases amongst Congregationalists, as far as I can recollect—there may be others—and one of annulment of marriage.

42,006. Only one, really?—Two, and one of annulment. That is all I remember.

42,007. (Sir William Anson.) Have you come across cases among the very poor in which divorce is desired, but is unprocurable by reason of expense?—I have had very little experience amongst the very poor. My pastorates have not taken me among them; but my brother ministers have said so, that expense has been a serious obstacle to them.

42,008. You have not considered the way in which the expense could be reduced?—No.

42,009. By change of tribunal?—No. I imagine that in the minds of those who know more about it there was the idea of setting up local tribunals, and so saving the expense of coming up to London.

42,010. As regards reports, would you exclude the Press altogether, and allow them only to publish a report furnished to them?—That was the idea in resolution No. 3, because it is so difficult to put any limit on the Press if they are inside. They will exercise their own discretion probably.

42,011. (Sir George White.) From your knowledge of your Union and kindred bodies would you not agree that there is a very large amount of opinion, if it does not amount absolutely to a majority, in favour of divorce in cases of incurable insanity and desertion?—It is not a majority in our body. I admit frankly there is a considerable amount of feeling that way.

42,012. You would not say it was a majority?—I should not say so.

42,013. It would be a very large minority?—Yes, there would be.

42,014. In speaking of the entire absence of divorce, does that apply to what we understand by the "congregation," as well as your membership; adherents as well as membership?—I am talking in a broad sense. I can only remember two cases, and one of annulment. My memory only goes back 21 years.

42,015. Yours have been very large congregations—Yes, and these cases have not been in my congregation.

42,016. Simply in the denomination?—Yes.

42,017. You have not known a case in either of your congregations?—No.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much for your attendance and for your evidence.

The Hon. Henry Gorell Barnes, re-called and further examined.

42,018. (Chairman.) I believe the last witness completes all the evidence you have been able to obtain of what I may term in general language the clerical witnesses?—That is so.

42,019. But you have before you a memorandum which shows that other bodies have been communicated with, and what they have said in reply?—Yes.

42,020. I think I may take it, may I not, that every recognised, or all that we have been able to ascertain as recognised, bodies of churches have been communicated with?—I think so.

42,021. Will you just take your memorandum and tell us the result of those who have not presented themselves for examination?—The British and Foreign Unitarian Association—The Committee of that Association do not feel that there is any occasion for the Association to be specially represented before the Royal Commission. The Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland do not think they can usefully give evidence. The Primitive Methodist Church addressed a letter to me stating that they do not propose to depute any person, but they would wish to say that in their opinion there should be equality as between the sexes in this relation, and that published reports of divorce proceedings should either give only the bare results or suppress all objectionable and prurient details, and they adhered, as the result of a subsequent communication, to their decision not to send a representative. The Salvation Army, after some considerable correspondence, on December 5th of this year wrote saying that Mr. Bramwell Booth confirmed what had previously transpired, and had to state, having regard to the evidence which had already been laid before the Commission, that the Salvation Army did not think they could usefully occupy the time of the Commission further. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Wales passed a resolution, but stated that they did not desire to submit evidence. The resolution is in these terms: "This Assembly considers (1) that "whilst equal facilities should be afforded to all "classes of the community for obtaining divorce where "the bonds of marriage have been violated by either "party, great care should be exercised in any legal "changes that may be effected lest they should "diminish the sanctity and obligation of the marriage "vow. (2) That the legal and moral liability should "be the same with regard to both sexes. (3) That "newspaper reports of proceedings in matrimonial "cases should be limited by law to the publication of "the result of the actions." The Presbyterian Church of England, as the result of a communication addressed to them, wrote stating that the Committee of the Church, which a subsequent letter states to be the State of Religion and Public Morals Committee, could not depute anyone, but desired to say, firstly, "That "detailed reports of the proceedings in Divorce and "Matrimonial Causes should not be published; (2) "That breaches of fidelity to the marriage contract "should be treated by the law as being equally guilty "in both parties; (3) That if facilities for divorce "were provided by the law, such facilities should be "made equally available as between rich and poor," and the letter goes on to state that "In the course of "the discussion attention was called to the fact that "in the Appendix to the Articles of the Faith approved "by the Synod of 1892, as expressing the general "opinion and belief entertained in the Presbyterian "Church of England on the matters to which it refers, "there is the following reference to divorce: 'In the "'case of adultery, it is lawful for the innocent party "'to sue out a divorce; and after the divorce has "'been pronounced by a Public Court of Justice, to "'marry another as if the offending party were dead.' "Thus adultery is the only cause which the Church "recognises as a proper ground for divorce." I subsequently received a letter on the 20th May stating that there had been a Synod of the Presbyterian Church held at Cardiff, and sending a report and a memorandum which the Synod desired to be taken as the evidence of the Presbyterian Church of England.

42,022. You had better read that?—The memorandum is in this form:—"At Roath Park Church, "Cardiff, the fourth day of May, 1910, the Synod of "the Presbyterian Church of England met and was "duly constituted. Inter alia. The Synod took up a "Report from the Committee on the State of Religion "and Public Morals, to which was remitted the consi- "deration of the letter from the Secretary of the Royal "Commission on Divorce. The Report was submitted "by the Rev. Jas. G. Goold, Convener. In accordance "with its recommendations it was resolved as follows: "(1) The Synod acknowledges the courtesy of the "Royal Commission on Divorce in inviting from it a "statement of the position of this Church with regard "to the question of divorce. (2) The Presbyterian "Church of England recognises no ground of divorce "except adultery. (3) Believing adultery to be equally "sinful on the part of the husband and of the wife, "this Church regards adultery alone, even if unaccom- "panied by cruelty, as a sufficient ground of divorce. "(4) The Church has not considered the question of "extending the grounds of divorce. (5) The Synod "respectfully points out that, while civil law in Scotland "recognises desertion for four years as a reason "justifying divorce, it has no reasons for supposing (as "seems to be implied in the letter from the Secretary "to the Commission) that this is the view of the "Churches of Scotland, with whose attitude on this "matter this Church is in agreement. (6) The Synod "is of opinion that the mind of the Church is "adequately represented in these propositions. None "of its members, appearing before the Commission, "could possess authority to speak more fully in the "name of the Church."

42,023. Is that the resolution about which you say in your note "Resolution sent herewith"?—Yes. As to the Greek Church. I addressed a formal letter to the Great Archimandrite, but in his letters to me he stated he found it beyond his powers to either give evidence or prepare a memorandum on the subject which the Commission was considering. I think that exhausts all the bodies I could think of which were of sufficiently recognised importance.

Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK, Bart., called and examined.

42,024. (Chairman.) Your name is so well known I need only ask you this: You have enlarged on the legal history of marriage in England? May I put it in that way?—I have not made a very special study of it, but I am familiar with some of the leading authorities.

42,025. You have been good enough to send a short memorandum on a point which we had before us as a matter of fact, with regard to the time at which marriage is considered complete in the history of our law. Would it suit your convenience to read it and explain it?—That is the early part of the general history of Canon Law in Western Europe. The question was quite unsettled down to the 13th century, and there are various theories propounded by various learned persons, among others Vacarius, who lectured on Roman Law in the 12th century, who put forward a theory which Mr. Maitland discovered, and which Mr. Maitland and I thought was a much better doctrine than that which the Church adopted.

42,026. What was that?—Vacarius wanted something more than mere consent: he wanted an overt act, such as the wife going to the husband's house, something equivalent to the delivery of possession in the case of ordinary transfers of property.

42,027. If you will read your memorandum I think it explains fully what you have said?—The doctrine which ultimately did prevail was that consent was sufficient. Perhaps I had better read the memorandum from the beginning. A little of it is not relevant to the precise question you ask, but perhaps it will be less trouble to read it straight through.

42,028. I think we should see better what you mean?—It is uncertain at what point marriage was deemed complete by pre-Christian Germanic custom, that is the Germanic custom of Pagan times. Exclusive spiritual jurisdiction was established in England in the 12th century. To show the amount of doubt that prevailed down to that time, it was not settled till the first quarter of the 12th century that it was unlawful for a secular priest to be married. Secular priests were married down to that time.

42,029. You say here: "Exclusive spiritual jurisdiction established in England in the 12th century"?—Yes, that means from the 12th century onwards the secular courts would not undertake to say what was, or what was not, a valid marriage.

42,030. Then you go on: "Marriage of secular clergy thought wrong, but not void before A.D.1123"?—There was a growing opinion it was wrong, and that opinion was sanctioned by the Church in not allowing the marriage of ordained persons.

42,031. "And from the 12th to the 16th centuries only avoidable by decree of Court Christian in lifetime of parties"?—That was the case with all prohibited marriages.

42,032. The next point is important?—Yes. The Church did not prescribe any ceremony as essential to the validity of marriage; consent, provided it was consent to a Christian marriage, was sufficient. That is, of course, the consent must be consent to a monogamous marriage; the intention must be to contract a monogamous and Christian marriage, and any contrary intention will prevent the marriage being valid. I believe that is the Canon Law to this day.

42,033. Then you say, "even the presence of a witness was only a matter of evidence which could be dispensed with by admission of both parties"?—Yes.

42,034. Then paragraph 2 says, "Consent de præsenti makes a marriage"?—That is, the immediate consent of the husband and wife makes a marriage, which will prevail against subsequent solemn celebration of marriage with another party, even followed by consummation. Curiously enough the decisive authority for that is the Decretal of Pope Alexander III., addressed to the Bishop of Norwich. That is quoted in Sir James Shaw Willes' opinion delivered to the House of Lords in Beamish v. Beamish, and also in our book, Maitland's and mine, on the History of English Law. The effect of that law is that the most solemn and public celebration of a marriage may be annulled by the discovery of what was called, in the language of the canonists, pre-contract.

42,035. Quite so?—The presence of a priest was recommended, and in some countries enjoined by secular legislation. That was what, if one may say so, led the House of Lords to err in the case of The Queen v. Millis, where they got rather confused about the difference between the secular and the spiritual jurisdiction, being imperfectly informed, and laid down that the presence of a priest was essential to the validity of a marriage by the law of England.

42,036. That differed from what Mr. Justice Willes said afterwards in Beamish v. Beamish?—Yes.

42,037. Is your view that those two decisions as they stand were not in accordance with the true law?—I have read that opinion of Mr. Justice Willes several times for various purposes, and it has seemed to me to be a conclusive exposition of the history of the law.

42,038. That was not authoritative?—There is not the least doubt that the law, as laid down by the House of Lords, is not the canon law of Western Europe, and if you are satisfied as a matter of general history that the marriage law of England was the canon law of Western Europe, and nothing else, then it is quite clear that those decisions of the House of Lords were wrong, but I do not know that it makes any practical difference in this country.

42,039. You probably agree that Mr. Justice Willes' judgment was right?—It is within your recollection that the House of Lords thought so in Beamish v. Beamish and decided the other way, only because, most unfortunately, as I think, Lord Campbell told them that they had no power to reconsider their own previous judgment.

42,040. You say "But the Church did not regard it"—that is, the presence of a priest as a necessary condition?—Not before the Council of Trent. It was a notorious matter of history.

42,041. May I take it that this is right: "But the Church did not regard it as a necessary condition before the Council of Trent"?—Yes.

42,042. And it is not credible?—That any temporal sovereign would have pronounced any marriage void which the Church held valid; the secular law might impose penalties, as the Church imposed penance, on irregular marriages. That is the explanation of some of the authorities which I think are misunderstood.

42,043. Will you proceed with your statement?—The common law, however, would for purposes affecting civil rights of property require marriage to be notorious. That was what the King's Courts regularly did when there was a question of dower being due.

42,044. Dower ad ostium ecclesiæ?—That means that they required a public ceremony in or in the presence of the Church. Secondly, the Common Law would recognise solemn marriage, that is, a marriage publicly celebrated, as a good de facto marriage without referring it to the spiritual court. That is, when there was a publicly celebrated and notorious marriage, the courts assumed that to be a good marriage, without thinking it necessary to ask for the Bishop's certificate as to whether it was correct.

42,045. Then you go on, "even the Canon Law admitted possessory marriage to a certain extent"?—That is rather a technical point, but there is authority, which is given in our book, that even in the canon law a de facto marriage was admitted for some purposes; that is, that solemnity and publicity did raise a presumption that everything was in order. Even the fact of people living together as husband and wife was evidence of real marriage, although not conclusive. Then the requirements of the Council of Trent were new legislation. Of course it has to be remembered that the decrees of the Council of Trent were not promulgated everywhere, and they were operative only in those countries where they were promulgated. They were not promulgated in England.

42,046. They were followed by similar civil legislation in France, where the Tridentine decrees were not received?—In France the decrees were not ever promulgated, or the civil authorities refused to receive them; I cannot say offhand which. At any rate they were not considered to be in force and the same results were obtained by secular legislation.

42,047. Then, your last point is with regard to divorce?—As to the history of divorce the earlier Penitentials, that is, the compilations of Canon Law for the use of the clergy which we have from Anglo-Saxon times, recognise the possibility of divorce in the strict sense—that is, of a valid marriage being dissolved by the authority of the Church.

42,048. Divorce a vinculo?—Yes.

42,049. That you say was obsolete in the 13th century at the latest, subject to one possible exception?—Yes, in the 13th century that doctrine was obsolete and practically the modern Canon Law of marriage was established.

42,050. You say, subject to one possible exception, in the case of marriage with an infidel?—That, I believe, is a question that the Roman clergy sometimes have to deal with in the South Sea Islands and such-like places; what is the effect of a marriage between a Christian and a heathen, or what becomes of a marriage between heathens when the parties are converted, or what is more awkward, when one is converted and one is not.

42,051. I think that is the end of your statement?—Yes.

42,052. (Sir William Anson.) What is the positive law of the Church during the pre-Reformation period about divorce? Was there any canon or any definite prohibition of divorce?—Not being a Canonist I cannot say.

42,053. There is no doubt it was recognised in the Penitentials?—I believe that is so. I have not verified the actual context, but the authorities are given in Pollock and Maitland.

42,054. After the Reformation, was the law of divorce altered in any way, either by secular or spiritual authority?—After the Reformation a great many different things happened in many countries. I think it is quite certain that, for a long time after the Reformation, the English Bishops did not consider themselves bound by the Canon Law.

42,055. As regards the possibility of divorce a vinculo, the canon which enables separation to be granted binds the parties not to re-marry. That suggests that re-marriage was possible?—I believe the history of the 16th and 17th centuries in England shows that there were a great many divergent opinions as to what was possible, and I am not quite sure—I am speaking in the presence of people who know more about the Canon Law than I do—but my impression is that during the period of the Reformation and as late as the Restoration some English Bishops thought it possible that there should be divorce a vinculo.

42,056. Divorce a vinculo granted by the Spiritual Court?—I am not quite sure whether such divorce was ever granted by a Spiritual Court, but one or two such divorces were granted by Act of Parliament, and the Bishops did not think it wrong, and I think some Bishops in the House of Lords supported it.

42,057. The law was regarded as unsettled for some little time after the Reformation?—I think it may be taken that all ecclesiastical law was unsettled in the countries which renounced the Roman obedience for some time after the Reformation.

42,058. Then we settled down to divorce by Parliament?—Yes. I think that is a comparatively modern practice, and dates from the 18th century.

42,059. I think the Bishops at one time definitely approved, when I say "approved" I mean they recognised it as not contrary to divine law?—I do not think there is any trace of the Bishops disapproving till the second quarter of the 19th century, but I am speaking without book.

42,060. (Lord Guthrie.) I remember that Dr. Lushington puts it because there was no Statute after the Reformation expressly authorising divorce for any cause in England, therefore divorce for adultery could not be part of the law of England. Other people have held other views. Do you think that necessarily follows?—There you have to distinguish. Before 1857 in one sense divorce a vinculo was not part of the law of England, because there was no ordinary jurisdiction in any court to grant it; but in another sense it was, because, as a matter of fact, people did apply to the House of Lords for private Acts dissolving marriages, and the House of Lords dealt with those applications in a judicial manner, and it was a judicial proceeding in substance, although a legislative Act in form. I suppose there are people living who remember the practice of the House of Lords in divorce cases, and that practice still exists as far as Ireland is concerned, and it also exists in the Dominion of Canada. I understand that the proceedings with a Divorce Bill are for all substantial purposes judicial proceedings, that the House has a regular practice from which it does not depart. It is not free to vote on a general consideration of the merits on the grounds of natural justice. For all material purposes the proceeding is judicial, although unusually expensive and solemn. It is impossible to say categorically yes or no to the question Was divorce a vinculo part of the law of England before 1857? If Dr. Lushington meant there was no jurisdiction in any ordinary Court, either secular or spiritual, with regard to divorce a vinculo, I should humbly conceive he was right.

42,061. You would say in one sense it was part of the law of England, and in another sense it was not?—Yes.

42,062. Does that view of yours depend on this, that these private Acts of Parliament were not opposed on the right to get divorce, but only on the merits of the particular case?—That is so.

42,063. If they had been opposed on the question of right to give divorce at all, the mere fact that Parliament overrode that objection would not have settled the matter, because Parliament could do anything?—That is so. When I say that proceedings were judicial and regular, I mean so far as I know. Nobody ever heard of a peer in Parliament rising on a motion to bring in a divorce Bill to protest that the whole thing was against the law of the land or against the divine law, and that Parliament had no moral right to pass any such Act. As far as I understand, for about three-quarters of a century, more or less, it was a recognised practice, and I apprehend it is still so in the case of Irish Divorce Acts.

42,064. In the expression "No peer arose to oppose it" you include the Bishops?—Yes.

42,065. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You spoke about the Penitentials. Am I right in saying that there is a fundamental distinction between Canons of Councils and Penitentials in this sense: that while the Canons were general Church laws, the Penitentials were a body of regulations for the domestic dealing with souls by priests, really in confession?—You know a great deal more about it than I do, but that is certainly my impression, that the Penitential is a sort of domestic manual issued by a Bishop or Archbishop. He might be a great Archbishop, like Theodore of Tarsus. It is the manual for the clergy.

42,066. But not for the management of cases in Court, but the management of individuals by their directors, their priests?—The only value of a Penitential for legal purposes was that it was evidence of what that particular Bishop or Archbishop understood o be the law.

42,067. Not necessarily. There was a distinction, nd a marked one, on this subject of divorce in the Penitentials and the Canons, that while Canons of Councils were saying that divorce was impossible, and so on, at the same time Penitentials were being put out by the individual Bishops which at any rate enabled the priest in dealing with an individual penitent to tolerate a divorce. I think you will probably agree with me that there was that marked distinction running through the Canons and the Penitentials?—Yes. Of course a Canon is law as regards all persons on whom it is binding, and a Penitential is only an administrative direction.

42,068. Does it not look like this, that while the law of the Church was against divorce, Church people were forced by circumstances to make something like concessions in the matter in their dealing with individuals? That is the way I read it. I put it to you whether that is not the effect of your reading it?—That is very likely to be so, I should think. I should also think that great personages, both secular and ecclesiastical, in the early Middle Ages assumed much greater powers of dispensation than they would now think of doing.

42,069. You have been speaking of Archbishop Theodore of Tarsus, and I do not want to go into that particularly. He was of Greek training, his associations were with the East?—Yes.

42,070. The East had, and has still, a very much laxer view in regard to divorce than the Church in the West?—Yes, but at that time there was no separation.

42,071. Before the separation, the East was adopting a very much laxer view with regard to divorce than the West?—I know really nothing about the history of the Eastern Church.

42,072. That is ancient times, but let us come to the pre-Reformation Canon Law. There is no doubt that, both in the Church in the West and in England in particular, there was express prohibition of marriage after divorce for adultery. I will remind you of Gratian?—I do not profess to know Gratian, but taking it from the 12th century onwards I should conceive that there was no doubt at all.

42,073. There is a book I know you know, because you have quoted it in your "History of English Law." It is the "Pupilla Oculi," by De Burgh. I quote it because it is English Canon Law, and it says in terms, although a man may be divorced from his wife for adultery, he must not marry again. That corresponds with your view?—I should have thought that was elementary at any time after the settlement of the Western Canon Law.

42,074. Then we come to the Reformation. There was no change in the law at the Reformation with regard to divorce, either by canon or by statute?—I could not answer that question without having read through the statutes of Henry VIII., repealed and unrepealed, and all the canons after the Reformation, but my general impression is that it was so.

42,075. You have drawn attention to what I think is a very important point, that there was a great difference of opinion among writers of the Reformation—I mean ecclesiastical writers, Bishops and the great Churchmen—on this subject; that there was a very considerable body of opinion who thought that there ought to be divorce for adultery with power to re-marry. I gather from your evidence that in your view that existed?—Yes, but for the authorities I should like to refer to a very learned anonymous article published in the Quarterly Review several years ago, to which Sir William Anson has the reference. I cannot give it off-hand. [The Divorce Agitation, L.Q.R., xx., 363.]

42,076. I have, for what it is worth, collected a catena of those authorities, and had the advantage of reading the article you mention, and that does seem to me to be the result. While that was the opinion, none of those people supposed that divorce with power to re-marry could be granted by the Ecclesiastical Court, as far as I know?—I cannot assert off-hand what they supposed. I believe a great many people suppose many different things.

42,077. You do not recollect any of these authorities who treated it as a matter that could be then granted in the Ecclesiastical Courts, do you?—I cannot say whether or not any Bishop's Chancellor would have been adventurous enough to grant a decree. I think he would have been an adventurous man.

42,078. Enquiries have been made in all the Registries, and no evidence of that has been found. You do not know of any case in the Ecclesiastical Courts where a divorce a vinculo for adultery was granted at or subsequent to the Reformation?—No, but I ought to say my ignorance is of no value, because I have never searched.

42,079. So far as it goes, that is my impression. I am not trying to use it as an authority. I do not understand you to suggest that there were such cases?—No; I should think it is very improbable.

42,080. With regard to marriage with an infidel, quoting your proof, that is the case that Canonists refer to as the Pauline privilege, which has been dealt with in a distinct way right through Church history?—It has, and is still. Some time ago I saw a very curious and learned opinion which had been pronounced by the authorities at Rome on a case sent up by a Vicar-General somewhere among the Pacific Islands, which went into the whole question in a businesslike manner.

42,081. It is a matter that constantly must arise in all missionary enterprise. With regard to what you said about a possessory marriage; all that comes to is this, that where there is a reputation of marriage, that is enough until it is disputed in some way—until there is some case raised against it?—I think that is what it amounts to in terms of common sense; but I have no doubt, knowing what one does about mediæval lawyers and the theory of possession, that you may find some very curious and subtle observations among the Canonist literature on that point.

42,082. That is an observation that would apply to most Canonists on most subjects?—Probably.

42,083. It has been a universal rule, since we have known anything about the Canon Law, that marriage de facto, no matter how irregular or how impossible, stands until it has been annulled by sentence?—Yes.

42,084. Even a bigamous marriage?—I suppose that is so.

42,085. Even a grossly incestuous union, until there has been a judgment to annul it, has to be treated as if it were a real marriage. Is not that so?—I suppose that was so in spiritual jurisdiction.

42,086. Is that not what modern writers mean when they talk of a marriage being voidable only, and void?—I suppose it is, generally.

42,087. That means, not that it ever was good, but that, until it has been annulled by sentence, you cannot take advantage of its being void?—I suppose that is so, but the word "voidable" has been used in a confused way by writers on many branches of law; sometimes they may mean merely irregular, sometimes they may mean invalid, but to be treated as valid till it is judicially annulled.

42,088. That is why I asked you, because it does lead to such confusion. In this context there is no doubt it means that when the sentence of annulment is pronounced the marriage is void ab initio, not from the date of the sentence: for instance, any children born beforehand are illegitimate?—I thought there was a certain amount of consideration shown for the children in some countries. I am not speaking with precise knowledge.

42,089. Take the case of an incestuous marriage. Supposing a man had entered into an incestuous relation with his niece: that is no marriage?—Excuse me, you assume there is no dispensation.

42,090. I assume that, and if we are to go into dispensations I think you would fail to show a dispensation for that particular case from the Pope; but do not let us go into the dispensation theory?—No, we will not.

42,091. Take a case which is undoubtedly incestuous. According to English ecclesiastical law up to recent times, if there was that relation and children were born, then, if either of the parents died before a decree occurred, those children were legitimate, were they not?—I believe so.

42,092. But if there was a suit for annulment and a sentence of annulment during the lifetime, as it must have been, of the parties, then the so-called marriage became void ab initio, not from the date of the sentence, so that the children born were illegitimate?—I believe that was so.

42,093. I am putting it to you in order to get on the Note what I do not think is open to doubt, really, as a matter of law. Without dealing with the question of bigamy my point is the effect of voidability. It is only an illustration?—I ought to explain, this is not the kind of law I profess to be familiar with.

42,094. I quite understand, and I am not trying to pin you down to positive views, but I am fearful lest your authority should be quoted for propositions I am sure you would not wish to propound?—As a matter of fact in what I wrote down I was not thinking of that question.

42,095. With regard to the private Divorce Acts, although they take the place of the judicial sentences, they were legislation?—Yes.

42,096. It is not accurate, therefore, to talk of them as if they were the sentences of the Court in the sense that a decision of the House of Lords is. In its judicial capacity the House of Lords is a law court now?—It would not be literally inaccurate, but it certainly would be misleading, to tell a foreigner that it was an act of legislation in every case and not to tell him at the same time that it was legislation according to judicial practice. You might tell a foreigner it was impossible to make a railway in this country without a special act of legislation, but if you told him that and did not tell him that the procedure on private Bills is a very elaborate and settled, or quasi-settled procedure, he would go away thinking we were still in the barbarous condition of not having made up our minds whether it was a good thing to have railways or not.

42,097. If you had to explain things to a foreigner, no doubt you must enter into a great deal of detail, but when you have got down to a matter of the Constitution, the one is a legislative act and the other is a judicial act?—It is a privilegium given by Parliament according to a regular practice.

42,098. Is it not right that they were much opposed?—I cannot remember.

42,099. Was it not the Rosslyn case, or the Duke of Norfolk's case, Burnet talks about in his history, which was very much opposed by the Bishops and practically, the Bishops were divided upon it? The Bishops who had been appointed after the Revolution supported it, and the Bishops appointed before the Revolution were all against it?—That is exactly what one would expect.

42,100. That shows it was sometimes, at any rate, a matter of debate?—Yes.

42,101. Whether those Bills should be passed?—When I said I had not heard of a Bill being opposed in principle I was referring to the settled practice from some time in the 18th century.

42,102. (Sir William Anson.) To clear up one matter, when you spoke of the evidence of uncertainty of law after the Reformation, with reference to what Sir Lewis Dibdin was asking you, that did not refer to conflicting decisions. There are no conflicting decisions on the subject in any court?—To the best of my very general knowledge on the subject I should say there were no decisions at all. Near the end of Elizabeth's reign, in 1602, it was decided in Rye v. Fullcombe, Log. 100, that divorce a mensa et toro in the ecclesiastical court did not dissolve the marriage.

42,103. The 107th Canon, for instance, is evidence that there was uncertainty in the minds of practical people as to what was the effect of a breach with Rome on re-marriage law?—I think so, but I do not remember that Canon in particular.

42,104. (Chairman.) With regard to Canon Law, am I right in thinking that was not applicable to the laity, but to the clergy and the ecclesiastical officers?—Of course, there are a great many rules of Canon Law which could only apply to the clergy and the ecclesiastical officers, because they regulated what those officers had to do, but there is no doubt that Spiritual Courts did exercise a great deal of jurisdiction over laymen down to the end of the 15th century, and in a great many matters which we should now consider quite secular. A man might be had up before the Bishop's or Archdeacon's Court and be put to penance and threatened with excommunication because he had broken faith about a load of hay.*

42,105. It was not proprio vigore applicable to the laity, but only to the extent to which the common law applies it. I have seen that?—With great submission we know that the Ecclesiastical Courts were doing to a great extent what is now county court business in perfectly secular matters.

42,106. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) And police court matters?—Yes, except the offences they deal with had something to do with the Church, such as being in an alehouse, instead of being in church, on Sunday. Also, there is no doubt that the Common Law courts did not like the exercise of this jurisdiction; in fact it was an instance of the regular mediæval competition for business between all authorities who thought they had or could take any jurisdiction. To put it in vulgar language, there was a scramble for fees going on all over England, and all over Europe, in all kinds of jurisdiction.

42,107. (Chairman.) My point was this. I have seen it repeatedly stated in the books that the Canon Law as laid down by the Canonites is not applicable except to the clergy and the law officers of the Ecclesiastical Courts; but, to some extent, the Common Law adopted it and recognised it. I think that is the statement?—I should think it is highly probable.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) The Canon Law was binding on everybody—lay and clergy. The old Canon Law to the extent to which it had been adopted as part of our Common Law, but in no other way. That was clergy and laity. The Canons of 1604 are only applicable to the clergy.

42,108. (Chairman.) That is what I mean. 1604 or 1603 was the one with 107 in it?—I am not so sure that Sir Lewis Dibdin has not technically the power to excommunicate you and me for certain offences. I know that Sir James Stephen thought so.

42,109. There is no Act of Parliament sanctioning the Canons of 1603 or 1604. That is, so as far as I know?—I think so.

42,110. You were asked about the difference between the law as recognised by the earlier Church and its application by virtue of Penitentials. I think you were asked a few questions about that. Would it be right to suggest—I do not want to put this as more than righting your answer—that while on the one hand the strict law was aimed at, the Penitentials recognised human necessity in departing from that strict law?—I should think that a great man like Theodore of Tarsus would claim to exercise powers of equitable dispensation exceeding what any modern Bishop or Archbishop under the present religion of the Roman Church would be allowed to claim.

42,111. I take it that would be exercised because, if you like to put it, of the weakness of human nature?—Yes, I should think so.

42,112. There is one question I should like to ask you, because of a letter you have written suggesting that there is an excellent article on the divorce law of Germany in the April number of "Comparative Legislation." Have you any definite knowledge of that?—That was merely sent for information and reference.

42,113. We are going to have someone who will deal with the German laws, but that would be an instructive article to peruse?—Yes.

(Chairman.) We must thank you very much for your evidence.

Sir EDWARD CLARKE, K.C., called and examined.

42,114. (Chairman.) I need hardly ask you who you are, but, just to get it on the Notes, you are one of his Majesty's Counsel?—Yes.

42,115. You have also had a long experience in the Courts of Law?—That is so, and a considerable experience in the Divorce Court.

42,116. You have had a number of cases in the Divorce Court?—A large number.

42,117. You have divided your memorandum into two heads, one law and the other practice?—Yes.

42,118. As I gather from it, it is a memorandum which requires a certain amount of exposition and perhaps the better course is to ask you to state your views?—If your Lordship pleases. The first point mentioned in my memorandum in regard to the question of law is as to the law of marriage which ought to prevail, and I have written a short memorandum on that, which I think I had better read, because it states my opinion more carefully than I should perhaps extemporaneously express it. It is proposed on one side to abolish divorce altogether, and on the other to extend divorce to other grounds than that of adultery. The cardinal, and in my judgment the conclusive, objection to these proposals is that each of them is contrary to the Christian law of divorce which was clearly laid down by Jesus Christ himself in the Sermon on the Mount. In that discourse our Lord declared the continued authority of the Law, but gave to its precepts an enlarged and higher meaning. He says he is come to fulfil the Law and declares that not a jot or tittle of the Law shall pass away. Six times in that chapter (Matthew, chapter v.) he quotes from Deuteronomy, in each case to correct and to extend. Two of the ten Commandments are quoted and expounded. "Thou shalt not kill" is "Thou shalt "not bear ill-will." "Thou shalt not commit adultery" is "Thou shalt not permit thyself impure "thoughts." Then comes the passage:—"It was said "also, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give "her a writing of divorcement: but I say unto you, that "every one that putteth away his wife, saving for the "cause of fornication, maketh her an adulteress: and "whosoever shall marry her when she is put away "committeth adultery." The law of God, which was from the beginning, and the rule of Moses, that a writing of divorcement must be given, are to remain but it is only for adultery that the divorcement shall take place. The same rule in the same terms is stated in St. Matthew, ch. xix., where the question put to our Lord is whether it is lawful to put away a wife for any cause. It was a question in dispute among the Jews; for one set of teachers among them maintained that the words of the Mosaic Law only authorised divorce in the case of adultery, while general usage, with the sanction of another school of teaching, had extended the practice to divorce for other causes. Our Lord's answer is, "No, not for any cause, but only "for the cause of adultery." Two other passages give the general prohibition, but not the authorised exception. In Mark, ch. x., vv. 11 and 12, we have an imperfect account of the conversation recorded by St. Matthew. The question is not fully stated, for the words "for any cause" are left out, and in the answer the qualifying words are omitted. The passage in St. Luke, ch. xvi., v. 18, is precisely the same as that in St. Mark. Many explanations of the difference have been suggested; but whatever be the true explanation, it is quite clear that an authorised exception is as much part of the Law as the prohibition itself, and unless the authority of the First Gospel is wholly rejected, the Christian law of divorce is quite clear. It appears to me also clear, and indeed I do not think it has ever been doubted, that the adultery of the husband is within the rule as well as the adultery of the wife. The words in St. Luke are apparently an interpolation. Their relation to the preceding verses is not very clear. If they are intended as a statement of the Jewish law (and they follow immediately on a declaration that it is easier for heaven and earth to pass away than for one tittle of the Law to fail) it is clear that Jesus could not have intended it to apply to cases where the wife was put away for adultery, for the Law, as laid down in Deuteronomy, ch. xxii., v. 1, quite clearly allowed divorce on that ground. There are two exceptions in Deuteronomy, xxii., vv. 13 to 19, and 28 to 29, unless he had seduced his wife before marriage or had made a false charge against her. This had never been doubted by any school of Jewish thought, and the only question was whether a wife might be put away on other grounds, and this passage, vindicating the authority and permanence of the Law, was doing away with the extension which Moses had permitted. This permission of Moses was not part of the Law. It was an indulgence which now, since the Gospel of the Kingdom of God had come, was no longer to exist. This Christian law of divorce, of which I have spoken, was accepted by St. Augustine and St. Jerome, and St. Ambrose, and by almost all the Reformation divines, and it is accepted by the whole of the Eastern Church, and in 1857, when the Divorce Court was established. it was acknowledged by all the Bishops of the English Church, with one exception (the Bishop of Salisbury). I will finish the memorandum and go back to that. Our Lord's words seem to me, by necessary implication, to convey that in the case of the dissolution of a marriage on the ground of adultery, either of the persons so divorced is free to marry again, for it is only where a marriage has been dissolved on some ground other than that of adultery that He brands as adulterous a subsequent marriage; but I can see no reason why a State should not prohibit, if thought desirable, remarriages, as to which, dealing with the religious aspect of marriage, we can only say that our Lord did not forbid them. In one respect then, our law of divorce differs from the Divine Law and from the practice of almost the whole of the civilised world, and that is in not granting divorce on account of the adultery of the husband without any other matrimonial offence. In France, Germany, Russia, Sweden, and the United States, and in Scotland, the husband's adultery is sufficient to entitle the wife to a divorce, and I am in favour of that law being adopted here. I should like to illustrate that memorandum by reference to a speech made by the Archbishop of Canterbury on the 19th May, 1857, in the discussion upon the Divorce Act. "He appealed to the Divine "Law. No one, he thought, would deny that accord- "ing to the tenor of that Law marriage once con- "tracted was deemed to be indissoluble—indissoluble "saving for one cause, a cause which destroyed the "purpose and intent of marriage—saving for the "cause of unfaithfulness. For that cause it was "declared lawful for a man to put away his wife, and, "by parity of reasoning, it would be lawful for the "woman to put away her husband." In the same debate the Bishop of Bangor said: "I believe that my "right reverend brethren are all agreed, with the "exception of the Bishop of Salisbury, that divorce is "permitted in Scripture in the case of the adultery of "the wife." Then one adds to that, that for 150 years the House of Lords granted divorces by Legislative Act, but it appears to me that the way in which those Bills were dealt with made them quite as much Judicial Acts as Legislative Acts, and I find it stated that in only two or three cases did the Bishops oppose a Divorce Bill, and I think that there was some special reason applying to the case. It was never contended, during those 150 years, by the Bishops that it would be contrary to the Divine Law to grant a decree of divorce. There were four cases in the 150 years where a divorce was granted by the House of Lords to the wife; in 1801 there was the case of Mrs. Addison, where a divorce was granted on the ground of the husband's incest. There is a notable observation of Lord Thurlow's with regard to that which is recorded in Campbell's "Lives of the Chancellors," 7th volume, page 145. "You give the "husband divorce because he ought not to forgive the "guilty wife, and separation is inevitable. Where the "wife cannot forgive and separation is inevitable by "reason of the crime of the husband, the wife is "entitled to the like remedy."

42,119. Does that bring us back to the memorandum?—It brings me back now to the memorandum.

42,120. You say that the rule should be the same for both sexes, and then "reasons for and against"?—Yes. It is a difficult question and I have put down some reasons for and against. Reasons against allowing divorce for husband's adultery. In wife's case bastard may be introduced into the family. Men and women appear to agree that a wife ought to forgive and that a husband ought not. There is a famous passage in Tennyson's "Idylls of the King" which says:

"I hold that a man the worst of public foes
Who either for his own or children's sake
To save his blood from scandal, lets the wife
Whom he knows false, abide and rule the house."

The offence is more serious in the woman. In man, the unfaithfulness is physical—the desire for the woman; in a wife it is physical and moral too, the desire for the man's affection. In man, in nine cases out of ten, it is a passing, often a quite sudden, physical appetite. In woman, in nine cases out of ten, it is an affection wholly destructive of any conjugal affection. In the great majority of cases a wife is wise as well as merciful in forgiving. Many husbands have been forgiven once and have never again been unfaithful. Again, there is little or no social stigma upon an unfaithful husband. If his wife does not forgive him other women do, and many husbands would be willing to be divorced if only adultery had to be proved, especially if they were free to marry the adulteress. This might considerably increase the number of divorces. I mention those to show that I have tried to consider both sides in this matter, but the conclusion I come to is that the husband and wife should be placed on equal terms, subject to this: I think no divorce petition in either case, certainly not in the case of the wife's petition on the ground of her husband's adultery, should be permitted until six months after the commission of the offence. It has been, I know, suggested to this Commission that there are certain classes of adultery where the adultery of the husband is so persistent or so irritating in its circumstances that the wife ought to have a remedy, which should not be given in the case of a single act of adultery. I think it is practically impossible to lay down any rule with regard to that, but I think not allowing a petition to be filed within six months of the offence would have the same effect; that petitions would very seldom be filed by wives who were entitled to complain of the unfaithfulness of the husband, and who had only to complain of a single act of unfaithfulness.

42,121. You mean that there would be time for reflection?—Yes, in that six months, if it were a single act and not accompanied by circumstances which aggravated it, and made it two seriously painful to the wife's feelings for the wife to forgive.

42,122. Do you confine your six months to any form of adultery or to the single act of intercourse?—To any form of adultery.

42,123. There is this practical difficulty. Assume the act is one which the wife at the moment intends to use against the husband, how do you propose that should be dealt with, because it is not till she presents her petition that she can get alimony, and during those six months she may starve?—I do not think that would be a serious difficulty. It would be one case in a thousand where it would present any hardship.

42,124. Might I suggest that in the poorer class of cases the first thing is the application for alimony, instantly, because what has the wife to live upon?—In the poorest class of cases she does not get alimony paid.

42,125. That class of case does not come before the court. The cases that come are where the husband has something, and I have seen numerous orders of 15*s.*, 1*l.*, or 2*l.* a week, and that sort of thing, which must be dealt with at once. Will you assume that the act is one for which the wife says, "I mean to proceed "on that." Of course she would not live with him during the process, otherwise she would vitiate her right. There is that practical difficulty, is there not?—Yes, but I do not think it is a serious one I confess. Another stipulation would be this. I think a decree ought not to be made absolute for a year. I think there would be great advantage in not having a decree of divorce made absolute for a year, instead of for six months. Then there is the very serious question of whether the guilty parties should be forbidden to marry each other.

42,126. I think you are going on a little too fast. The sentence that begins, "The doctrine that condones," is the next point?—I think that comes later on. There is another word I want to say about this:

the question about the guilty parties being allowed to marry each other.

42,127. That we would very much like to know your views about?—With regard to that there is a curious fact about the Divorce Acts that passed before 1857, that there always was a clause put in to prevent that.

42,128. So there is still in the Irish cases?—Yes and always struck out in the Commons as a matter of course.

42,129. It is struck out now in Committee in the House of Lords?—Yes. In the Bill of 1857, a clause was not introduced forbidding the marriage of the guilty parties, and the Lord Chancellor said that it would be a cruel punishment upon the woman, and in nine cases out of 10 a great boon to the adulterer. The Lords always inserted such a clause in the Divorce Bills and it was always struck out by the Commons, and the Lord Chancellor said, "That is the great "reason why I did not attempt to introduce this "proviso." The proviso was in the Bill of 1856. The proviso was put in by the Bishops in 1857, along with a provision which made the commission of adultery an offence and provided a punishment for it. Both those clauses were struck out by the House of Commons. I think on the whole that the divorce should be allowed to the wife on the ground of the husband's adultery alone. There is another reason to be mentioned, that the present requirement as to cruelty or as to desertion, especially now when desertion consists in non-obedience to a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, makes the proof in many cases of cruelty and adultery very much a matter of form. I was in one very remarkable case where a wife, who had no title to a divorce at all, because of her own conduct, obtained a divorce and the only cruelty alleged against the husband was that, when she was talking to him upon the subject, he pushed her away from the chair and she fell on the floor. When cruelty so slight as that is allowed it practically does not become anything very serious.

42,130. The real position is that if there is adultery proved the tendency of juries, and possibly of judges, is to act on the very slenderest evidence of cruelty?—On very slender evidence.

42,131. That is in effect striving for what you maintain—an equality?—I think that is so.

42,132. You were indicating what you were going to say about the marriage of guilty parties. What conclusion have you come to about that?—As to that, my conclusion, on the whole, would be that it would prevent adultery, and a good deal of adultery, if the guilty parties were forbidden to marry.

42,133. Have you come across cases in which the inception of the adultery showed that people had in contemplation a rehabilitation by marriage afterwards?—Yes, I think, no doubt, in a great many cases I have had, that the subsequent marriage has been looked forward to all along.

42,134. You would regard it, then, as a great deterrent to a woman giving way if she felt there was no chance of marriage afterwards?—I think it would be a great deterrent and a valuable deterrent.

42,135. The next point you mention is that condoned offences are revived by a subsequent offence, which you think should be abandoned?—I think that is a very mischievous doctrine. At present a matrimonial offence having been once committed the wife is in the position of being able to avail herself of that matrimonial offence, although a very considerable time has passed, because of the occurrence of some minor matrimonial offence afterwards. Condonation, I think, ought to be full condonation, and completely wipe out the former offence. I think that a very mischievous state of things is set up by the existence of the present doctrine. The next point is that a divorce, or decree of nullity, pronounced by a competent court, should be followed everywhere. I hope I shall be forgiven if I say that I look upon the judgment in Ogden v. Ogden, which I have mentioned here, as one of the most unfortunate judgments that we find in our books of reports. I think it was contrary to law, but it certainly was very sad in its results, and such a case, I think, ought to be rendered impossible by some legislation.

42,136. That case followed the older cases?—With all respect I do not think so.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I should like to know what that case was.

42,137. (Chairman.) I know about it, because I gave judgment in it myself, and I understand that Sir Edward Clarke differs from me. It was a case in which a young English girl married a Frenchman in some place in Lancashire, where he had been sent by his parents to learn a business. When he married her he was under age, or rather under the consent age of France. His father heard of it, and came over and took him out of the country, back into France, and there a decree of nullity was obtained on the ground that the marriage was without the parent's consent. Then the lady tried to get a divorce from him at a later period when he married somebody else, and, if I recollect rightly, Sir Francis Jeune held that, as he was a domiciled Frenchman, she would be obliged to pursue the remedy in France, that he could not give her a remedy in this country because he only had jurisdiction with regard to domiciled husbands and wives in England. Thereupon, I think I am right in my recollection, she considered she was entitled to marry again, and she did marry somebody else. Then a question arose between that somebody else and herself as to whether their marriage was good, and it depended upon whether her marriage with the first man still subsisted in England. I held, bound by Simonin v. Mallac, that the English marriage at the time was good according to the law of the land where it was made and celebrated, and that the French Courts might say what they pleased about it, but that in England it was a good marriage. I pointed this out, and this is a very important point, Sir Edward will allow me to remind him of it, that I thought, if she sued for a divorce on the ground of his desertion and adultery, adultery in a technical sense, because he had married again, the impossibility of proceeding for that in France, because the courts in France would not recognise the marriage, ought to make our courts abandon in that case the plea of domicile, and in order to do justice, declare the marriage at an end. I think that could have been done, but unfortunately she tried that petition before another judge?—Sir Francis Jeune dismissed her petition.

42,138. I do not think he ought to have dismissed the petition?—He dismissed it on the ground that he had no jurisdiction, she being a domiciled Frenchwoman.

42,139. My view was that the court had jurisdiction, because it only refuses to exercise jurisdiction when the domicile is foreign, but that is because the person who wishes to seek relief should go to the courts of the domicile in order to get it. If the courts of the domicile will not recognise it as a marriage, you get to the position in which it is absolutely necessary, to do justice, to say, "I, in my country, recognise you as "married, but I recognise that the grounds for divorce "have been given." For instance, where desertion has taken place, and the man goes away to a foreign country with the intention of creating a foreign domicile, we allow a suit to proceed here, and will not let him be heard to say that his domicile is in England?—Meanwhile this poor woman had a child by the French husband, and then she was refused the divorce from him because this court had no jurisdiction, and Sir Francis Jeune said he had a divorce in France.

42,140. No, a decree of nullity?—Then she married an Englishman and had a child by him, and then the Englishman repudiated her and got rid of her on the ground that her previous marriage had not been annulled.

42,141. I may be right or wrong, but the Court of Appeal supported it. They took the view the English marriage was a perfectly good marriage?—Your Lordship was the Court of Appeal.

42,142. No, it went to the Court of Appeal?—Yes, but your Lordship drew the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

42,143. It may have come to me. I was not alone, it was the Court of Appeal?—Your Lordship prepared the only judgment that the Court of Appeal delivered.

42,144. That is true, but the way out of the case was quite simple, the first petition should have been granted. The domicile is only for the purpose of going to the proper tribunal, and if that tribunal says you are not married, you must go somewhere else.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) It is startling for the court to have held that the marriage in Liverpool was not a good one.

42,145. (Chairman.) I could not decide that?—I did not contend that. I contended that the decree of nullity, granted by a court which admittedly was a competent court to deal with the husband's position, was operative here and should have been recognised here.

42,146. The difficulty was, it could not say according to our views, and that has been discussed in many cases, that a marriage in England which was legal and properly contracted was a bad marriage. That is the difficulty. You may take it that the point of the case of Ogden v. Ogden has been mentioned to us very fully, and the answer is, Deal with it in some way by which the court's decision abroad should be recognised in this country?—Your Lordship does not mind my having mentioned it.

42,147. No, I know that case has been very much discussed and very much criticised?—Then my memorandum goes on to the matters of practice.

42,148. Before you go to that, may I ask you one or two general questions. You have expressed your view about the re-marriage of guilty persons. That eliminates one note I had made. The other point is this, you have presented a view of the law based upon Christian doctrine?—Yes.

42,149. Have you considered in that that a large section is not governed at all by the Christian doctrine?—No, I think this is a Christian State and that we are bound by the Christian law.

42,150. You would not take into consideration the interests of those who did not profess Christianity?—No.

42,151. The second point is this. You probably are aware that there is a vast difference of opinion as to what is the Christian law. There are three views presented by very competent persons—one that marriage is indissoluble, secondly, that it is indissoluble except where there is adultery, thirdly, that it is dissoluble where the causes are so grave as to bring de facto to an end the matrimonial life. We have those three positions presented from the Christian point of view?—I am aware of that. As to the first, it appears to me that is contrary to the Christian law and can only be got rid of by dismissing St. Matthew, as he has been dismissed, as an untrustworthy compiler.

42,152. The second you agree to?—Yes. Then, with regard to the third, I think it would be a disaster if divorce were allowed for any other cause than adultery.

42,153. You think it would be contrary to Christian views?—Contrary to the Chritian view and practically productive of very great evils.

42,154. Although you have given us the benefit of some very clear criticisms of the contexts on the matter, I suppose that you would not put forward those views as based upon exact scholarship?—I cannot lay claim to exact scholarship.

42,155. We have had so many learned men who have discussed these points in minute detail?—I only put them forward as the view of a layman with some amount of capacity for considering the documents upon which the whole matter rests.

42,156. I want to ask you whether in stating that you do not differ from what has been found acceptable in the Scottish Churches, namely an addition of the ground of desertion to adultery, and a ground which has existed for 300 or more years?—I cannot say that. All I can say with regard to Scotland is what Lord Lyndhurst said in 1857 in the Debates:—"I find that "in Scotland adultery on the part of the husband "gives the wife a right to a divorce just as the adultery "of the woman gives the man a similar right and the "remedy extends alike to the lower as well as the "higher classes, and yet I believe that the state of the "law has had no demoralising effect in that country. "Why then should we assume that a similar provision "would be prejudicial to morality in this portion of "the United Kingdom."

42,157. That is not quite the point. Lord Lyndhurst was one of the strongest urgers of divorce being granted on the ground of desertion. Dealing with it from a Christian point of view, Scotland and its Churches have accepted that ground at any rate as not contrary to Christian principle. Have you considered that?—No, I should not accept that, but I have not considered it.

42,158. I think you might now proceed with the practice?—As to the practice, I think in my practice in the Divorce Court itself certain things have taken place which are very mischievous. The first is the mischief done by allowing agreement as to damages. When you have a case to be tried before the court and the parties have agreed beforehand what amount of damages should be paid, it produces a very demoralising effect upon the country in having that stated. It is a sort of bargain by which one man gets rid of his wife and the other man pays for her, and I think that it is very mischievious.

42,159. May I remind you of this in order to get your view complete; you know that the agreement has no binding effect, it has still to be stated to the jury that that agreement has been made and they need not accept it?—I think the effect of allowing the agreement and stating it to the jury as if it were part of the ordinary proceedure possible in the case is a mischievous effect. Secondly, by directing or permitting settlement of damages on the guilty wife. I think that the court has gone far too far in that. It is looked upon now as if the damages were to be a provision for the guilty wife which is not the idea with which damages were awarded originally. It was partly a punishment on the seducer and partly a consolation to the husband for the loss of his wife, but when an arrangement is made with the sanction of the court that the damages shall be settled on the guilty woman, it seems to me that very much of the moral effect of the judgment of the court is done away with.

42,160. May I point out that my recollection is that is usually done where the adulterer has deserted and left the woman penniless, and it has been thought right in the discretion of the judge to apply part of damages to keep her off the streets?—I do not think that has been my experience. I know that it has been done in cases where there is no desertion.

42,161. At any rate, that would not be an improper way of treating damages?—Within certain limits possibly some provision may be made.

42,162. At present the discretion rests with the judge as to what shall be done with the damages?—Yes.

42,163. When they have been brought into court?—Yes. I do not think that discretion ought to be considered so wide as it has been usually considered, and I do not think it has been wisely exercised in many cases. Then I think mischief is done by granting final decree before expiration of the six months. There was a curious and, as I think, a most regrettable case not very long ago—I doubt the legality of it—where a decree was made absolute in three months, and was made absolute with apparently the specific purpose that the child of adultery should be born in wedlock. I think it was a very serious incident.

42,164. My impression is that the time was discretionary?—I should have thought not.

42,165. My recollection is that it is discretionary but not less than three months. I think so, but I will ascertain?—It may be that it was legal. Even if it were within the authority of the Act, I think it was a most unfortunate thing.

42,166. Just to exhaust the point, there are, for instance, cases where a suit has been maintained successfully, but there is an appeal, and the appeal comes on and keeps the matter back for some time, and then if six months have to run, after that it is delayed beyond what would have been the original six if the case had gone through at first?—I think it would be reasonable it should be within six months from the granting of the decree in the first instance. If that decree is sustained by the higher Court, I cannot see any necessity for further delay. Then the next point is a matter of practice. I think that in every suit for divorce all pleadings and particulars should be served on the King's Proctor, who should have the right to appear and cross-examine without being liable for costs to either party.

42,167. This is a point to which I personally attach considerable importance. Do you think that restriction of putting questions to the petitioner or the respondent, as the case may be, about their own misconduct should be maintained? You cannot cross-examine a person? —I do not think so, subject to this: I would not have any questions asked about offences that had been condoned.

42,168. Assume there was a proper answer to a suit on the ground of the petitioner's misconduct, at present, as you know, especially in the undefended cases, neither the judge nor anybody else can ask the petitioners, even though letters would suggest it, that they have been guilty. That is by the Act?—Yes.

42,169. You would remove that restriction?—Yes, and I think its removal would be very valuable. I have known cases, I have one special case in my mind now, where certainly wrong was done, unintentionally, by the court in consequence of that restriction.

42,170. It is rather a survival of the old idea that you should not incriminate people, the only incrimination in these matters being excommunication in those days, which can be left out of account now. That was the basis of it. I have now got the section of the Act about the decree nisi. It says: "Every decree of "dissolution, or nullity of marriage is, in the first "instance, a decree nisi, not made absolute till the "expiration of six calendar months from the pro- "nouncing thereof; unless the Court shall fix a "shorter time, which cannot, however, be less than "three months." There is an express discretion given? —I think probably that was with reference to the matter that was in your Lordship's mind, in the case of appeal.

42,171. You would abolish that?—I would certainly abolish that.

42,172. In no case less than six months?—From the granting of the original decree.

42,173. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Would you abolish it entirely, or in cases where there was not an appeal?—I would say in no case, it applies to both classes of cases, should the decree be made absolute less than six months after the granting of the original decree.

42,174. (Chairman.) There is one point on that: your evidence is so full of experience that I want to exhaust it. I recollect one case in which a lady applied to shorten the time between the three and the six months on the ground that her physical condition, through the anxiety of the matter, was so bad and she wanted to go abroad. I do not remember what was done in it. Would not that rather lead to some exercise of a discretion?—I do not think there should be any discretion.

42,175. You would not allow it to be exercised even though it might possibly legitimise a child?—Certainly not on that ground.

42,176. The next point is with regard to local trials?—As to local trials, I should like to say that I associate myself with the memorandum which has been put before the Commission by the General Council of the Bar, with regard to their objections to the matters being sent to the county courts. I agree with them, and I agree upon the grounds stated in that memoraudum.

42,177. May I ask about one point with regard to it. Would your objection be removed if something were done which is contemplated in the Divorce Act. It says that the Court of Divorce may sit in London or elsewhere according to an Order in Council? Would you object to it if the High Court dealt with these cases elsewhere than in London?—Certainly not. I am against the cases going to the county courts as at present existing. I should like to see them tried by order of the Court at Assize before a Judge of the High Court, or I should like to see the Divorce Court sitting occasionally in large centres of population in order to deal with them, and I personally look forward to the time when the county courts will be reconstituted as District Courts of the High Court.

42,178. Supposing that were done, assume we have got as far as that, and you had district courts sitting at convenient large centres, would you be adverse to that court dealing with the divorce cases?—No. I am speaking now with regard to a few district courts in large centres of population, assuming that a district court had been established, which was a portion of the High Court, subject to the authority and in direct communication with the High Court. I should see no objection to their being tried there.

42,179. Do you think that something of that kind is necessary to meet the poor cases?—I do not know that it would be necessary. I should like a little experience with regard to the trial of these cases at assizes before saying that so great a change would be rendered necessary for the purpose of dealing with divorce cases, but apart from divorce cases, I have a very strong opinion as to the desirability of remodelling the county court system and establishing a system of district courts.

42,180. That would probably meet, in your view, the case of the poorer people, who would get readily to it?—I think that would meet a great deal of the difficulty.

42,181. Then as to publication?—As to the publication of divorce cases, I do not think one can exaggerate the mischief that is done by the present methods of the publication of the cases. It is not merely that the facts of the case are published, but all the letters are published, the publication of which cannot conceivably be of any advantage to anybody; they degrade the reports and make them more exciting and mischievous. It is an extremely difficult question. I do not myself think that the fear of publicity has a deterrent effect.

42,182. On the commission of the act?—In preventing the actual commission of immorality. I think that is much exaggerated: but with regard to publication, it is an extremely difficult question, and the suggestions which I would make are these two: one, that no reports should ever be allowed of a case till it was finished. The mischief really is that we occasionally get what are called sensational cases, and day after day the papers are largely filled with detailed reports of those, and a great excitement is produced, which is in every way mischievous. It cannot in the least degree be advantageous to anybody. That would be very much checked if no report of a case were allowed to be published till that case was finished. Then I think that there should be an official publication of the full names and addresses and descriptions of persons found guilty of adultery. I have known in my experience a number of cases tried in the courts and never reported at all. The publicity has been avoided in different ways; I have known many such cases.

42,183. It is avoided in one respect compulsorily. If you have 20 cases in the day, which is quite common, no paper could find the space to report all of them, and a great many escape publication?—I am not referring to that sort of case. I have many instances in my recollection of applications, where I have often wondered that the judge was not suspicious, to take a case at half-past three or a quarter to four, and the general object of that is that it shall be taken quite quietly at the end of the day when the reporters have had enough to do, and no notice is taken of it and the names do not appear. I think it is extremely important, just as when solicitors go wrong and the court has to deal with them, it puts in the papers the name and address of the offending solicitor, that there should be an official statement of the names and addresses of all persons found guilty of adultery.

42,184. Would you be in favour of hearing all these cases in camera?—No, I think not. There are dangers in that direction, too. I know of a case which was heard in camera, and the carrying through of that case to a result which would have been extremely mischievous, was only prevented by very strong steps being taken with regard to representation to the King's Proctor.

42,185. You always have the power to intimate to the King's Proctor in any suspicious case?—Yes, one always has the power to do that, but I have this case very strongly in my mind.

42,186. However, the point is that you regard this unlimited publication as a serious evil?—I do, very.

42,187. Has anything been brought before you that specifically shows its evil effects?—I do not say one could pick out a particular case, although I am not sure I could not do that even, but one's general knowledge of the effect of these cases and the eagerness with which people read them and talk about them, and the eagerness with which the papers are bought which contain these particulars, quite satisfy me that the present unlimited publication is a very grievous evil.

42,188. The other points are minor ones: you do not give evidence as to separation orders or costs?—No.

42,189. Those are outside your experience?—Yes.

42,190. (Sir George White.) I understand that you consider marriage indissoluble except from the one view of adultery?—Yes.

42,191. It would not modify your opinion a bit, the fact of having cases of permanent insanity, or persistent cruelty, or anything of that kind, however hard the case might be?—It would not modify my case at all. As a Churchman I am bound by the law of Christ.

42,192. So far as facilities under the existing divorce law are concerned, you are prepared to consider any reasonable proposals to bring the facilities within the reach of the poorer classes?—I strongly desire to make the relief in case of adultery more easily obtainable by the poorer people.

42,193. Do you think that by holding sessions of the High Court in the provinces, the expense would be sufficiently reduced under those circumstances to bring it within the reach of the poorer classes?—No, I do not think that alone would do.

42,194. Have you any other suggestion?—Yes. I did not mention specifically that subject, but I said that with regard to these matters, I concurred with the recommendation of the General Council of the Bar, and that contains specific suggestions as to costs, and so on.

42,195. (Lady Frances Balfour.) You are for making it equal as between man and woman?—Yes.

42,196. You said men and women had agreed that the crime was different between the sexes? Would you not rather put it that men had agreed that it was different with women than with men?—No.

42,197. Is there evidence that women agree?—I think both sexes agree as to that.

42,198. I should take exception to that. I think men have always said women should be chaste, and they need not be?—I think my experience is, and I thought everyone's was, that women were very much more indulgent to the faults of men than to the faults of their own sex.

42,199. We have heard a great deal about the forgiving wife?—I am not speaking of the forgiving wife, but the general tone of women's opinion or feeling with regard to this.

42,200. Is it your opinion that women think men should have less restraint than the women have themselves?—I think the women feel less keenly the mischief of the offence in the man's case than in their own.

42,201. Why do you think they think men have to give way to this so much more; it is that they are weaker morally?—I think that the explanation really is as suggested, that with the man there is a great deal more of the physical element in it than in the case of the woman.

42,202. I take exception to the form and I should like to put it in a form you could agree to. I should say, "Men believe there ought to be a difference," not "men and women"?—I am afraid I cannot accept the correction.

42,203. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You have told us that your view that the grounds of divorce should not be enlarged rests on the New Testament, but I gather your view is also that an enlargement of the grounds of divorce is undesirable on the grounds of general public policy?—Yes.

42,204. That would be apart altogether from the Scriptural argument, I will call it for shortness?—Apart altogether from that.

42,205. Is it your view that a multiplication of the different grounds on which a marriage could be severed must have the effect of making the public regard marriage as a less permanent institution?—I think that would be the tendency of any extension of the grounds.

42,206. That view, I suppose, applies equally to Christians and non-Christians; it applies to the whole nation?—That would apply to all, certainly.

42,207. So that your second reason for objecting to the enlargement of the grounds is one that affects the nation quâ nation, irrespective of its Christian character?—That is so. I have entirely failed to find any means of deciding where the line should be drawn with regard to relief directly you go outside the one specific question.

42,208. The other question I wanted to ask was with regard to county courts. You are against jurisdiction being given to the county courts as they exist to-day?—Yes.

42,209. I gathered you would be in favour of such an extension of the jurisdiction of the High Court to the provinces as would make at any rate certain county courts have High Court jurisdiction?—Yes, that would be so.

42,210. That would be not only in divorce matters, but in all matters?—I think in all matters. The system wants remodelling.

42,211. Would you be in favour of divorce jurisdiction alone being extended to certain of the county courts, giving them this jurisdiction before and apart from any extension of the High Court jurisdiction in other branches?—No, I think not, because my willingness to see jurisdiction in divorce cases given to any county court is dependent upon the status of those courts being altered and their relationship to the high court being altered.

42,212. Till that is done as a whole you would be against it being done for divorce only?—Decidedly.

42,213. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) I understand you agree it is very essential that the poorer classes of the community should have some court to resort to in order to obtain a matrimonial remedy?—Yes. I am very anxious that poor circumstances should not deprive a man or woman of the remedy which is given by the Divorce Acts.

42,214. You know, after your years of experience, that any great reformation takes a great number of years to accomplish?—I do, unhappily.

42,215. And this question of the reconstitution of the county courts in combination with the high courts may still take some years?—I think that is very likely.

42,216. That being so, and it being urgent the poor should obtain some relief, that should be dealt with at once. Do you agree with that?—As to its being urgent, I think it very desirable.

42,217. Supposing it was proved to us that the denial of the facilities for divorce has lead to and is leading to a considerable amount of immorality throughout the country, it is obvious that should be put a stop to as soon as possible?—It is very desirable that should be put a stop to, if that is the fact, as I take it from your question.

42,218. Assume that for the question I am going to ask you. I appreciate, and I daresay you would if you were a county court judge, that the difficulty which the poor have is in reaching the courts that are some distance from their residence. It is not merely the expense, but it is the absence of witnesses from their work which is the great difficulty with them. If they had to go to the assizes or only a few towns in the country, you recognise that difficulty will still exist?—It would be only partially remedied.

42,219. And that it is essential. The county courts do at the present time give the poor people that relief in respect of which there is jurisdiction, which was the very object with which county courts were created?—Certainly.

42,220. One other objection which the Bar Council took is the difficulty of technical collusion. Does that press you at all?—I think by sending divorce cases to be dealt with by county courts as at present constituted there would be a great risk, especially seeing that the county court judges are very heavily overworked now in many cases, of less consideration and care being given to the cases than they ought to receive.

42,221. Those are two separate propositions; the question of collusion and the question of the congestion of the work are separate matters?—They do connect themselves in this way, that the pressure of work in the anxiety to get through many cases makes the judge less watchful as to the conditions under which the case is being conducted.

42,222. The second point involves this. If the county courts have the jurisdiction they would fix special days to do the divorce work, and do no other work on those days, which would obviate that difficulty?—I doubt very much whether that would be found necessary in many county courts. I doubt whether there would be a very large number of cases.

42,223. I have no doubt special days could be specially arranged. With regard to the question of collusion, I suppose Sir George Lewis would be considered one of the greatest authorities on that subject?—Undoubtedly.

42,224. Sir George Lewis said if desertion is abolished, which you advocate, collusion disappears. That was his opinion. He said if you abolish desertion from the divorce procedure, collusion simply disappears?—That is, if you had simply divorce for adultery?

42,225. For adultery alone?—I do not understand that.

42,226. That was his opinion?—My experience is quite the contrary. My experience is that with regard to cases of adultery collusion is very frequent.

42,227. He said, "I do not believe there is collusion "in the Divorce Court, or, at least, very little "indeed." That was his evidence. I do not know whether you agree with it?—Sir George Lewis may apply a different meaning to the word "collusion," but I have known case after case where the defence, the respondent and his solicitors, have supplied to the petitioner the date and place at which they could get evidence of adultery, the adultery being, in fact, committed in order that the suit might go through.

42,228. I should think those are very rare cases?—I do not think they are very rare.

42,229. Sir George Lewis apparently thinks so himself, and he is much behind the scenes?—I think with regard to the three or four cases in my mind at the moment, Sir George Lewis and I are on equal terms as far as knowledge of the facts is concerned.

42,230. Then with regard to the King's Proctor, he says, "Although collusion may be suspected in a good "many cases, the suspicion is ill-founded, and the "cases of detected collusion are very small, perhaps "three in one year and one in another." Does that alter your opinion?—I can only say that I am surprised to hear it.

42,231. Lord Salvesen, a very experienced judge, said he does not think collusion exists, certainly amongst the poorer classes of the community in Scotland?—I would accept anything he said with regard to Scotland with great respect.

42,232. As to the doctrine of recrimination, I do not think you have been asked about that. Do you think it would be a good thing to abolish it?—No, I do not think so; it has not occurred to me as being desirable.

42,233. Supposing the petitioner is proved by the respondent, who is equally guilty, to have been guilty of adultery, do you think as a rule that ought to deprive the petitioner of a right to a decree?—I think that that is closely connected with my very strong view with regard to condonation. I think there should be no recrimination of an offence which has been condoned.

42,234. Supposing there is no condonation in the case, but a pure question of recrimination, is there any object in keeping that principle any longer in existence?—Yes. I do not see the advantage of doing away with it. It is true it prevents the people getting the divorce, but in that case I am not quite sure that it is to the advantage of anybody that the divorce should be granted and they should be free to marry other people.

42,235. That is a part of your opinion, apart from guilty parties not remarrying?—Yes.

42,236. Is there any object in keeping two persons married both of whom have made the marriage contract absolutely impossible by a breach arising from unfaithfulness? Why should you keep those people married?—I do not think that is a case in which the court can decently interpose to set them free.

42,237. (Chairman.) With regard to the constitution of the courts, is there any other class of case except the divorce cases in which the poor have not at present a court to which they can resort? What I mean by that is this. For the small debts which poor people incur, for the small torts they suffer, and for the crime with which they are concerned, there is always a local tribunal they can get to, or are forced to go to if it is crime?—Yes.

42,238. Is it not a fact that divorce is the only class of business which people without means of getting to London have no opportunity of presenting to the courts?—Yes, I think that is so.

42,239. Would that not rather indicate, if a form of giving some jurisdiction to the High Court in the country were desirable, some more urgent need for dealing with that matter than waiting till the whole jurisdiction of county courts was altered?—I answer that by saying I do not think, until the whole jurisdiction of the county courts and the system is altered, that you will get the same character of tribunal such as I think you ought to have in cases so serious as those which affect the status of the persons engaged in the case.

42,240. If that could be done, that would meet your difficulty?—Yes, and I look in the future to an alteration in the status and character of the court as giving local opportunities, and I also look to the suggestions made by the General Council of the Bar with regard to the fees and costs, and so on, as at all events mitigating the difficulty during the time that that reform has not been carried out.

42,241. With regard to the question one of the Commissioners put about the possibility of adding causes of divorce tending to lessen the respect for the marriage tie, might I ask you if you have given this your consideration. Assuming that there is a good deal of evidence of immorality produced by improper connections through there being no relief obtainable by poor people, assuming that there are cases where brutality is such as to make life impossible, assuming that there are cases where desertion has occurred such as that one person is left in this country and the partner has gone off and established himself in America, say, assuming that there are cases in which habitual drunkenness is such as to make life impossible, and assuming cases of insanity of which there are a considerable number, do you think it a possible view or not, that holding people to the tie of marriage in those cases as a legal tie where de facto it has ceased, may not degrade in their minds and the minds of the population, the idea of marriage as a tie held on to in circumstances which make it almost a mockery?—No, I do not think so. My view would be the other way, that the existence of those cases of undoubted hardship rather emphasize the sanctity of the marriage tie.

42,242. Do you think they do so where people come to disregard the tie, in consequence of the position, as one which they cannot stand?—I think the effect of the recognition of the sanctity of the marriage tie, where cases of hardship really do exist, but where the parties have not fallen into immorality, does much more to elevate the character of marriage than the lapse in certain cases from morals does to degrade.

42,243. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) With reference to his Lordship's first question, is it quite the fact that divorce is the only civil matter there is no right of dealing with in the local courts? Is there any jurisdiction with regard to libel?—No, libel, breach of promise of marriage, and seduction.

(Chairman.) Those may be brought in the county court by consent.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Can they?

(Chairman.) Any ordinary Common Law case of the High Court can by consent be brought in the county court.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) There is no jurisdiction?

(Chairman.) Not without consent.

(Witness.) There is one thing I wanted to mention: it is by way of correction. In the memorandum I read I referred to St. Augustine and St. Ambrose and St. Jerome as having held that marriage might be dissolved on the ground of adultery. I should have added, with regard to St. Augustine, he appears to have made the reservation, although I do not think it is clear, that the parties shall not marry again during the lifetime of the other.

42,244. (Chairman.) I think you may take it we have had before us the means of referring to all those authorities for ourselves?—I have no doubt you have, from higher authorities than myself.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much for your attendance and for giving so much thought to your evidence.

Dr. THOMAS HUTCHINSON TRISTRAM, K.C., called and examined.

42,245. (Chairman.) You are also one of His Majesty's Counsel?—Yes, I am a King's Counsel.

42,246. May I also assume I am right in believing you are the sole survivor of the original body of The Doctors Commons Bar?—I am.

42,247. You are really the only person who can tell us what the practice was in those days?—Yes.

42,248. Except so far as we could get it from books?—Yes.

42,249. You have prepared a short memorandum as to the practice in old Ecclesiastical Courts. May I read it and see whether there is any questions that should be asked you upon it?—Yes.

42,250. You say: "The Consistory Court in London was the Principal Court of First Instance in England for the trial of matrimonial causes, and it had jurisdiction to entertain such suits, not only where the parties to the suit were resident in the London Diocese but also where the parties were resident in any other Diocese in England, if they both elected to have the suit heard in the London Court instead of in the Ecclesiastical Court of their own Diocese?—Yes.

42,251. If the cases were in the Ecclesiastical Court of the diocese, was there not a process of letters of request to the London authority to hear it?—Not the Consistory Courts. They might send letters of request to the Dean of Arches.

42,252. It could be taken in that way by the Dean of Arches through letters of request, through the local court?—I do not think the Dean of Arches would have accepted them: he was not bound to accept them.

42,253. In looking through old books on practice in years gone by I have found the forms of letters of request which were issued. That would be only derogating an authority?—Yes.

42,254. You go on to say:—"Upon the pleadings in the case being filed in the Registry of the Court, witnesses were examined by one of the Doctors Commons Proctors, as Commissioner, either in London, or in any other place where the parties or witnesses were resident. The evidence was taken in private, and the depositions of the witnesses were filed in the Registry of the Court, copies of which were supplied to the Proctors of the parties to the suit." That evidence was taken entirely by the Proctor, who was deputed to take it without the presence of any advocates or solicitors, or anybody but the witnesses?—Yes, but I should state during the preparation of the pleadings they were laid before counsel and they put interrogatories, the petitioner would put interrogatories, and the respondent would put interrogatories on the different cases, which the examiner would put to the witnesses.

42,255. The result was that he took their answers from questions he framed, and from the interrogatories?—Yes.

42,256. The ultimate record of that was sent to the judge, who never saw the witnesses?—No.

42,257. I do not know whether, looking back over it from this point of time, you think that was a satisfactory means of getting at the truth?—No, but it was considered to be a very fair mode of obtaining the evidence at that time.

42,258. Perhaps it would not be thought so now?—If the witnesses lived out of London the examiner was able to examine them out of London.

42,259. Then you go on: "At the hearing of the case, where any evidence was unfit for publication it was the practice of the advocates to mention to the judge that this was so, and to refer him to the articles of the paragraph where it would be found. The judge, after perusing the evidence, directed counsel to proceed with his argument, which he did without mentioning objectionable details, which never appeared in the papers." That was a practical way of excluding from publication anything that was at all of an offensive character?—Yes.

42,260. Then you state: "On the Divorce Act coming into operation in January 1858, it was mentioned to the judges of the Divorce Court that if the evidence in all divorce cases was taken in open court it might lead to the publication in the Press of objectionable matter, which was precluded by the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts. The judges, however, held that it was desirable to adhere in that court to the rules relating to evidence that prevailed in the common law courts." I believe they did so because, if I recollect rightly, the Act of 1857 provided that the hearing should be in open court?—Yes. With regard to that I should add that a few days before the Act came into operation I met Mr. Delane, the editor of the "Times," and he told me that he had consulted the sub-editors, and they decided that the only statement they would make in future would be to give the names of the advocates, the names of the parties, and what the charge was.

42,261. And the result?—Yes. He asked me what I thought of that. I said I thought it would be all that was necessary. Then I met Mr. Delane a few days after the court was established, and he said he regretted very much to say that his suggestion had failed to take effect. He said he found that the other newspapers gave full reports of each case, and that in self-defence he was obliged to do it in the "Times." I told Dr. Phillimore, who was leader of the Bar, what had passed between the editor of the "Times" and myself, and he said he would put a question to the court on a motion day, and he put a question. He asked Sir Cresswell Cresswell what would be the course with regard to publication of evidence, who said, "In "nullity suits we have always the cases heard in "camera." Then Dr. Phillimore asked with regard to the other cases. Sir Cresswell Cresswell said, "I will "speak to the judges, and mention it on next court "day," and he spoke to the Common Law judges, and they said they thought the evidence should be given in open court, just as in other cases in the courts.

42,262. This is the section I had in mind, Section 46 of the old Act of 1857: "Subject to such Rules and "Regulations as may be established as herein provided, "the witnesses in all proceedings before the Court "where their attendance can be had shall be sworn "and examined orally in open Court." However, the result was, except in nullity cases and, I think, in children's cases with regard to custody of children, it was decided that the cases should be heard in open Court?—Yes.

42,263. I gather from what you have said that you think, and it was thought at the time, to be undesirable that details should appear in the papers?—Yes.

42,264. Then you say: "With regard to my suggestion, that by adopting the practice of the Courts in New York and in other foreign countries——" there is something omitted; I do not follow it. Perhaps you will state what you want to convey?—In other Divorce Courts, in New York and generally, as far as I could find out, the evidence was not taken in Court, but after the pleadings had been completed the judge made an order on a counsel to act as Commissioner and examine the witnesses privately, I mean in the presence of parties. The evidence is taken down carefully, and the Commissioner forwards that to the Court. When the case is called on for hearing the judge reads the evidence, he does not read it in Court, but he reads it himself, and says: "I am satisfied with the evidence "in this case; it establishes the charge of adultery," or whatever it might be, and he makes a decree accordingly.

42,265. You say that would be a saving of expense? — I calculate it in this way. If the judge were to give an order to a member of the local Bar to examine, his fee, if half a day, would be three guineas; if a whole day, five guineas. Then the evidence would be sent up and all the expense of sending the witnesses up to town would be saved, and if the judge is not satisfied with the evidence, he may require further questions to be put to the witnesses. That would be a very great saving of expense.

42,266. Is that quite clear? Take a case in London. With a case in London it would not cost anything like five guineas to bring the witnesses into Court and give their evidence vivâ voce?—It would cost much more than that.

42,267. Not in London?—No, but I mean in the country.

42,268. You also say: "Whether the suit is contested or uncontested, it would prevent the particulars, which only concern the parties in the suit and their family, but not the public, being published in the press." That is right?—Yes.

42,269. You also have this memorandum: "On the subject of the publication of the evidence in divorce cases in foreign countries, this is considered to be an injury to the children of the marriage, and in particular to the daughters, where the wife's chastity is impugned; and so much so, that it is a common practice for the husband in the latter case to separate himself permanently from the wife, and on her bringing a suit for restitution of conjugal rights for him not to defend the suit, and to refuse to comply with the Court's order on him to cohabit with her. This entitles her to apply for a divorce dissolving their marriage on the ground of his desertion." What countries do you refer to?—Sweden, Norway, and other countries. I know it is in Sweden, because I have had cases before me.

42,270. The next paragraph in your paper I do not think deals with the matter that comes really before us. May I pass on to another point on the next page, which you say is deserving of consideration?—Yes.

42,271. You say: "Where both the parties to a suit for a divorce or for a judicial separation, which has been set down to be heard before one of the judges of the Court desire that the suit should be heard in private, that it might be granted to them, on the ground that it is a suit which only concerns the parties to the suit and their family, and not the public." That is a view which you entertain whether it is separation or divorce?—Yes.

42,272. Would that not tend to enable parties to cloak up scandals in a way that might not be desirable?—I do not know that it would, if they were fairly conducting the case.

42,273. Then you say, further, that there is no other country in Europe where the particulars of the evidence in divorce suits are published as they are in the leading papers in England, which are in circulation on the Continent. May I take it your view is that it is extremely undesirable that details of these cases should be reported in the press?—At length. Of course when it is a question of character to either party, then it must be fought out, and if the people do not object to it; but I think very often it is undesirable, particularly when they have had a quarrel. I have seen it often in cases where there has been some difference between a husband and wife. When at the Bar I was leading Junior for about 10 years, I always endeavoured to urge a reconciliation, instead of going into court for a judicial separation.

42,274. I think that is all there is in your memorandum. Is there anything you would like to add?—I have always found, particularly persons in a good position of life, that they would consent, instead of getting a decree, to have a deed of separation. I very often found afterwards they came together again.

42,275. Is there any further point you desire to present to us?—No.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much for coming here to give evidence.

The Right Hon. AMEER ALI called and examined.

42,276. (Chairman.) You have had a long experience as a judge in India?—Yes.

42,277. And lately have been appointed to the Judicial Office in the Privy Council?—Yes.

42,278. And you have been sitting there some little time?—I have had nearly 16 years' experience on the bench of the High Court, and in the course of that I had a good many cases under the Indian Divorce Act.

42,279. You have written a short paper which I think it will be simplest if you read. I think it brings out all the points?—"The rules relating to dissolution of marriage among the Christian communities in India, whether European, domiciled or country born, are contained in Act IV. of 1869, usually called the Indian Divorce Act, framed on the provisions of the English Matrimonial Causes Acts, and the decisions of the English Courts. The jurisdiction, however, to grant 'any relief' under this Act is confined to cases where the petitioner not only professes the Christian religion, but also resides in India at the time of presenting the petition—nor can any court make a decree for dissolution of the marriage, or for nullity of the marriage unless the same shall have been 'solemnised' in India."

42,280. What are the grounds for divorce allowed by that Act?—Exactly the same grounds as are allowed under the English Matrimonial Causes Act.

42,281. It follows the English rule?—Yes. "This last provision, in many cases, causes very great hardship; it often deters injured parties who have married in Europe and gone out to India, from taking action owing to either want of means or the difficulty of leaving their work. In administering the Divorce laws I have often felt this provision as a serious blot in this Act, for I see no reason why if both husband and wife are residing in India and the offence alleged has been committed in India, the mere fact that the marriage was solemnised, say, in England, should deprive the Indian Courts of the jurisdiction to grant relief. The same objection applies to the provision depriving the Indian Courts of the power of making a declaration of nullity of marriage unless the marriage has been solemnised in India. The rules relating to the grounds for seeking a dissolution or nullity of the marriage are identical with the provisions of the English law, so also questions of connivance and condonation. There is no King's Proctor in India, but S. 16 declares that in the interim between the decree nisi and the final decree, 'any person' shall be at liberty . . . to show cause why the said decree should not be made absolute by reason of the same having been obtained by collusion or by reason of material facts not being brought before the Court. This provision appears to me less cumbersome and certainly less expensive than the English procedure. It is not abused, as the risk of having to pay costs keeps unnecessary interventions within bounds. As under the English law, nullity of the marriage may be obtained 'if either party was a lunatic or idiot at the time of the marriage.' But there is no rule for obtaining relief if either party becomes absolutely and permanently insane after the marriage. To my mind the provision of the Mussulman law which gives to the judge the power of dissolving the marriage where either party becomes permanently insane or becomes affected with an incurable and malignant disease, is more humane. Under S. 22 a husband or wife may obtain an order of judicial separation on the ground of desertion without reasonable excuse for two years or upwards. I do not see why the relief should be restricted to judicial separation or why a wife, in order to obtain her release from the marriage tie, should have to prove adultery coupled with desertion. Again, I think the provision of Mahommedan Law is in advance of the English Law and the Indian Act. It gives to the judge the power of dissolving the marriage where the husband has deserted the wife without making any provision for her, and the desertion has lasted four years and upwards. Proceedings under the Indian Divorce Law are not costly and place the help of the courts within reach of the poorer classes, who, more often than the well-to-do, seek relief under the Act." I want to add one observation to this which I forgot at the time, and that is that under the Divorce Act of 1869 the jurisdiction in the Divorce Act to dissolve marriages, or grant decrees for nullity of marriage, is given both to the High Court and also to the District Courts. The District Court's decree is subject to the confirmation of the High Court, and that is found from experience to be most convenient and to meet the requirements of justice in all instances where the parties cannot, either owing to want of means or to the distance from the High Court, approach the latter court.

42,282. How is that confirmation obtained—simply by sending the decree?—The proceedings are sent up to the High Court by the District Court and the parties are entitled to appear if they like, but the High Court deals with the question of the propriety of the decree on the proceedings of the lower Court.

42,283. Does it take the findings of fact of the judge?—The findings are taken, unless any exception is taken to them on the ground that the evidence is insufficient, but the High Court has the power, if it considers the finding to be insufficient or the evidence to be defective, to send down the case to be retried or fresh evidence taken.

42,284. Assuming it is all considered right, it is passed on as a matter of form to the High Court, and the High Court records the decree and then it becomes operative?—Yes, after six months, the usual term.

42,285. You would be in favour of extending the grounds of divorce as you mention in this paper?—Decidedly.

42,286. You mention two particular cases, insanity and desertion?—And malignant disease. I think that it is an extreme injustice, certainly, in either case to keep them tied if one of the married parties becomes affected with a malignant disease like leprosy.

42,287. That particular disease we have not to deal with. In India it amounts to complete separation?—Yes, but any malignant disease ought to be a sufficient ground.

42,288. Apparently those are confined to the Mussulman law, insanity, malignant disease and desertion?—Yes.

42,289. Can you tell me to what extent those are put in force as causes?—So far as my experience goes, extending over 37 years at the Bar and on the Bench, in the Mohammedan community there are very few cases of divorce. There are some cases of divorce amongst the lower classes, emanating from the husband, but I have not come across a single case among the better classes based on either of these grounds, or any case, except perhaps three, arising on questions relating to inheritance, or things of that kind. Anyhow there is the provision.

42,290. Although the law exists, it is not very much enforced?—It is not used, but there is the provision to which a person can resort for the purpose of obtaining relief if the contingency arises.

42,291. Do you think that that not being used depends partly upon the fact, if I am right—correct me if I am wrong—that according to the Mohammedan law more wives than one can be taken?—What is called polygamy, the privilege of taking more than one wife, is tolerated as merely a privilege, but as a matter of fact in India among the Mohammedans, so far as my experience goes, it is extremely limited. I do not think more than 5 per cent. of the people have more than one wife.

42,292. The other point I should like to ask you about is this. You have pointed out that people in India find a difficulty in utilising the Indian Act because it does not necessarily dissolve the marriage in this country?—Yes.

42,293. That is because we regard domicile as the essential feature of the exercise of the jurisdiction?—The reason why the Courts do not take cognizance of many of the cases is this. Many of the European marriages are celebrated out of India, and the Act only gives jurisdiction to the Indian Courts in cases where the marriages are solemnised in India.

42,294. Do you think the Act should be amended by allowing the parties to sue, wherever the marriage had been celebrated?—Yes, if the offence is committed there.

42,295. Assume that power were given to dissolve the marriage, wherever it had been celebrated. If the parties were in India, according to our law, it would be an essential condition that they should be domiciled in India. Most English people who came before me in the Divorce Court when I sat there pointed out that although they may be in India many years they are not domiciled there, and that they have had to come to the English Courts for the purpose of obtaining a decree in a case where it was required?—The difficulty of domicile does arise, but it is very difficult to say how the Indian domicile can be acquired by a European. There is no distinct indication of legal opinion or judicial opinion on that point.

42,296. I want to see whether you have any suggestion about that. Even if the courts there had jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage wherever it was celebrated, they would not get that jurisdiction according to our law unless the parties were domiciled in India?—That question has not arisen, and I have not considered it. I do not like to give an opinion upon that without further consideration of the question. I do not see why an Englishman or an Englishwoman resident in India should not be treated as if domiciled in India for the purpose of relief under the Matrimonial Causes Act or the Indian Act.

42,297. Perhaps you would suggest that residence of both parties in India at the time should be sufficient?—That would be my suggestion on the point, because it would be a great relief to them. There is one other matter, but I do not know how far it will be relevant to the Commission. Many foreigners come to England and marry English girls in this country, and, of course, they go before the Registrar and take out a certificate and get married; but in many cases I have seen that a great deal of injury had been caused to the wife from the fact appearing afterwards that the man was not single when he married in this country. I therefore thought, if this is within the purview of the Commission, of making a suggestion to this effect, that when an application is made before a Registrar by a foreigner to marry an English girl domiciled in this country, it should be kept in abeyance for two or three months, and that the fact of the application should be advertised in the place where he comes from, or say, taking India, for example, in the Collector's Court as well, which would have jurisdiction in the district where the man is residing, so that the people of the place may have notice of the fact that there was an application for a certificate of marriage in this country. I should desire to press that suggestion very strongly in order to guard against those frequent cases which have arisen recently, and the gross injustice to women married in this country arising from the non-observance of any care in that respect.

42,298. Have you any other suggestion to make?—I cannot think of any other at the moment.

42,299. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) I did not understand of what Province you were High Court Judge?—I was in the Calcutta High Court, which has jurisdiction over Bengal, Behar and Orissa.

42,300. How many District Courts are there in that Province?—Fifty-two.

42,301. Are they presided over by military men or by lawyers?—By members of the Civil Service, experienced, well-trained civilian judges.

42,302. In those courts is there a registrar and a set of officials?—There is.

42,303. Are the interlocutory proceedings taken in those District Courts?—They have the jurisdiction. The person seeking relief may either put in his or her petition in the District Court, or may come to the High Court, but very often for the want of means they prefer to take proceedings in the District Court to save the trouble of going to the High Court.

42,304. Have these District Judges power over the custody of the children?—They have the same powers as the High Court under the Act.

42,305. And also with reference to alimony?—Everything.

42,306. They have all the powers of the High Court?—All the powers vested in the High Court, subject to the confirmation of the High Court.

42,307. Have you any reason to believe that sometimes that does not work satisfactorily?—I have no reason to think it whatever. I have had several cases from the District Courts, and we have found that the proceedings had been conducted very carefully, and certainly to the satisfaction of the High Court.

42,308. Some witnesses have taken objection to local courts on the ground of want of uniformity of treatment that may arise from the different judges dealing with the case. Have you found that a difficulty?—There has been no difficulty in that respect: our laws are so uniform. We have this great advantage over the English procedure, which I venture to point out—our laws are codified. The law of evidence is contained in one uniform Act, for which we are indebted to Sir FitzJames Stephen. It is an Act of the very greatest use, especially in the subordinate courts. With respect to the procedure law, we have a uniform Code which does not enable one to indulge in discussion.

42,309. Do you find any difficulty in regard to collusion?—Objections have been taken, but we have found no difficulty. Sometimes the objections have been taken by interveners with reference to collusion, but we have had no difficulty. I am bound to say one thing, the majority of cases that come to the Courts in India are cases not from the upper classes: they are, general speaking, people such as foremen of works, guards on railways, and persons in charge of factories, and so forth. Few people belonging to the higher ranks come into the Divorce Court. Whatever may be said by poets and novelists, Anglo-Indian Society is extremely circumspect in its manners. Whatever cases have arisen have come to England.

42,310. I rather gather from that that you are of opinion that collusion does not exist amongst the poorer classes, although it may exist amongst the better ones?—Objections based on collusion have been taken, but they have generally been decided, so far as my recollection goes, on rules of evidence, and perhaps in one or two cases the collusion has been found, but in the majority of cases not 42,311. Do you think that collusion does exist amongst the poorer classes?—Yes.

42,312. (Chairman.) With regard to those classes of people you mention, if they had been married in England the English courts would have no jurisdiction?—That is so.

42,313. And these people might be too poor to come to England to get their divorce, although their domicile is still English?—Practically for a long time residing in India.

42,314. Technically domiciled in England?—Yes.

42,315. Your view is, to meet that sort of case, let the Act be amended so as to deal with marriages outside India as well as in India, if the people are resident in India?—Yes, that is what my suggestion comes to.

(Chairman.) I think we ought to thank you very much for your evidence which has brought one or two new points to our attention.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FIFTY-THIRD DAY.

Monday, 19th December 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
His Honour Judge TINDAL ATKINSON.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.
The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).

The Right Hon. EARL RUSSELL called and examined.

42,316. (Chairman.) I think, my Lord, you communicated with the Secretary with the view of giving evidence before this Commission?—I did, my Lord.

42,317. You have been interested in the question of divorce since 1890, and are familiar with the practice of the court?—I am.

42,318. I think you yourself, if I remember aright, are a member of Bar?—Yes.

42,319. And you have also studied the history of the question, the earlier part of which, you say, is naturally ecclesiastical?—I have.

42,320. Will you kindly read the next part, because it shortens matters?—"I am, however, of opinion that Parliament is not concerned in legislation with ecclesiastical views, but only with sociological considerations, and I do not therefore propose to go into them. In my view the State has no more right to dictate to me or my fellow citizens what shall be the nature of contracts of marriage from an ecclesiastical point of view, than it has to deal with the education of my children, with the exercise of the franchise, or with other matters, from an ecclesiastical point of view." I do not know whether your Lordship thinks I might read that quotation from Lord James that I give there.

42,321. Oh yes, I think so?—Lord James of Hereford, when speaking on the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, said something very much to the same effect, though on another point: "Guided by my own "conscience and seeking such guidance as will assist "me, I protest against this country, blessed with the "results of the great Reformation, going back to the "opinions of the early bishops and learned men of "narrow views for rules as to what is right or wrong "for the social life of to-day. What can be said on "this ground to our Nonconformist fellow countrymen? "How can they accept the opinions of a Church with "which they have nothing to do, as guides in the law "of marriage? There can be no law in this matter "but the law of Parliament."

42,322. That is quoted from Hansard on the 20th August 1907?—Yes, my Lord.

42,323. Perhaps you will proceed, and I will stop you when necessary to ask any questions that occur to me?—"The existing law is, of course, well known to members of the Commission. It suffers in my opinion from three great defects. 1. The premium placed upon adultery, and the advantage which the law gives to those who are willing to commit it."

42,324. Would you explain what you mean by that?—What I mean by that is that the relief of divorce in this country is afforded quite readily in the case of adultery where one spouse or another commits or is willing to commit it; but if both spouses are persons who prefer to live chaste lives, no matter how impossible their matrimonial life together may be, the law gives no relief; not even if the impossibility is so great that they feel it necessary to separate and live apart for the rest of their natural lives. "2. The practical denial of divorce to the poor." I think your Lordship has had evidence on that point.

42,325. Yes?—Probably the Commission is fully alive to the fact that a large proportion of the population is unable to get access to the Divorce Court.

42,326. We have had a great deal of evidence on that point?—"3. The provision of an illusory remedy in many cases of matrimonial hardship, such remedy itself being directly provocative of further adultery. To illustrate my first point, let us take the case of a wife who desires to elope with her lover. By a fairly simple process the husband can obtain an undefended divorce and the wife and the lover may marry. The lover will have to pay the costs, and may also (if the husband is that kind of person) be mulcted in damages. But the law itself puts no obstacle and no difficulty in the way, and within a year of the elopement a new matrimonial alliance may be formed. In the case of the adultery of the husband the matter is not so simple, for it is necessary that another offence should be added to give the wife her complete remedy, or, as a distinguished author once put it to me, 'It is 'necessary in these cases that the husband should not 'only be immoral, but should also cease to behave as a 'gentleman.'" That refers to the necessary addition of cruelty.

42,327. Or desertion?—Or desertion. "But the modern practice of the Divorce Court has whittled down the necessary quantum of cruelty to a very small amount, and if the husband is a consenting party, and the divorce is unopposed, the actual cruelty may be even smaller than the evidence.

"The second offence necessary may also be provided by desertion for two years. But the Weldon Act has provided the device of a fictitious action for restitution by which this period may be reduced to one year or even less."

42,328. I think that is the Act of 1884?—Yes, my Lord. "These are the remedies and luxuries which the law offers the well-to-do adulterer, and among sensible people there is not much difficulty in arranging the matter. If, however, both parties have committed adultery, showing in the clearest possible way that they are ready to make new alliances, the law refuses relief to either.

"Hardship arises at once if one or both of the spouses are virtuous and upright members of society. In such a case husband and wife may separate if they find life together intolerable, and, for all the law cares, may remain separate and celibate for the rest of their lives without any prospect of relief. Or it may be that the husband of an offending wife is a Catholic with religious convictions, or a mean-spirited person who desires to punish his wife, and he may refuse to take proceedings, or he may only ask for a judicial separation. Whatever the motive that actuates him, he has the entire control of the situation and is able to decide whether his wife shall or shall not be at liberty to regularise her position. The penalties imposed upon the party at fault are pecuniary and social, the latter of course varying infinitely according to his position, and falling very differently, for example, upon the schoolmaster or the journalist.

"All these remedies and luxuries are absolutely denied to the poor. The case may be perfectly clear, the petitioner may be in law fully entitled to his remedy, the respondent may be quite willing not to defend, but unless he can find a sum varying from 30*l.* to 70*l.* he must go without his remedy. This sum to be spent in one lump is probably out of the reach of four-fifths of the husbands and nine-tenths of the wives of this country. The proceeding in formâ pauperis does not adequately meet the case. In the first place, the initial steps are not easy unless the proposed petitioner is able to get in touch with a friendly solicitor and counsel. When this difficulty has been overcome and leave has been given to proceed in formâ pauperis money has to be paid for the travelling expenses of the witnesses and for the out-pockets of the solicitor. The most favourable case I ever knew of was from my own parish in Sussex, where the thing was made easy for the woman by her husband having been convicted of bigamy at the Liverpool Assizes. Being in prison it was easy to serve him with papers, and the evidence, collected at the expense of the police, was available cut and dried. Even here the cost to the woman was between 5*l.* and 10*l.*, of which the vicar of the parish contributed half. Moreover, the test as to means is fallacious."

The affidavit, as the Commission knows, is that the total possessions are not more than 10*l.* or 20*l.*

42,330. And must set out the income?—Yes. Then I must correct this figure. "The furniture of a cottage may very well be worth more than 25*l.* and yet the occupant may not be able to put up 40*l.* for a non-pauper case. To my mind the obvious remedy is to give jurisdiction to the county courts sitting throughout the country, manned by very able judges who habitually try cases infinitely more difficult than those of divorce. In the vast majority of cases the evidence would be in the locality of the county court, thus reducing the expenses of witnesses. There should, I suppose, be some limit of income, say, 500*l.* a year, and I think it would be fair to prohibit a petitioner in the county court from seeking damages. However, on the general question of damages I agree with the protest of Lord St. Leonards in 1857."

42,331. Do you recollect what it is?—I am not sure if I have furnished a copy of it, but it will be found in Hansard as a protest in the Debates, and the words, I remember, are that he says, "How can any husband "deal with money of this sort or take money for the "sale of his wife? And how could he mix it with his "other money? I should as soon touch scorpions."

42,332. I think those expressions were before the clause was inserted that the money could be paid into court and dealt with by the court?—Oh, I think, very likely. It was during the discussion of the Bill; but none the less I take it the theory of damages is the old theory of the action of crim. con.—that is a solatium for the loss of a wife; and, looked at from that point of view, it is somewhat barbarous in the present day. "The remedy of judicial separation was provided to satisfy the consciences of Church people, although heartily condemned by an archbishop of the English Church."

42,333. Which is that? — That is Archbishop Cranmer, whom I quote in a moment. "It has been extended and kept alive to satisfy the feeling that something ought to be done to protect the feelings of husbands and wives while not offending the ecclesiastical conscience. To my mind judicial separation is a wicked provision of the law, with a very high probability of adultery by the separated parties."

42,334. May I say we have had a complete copy of the Reformatio Legum put in, and a translation of it; so perhaps it is not necessary to read that particular part?—No.

42,335. Of course, I mean so far as it relates to this subject?—Yes.

42,336. Then, perhaps, you might proceed from the bottom of the page?—Lord Palmerston said on the 6th August 1857, during the debate on the Divorce Bill—

42,337. Hansard, page 1194?—Yes, my Lord. He said: "The position in which man and wife were placed by these judicial separations was a most objectionable one, and if marriage were dissolved at all, he thought it should be dissolved altogether, that the parties should be entirely set free, and that they should be able to contract other engagements. He thought that parting man and wife by these judicial separations placed both of them in situations of great temptation, where they were liable to form connections which it was not desirable to encourage." Then, in the debate on the same Bill in the House of Lords—Hansard, 3rd March 1857—"The Bishop of Exeter said, 'With regard to 'the doctrine of divorce a mensa et thoro, he thought 'that it was wholly inapplicable to the nature of the 'offence and to the circumstances of the law. It was 'unknown by the Church of Christ at any period, 'except under the dominion of Rome; but they were 'now asked permanently to inflict the corrupt system 'of that Church upon the Church and the nation of 'England.'"

42,338. As to the next passage, we have had that judgment before us?—That I am sure the Commission have already heard.

42,339. Then, "Attempts at Reform." That is a point I want to ask about, because you yourself have been the introducer of several Bills on the subject into the House?—Yes.

42,340. I do not know that they need be formally put in; we can refer to them; but I should like you to give us the points in them to which you were directing the legislation?—Yes, my Lord. "The vexed question of divorce appears to have slumbered for about 50 years. In May 1902 I introduced a Bill into the House of Lords."

42,341. I should like to get on the note in short form what the objects were?—My Lord, it was a very comprehensive and ambitious measure. I do not say that I anticipated at any time that it would pass into law; but the object of the Bill was to increase considerably the causes for divorce; to assimilate the practice of the Divorce Court to some extent to the provisions of other divisions of the High Court, and do away with some of its peculiar practices; to relieve poor people, by enabling them to bring their suits in the County Court; and at the end there were two additional provisions; one, legitimation by subsequent marriage (clause 17 of Divorce Bill, 1902 [H.L. 43]).

42,342. And the other has already been ——?—The other, the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, which has been dealt with in a separate Bill.

42,343. Perhaps you will let me consider later whether it is necessary to print these Bills in the Appendix?—Yes.*

42,344. But that it may be on the note, would you recapitulate for us simply the grounds that you then proposed for divorce?—The grounds are in clause 1.

42,345. That may be sufficient, practically, for our purpose?—Before I come to the first ground, I should point out that the clause begins, "Either party to "marriage may present a petition to the court"; so incidentally it involves equality between the two spouses. The first ground "(a) That since the "marriage the other party to the marriage has com- "mitted adultery or sodomy." Those are the exact words. "(b) That since the marriage the other "party to the marriage has been guilty of cruelty "to the petitioner. (c) That the other party to the "marriage is undergoing penal servitude for a term "of not less than three years. (d) That the other "party to the marriage has during the year preceding "the presentation of the petition been found or "certified to be of unsound mind under the Lunacy "Act, 1890. (e) That during the three years pre- "ceding the presentation of the petition the parties "to the marriage have lived apart, and that through- "out that period either of the parties did not intend "to resume cohabitation. (f) That during the year "preceding the presentation of the petition the parties "to the marriage have lived apart, and that the other "party concurs in the petition." That involves divorce by mutual consent, of course.

42,346. Then what was the position that that Bill got to?—I moved the second reading, and it was opposed by the Lord Chancellor, and there was an end of it. As a matter of fact, the Lord Chancellor, who was extremely indignant with the Bill and said it was a scandalous Bill to be presented to the notice of a Christian assembly, moved a very unusual motion, which your Lordship will find in Hansard, that the Bill be rejected for which he said there had been no precedent for a hundred years, or something of the kind.

42,347. That was in 1902?—That was in 1902. The second reading was on the 1st May 1902.

42,348. Then you introduced a Bill in 1903?—And I should like to put in the speech I made on the second reading.

42,349. I think we can look at it if necessary. It would be rather encumbering the notes. We are getting your views now?—Oh yes; I only meant for the Commission to look at.

42,350. Then in 1903 you introduced a Bill?—Then in 1903 I brought in a Bill which was practically a one-clause Bill. Oh, no! the 1903 one gives two additional grounds to the present grounds, the ground of cruelty, and the ground of three years' desertion, or, as I have phrased it, "three years living apart"; because, as your Lordship knows, there is sometimes a technical difficulty now as to whether living apart is desertion if it begins voluntarily.

42,351. Yes, but it is by either party?—By either party.

42,352. Is that the substantial distinction between that Bill and the old one?—Yes. The limitation of the grounds and the limitation of the miscellaneous provisions in the other Bill as to legitimation.

42,353. What was the history of that Bill?—That Bill was also unanimously rejected, Lord Halsbury being still Lord Chancellor, and again making a speech against it; and again, I may say, there was no discussion. In neither case was there any discussion.

42,354. Then the next is July 1905?—That is the one which I had in my mind when I said a one-clause Bill. This Bill provides—and it is the only operative clause—for the insertion of certain words in the Matrimonial Causes Act; for inserting after the words "his wife has since the celebration thereof been guilty of adultery," these words "'or of desertion with- "'out cause for two years and upwards,' and as if for "the words 'adultery coupled with desertion without "reasonable excuse for two years and upwards,' there "were substituted the words 'desertion without cause "for two years and upwards.'"

42,355. Does that mean in both cases, the husband and the wife, the grounds of divorce would be adultery, and also a ground for divorce, desertion for the period mentioned?—Yes, it would be leaving the law as it stands, but adding to it desertion for two years as a ground for divorce.

42,356. On either side?—Yes.

42,357. What was the history of that Bill?—I think there were three voted for it.

42,358. That is very much the same Bill that Dr. Hunter introduced at an earlier period?—Into the Commons.

42,359. Yes; I no not know whether you have seen that Bill?—No, I do not think I have.

42,360. And that Bill was rejected?—Yes, that was also rejected.

* It has been decided that as these Bills have been printed it is unnecessary to re-print them in the Appendix. Their reference numbers are: Divorce Bill, 1902 [H.L. 43]; Divorce Bill, 1903 [H.L. 65]; Matrimonial Causes Act, 1905 [H.L. 151]; Matrimonial Causes Act, 1908 [H.L. 108].—H. G. B.

42,361. Then you have one of June 1908?—Then in June 1908 I introduced the same Bill as the 1905 Bill.

42,362. The one-clause Bill?—Yes, and on that occasion a Liberal Government was in power, and Lord Loreburn was Chancellor, and he made a speech against it in which he said the practical effect would be to give divorce by consent, and he recommended that the House should vote against it, and be careful how they changed the marriage laws; and the Government whips were put on and it was rejected.

42,363. The effect of that was to put it on a par almost with the Scotch law?—Yes, that was the object I had in view.

42,364. Does that finish the Bills you are responsible for?—Yes.

42,365. Then you say "In December 1902, I founded the Society for Promoting Reforms in the Marriage and Divorce Laws of England." You have some pamphlet with regard to that?—Yes. Perhaps it would be well if I were to read the objects.

42,366. Yes?—"Extensions of Divorce.—(1) Legal divorce to be granted as is now done in Scotland when the home is destroyed by desertion for three years or upwards.

(2) "Legal divorce to be granted where the home is destroyed by permanent lunacy or long sentences of imprisonment.

"Justice to Women.

"(3) Women to have the same rights and to be enabled to claim the same remedies in the Divorce Court as men.

"(4) Mothers who have been divorced to have their claims for access to their children of tender years considered on their merits in each case.

"Local and Inexpensive Tribunals.

(5) "Jurisdiction in divorce to be given to the County Court, so that persons of moderate means may have local and inexpensive tribunals."

Then there were two other objects that I need not trouble the Commission with. One was on the survival of ecclesiastical procedure in the Divorce Court; and the other is legitimation by subsequent marriage.

42,367. And that society did proceed until——?—That society had a good many members, and it held two or three public meetings, or more than that, I think; and it had a good many members who, while they were willing to subscribe and were interested, did not care to have their names published; we never published a list of subscribers. Then in 1906 it was suggested that another society should be formed called the Divorce Law Reform Union, which I think is going to give evidence before your Lordship to-morrow.

42,368. We have had one witness?—Yes. Mr. Haynes, who was a very active and intelligent gentleman who took an interest in the matter, thought it better to start another society and proceed on a more moderate basis. I concurred in that view, and I turned over to that society all the funds we had in hand, and the literature, and vast masses of correspondence from distressed people all over the country.

42,369. You say here that "This work was taken up and continued in a half-hearted way by the Divorce Law Reform Union in 1906, who only pressed for the appointment of a Royal Commission." Are you right in saying that?—I think I am right in saying that is all its active propaganda went for. I think the witness you have had said that was all they were pressing for.

42,370. Then there is some reference to papers and books which I do not think we need trouble about. I will then ask you as to a matter which arises in the next page of my copy, with regard to a demand for divorce reform amongst the public. What experience have you had in connection with that?—Well, I have addressed, apart from the assemblies of this society for promoting reform, which held, I think, some three or four general meetings which were moderately attended—I have also addressed assemblies at other times; people who had regular weekly meetings of a society, or something of the kind, on the subject; and there I found that the general tenour of the reforms I advocated were received without opposition.

42,371. What are these meetings you refer to in this passage: "Nevertheless I have been present at at least a dozen crowded meetings where a strong and almost unanimous feeling has been expressed in favour of extending the facilities for divorce"?—That would include three or four general meetings of this society, and some six to ten different places I have lectured at in different parts of the country. I have given lectures where there have been large attendances.

42,372. What do you call large meetings?—Well, meetings up to a thousand people.

42,373. Have they been generally, as far as you could gather, in favour of the extension of facilities? Were there any resolutions passed?—No; no resolution was put. What I am going by is partly the way my observations were received, and partly by the fact that discussion and questions were invited after, and there has never been any opposition.

42,374. Meetings of men and women, or only of men?—Both. All the meetings I spoke at were meetings where both men and women attended.

42,375. Now you have, further, some observations about amending procedure in the Divorce Court?—Well, I do not know; I do not myself know of any particularly good reason why the pleadings in the Divorce Court should be sworn to as differing from pleadings anywhere else. The man has to prove his case afterwards when it comes into court, and I do not think much is gained.

42,376. May I suggest one reason. It is an extremely serious charge to make, and it may have been thought advisable nobody should make it without being prepared to swear it is true—like an information?—But I think I am right in saying the petitioner may have to swear to its truth when the evidence is entirely that of other people.

42,377. He has to swear that certain facts are true to his knowledge, and that the remaining facts are true to the best of his information and belief?—Yes.

42,378. And I know that some practitioners have thought that that is not even enough, because such hardships are imposed on persons who have to answer actions that may be utterly unfounded, and if there was no preliminary affidavit about it it would leave it open to anybody to make a charge and cause a great deal of pain?—Well, I entirely agree that it is a charge that should not be lightly launched in any sense of the word; and if those more familiar with what goes on (I am not familiar with the practice of that branch) think it deters persons from launching charges, then I think I would leave it.

42,379. But I know it has been suggested that there should be some preliminary form of enquiry even?—Yes.

42,380. Then you put the point that the person accused of adultery should have notice of proceedings?—Yes.

42,381. At present where the husband is charged, the woman with whom he is accused is not obliged to be notified?—Yes, that is so.

42,382. That I think we are fully alive to. Then with regard to the question of publication?—On the question of publication I feel very strongly the only thing that should be published is the result of the trial with the names of the parties. It is said that publicity is a deterrent to the person who is thinking of committing adultery. My Lord, I think that is open to a good deal of doubt. I do not suppose a man who is going to commit adultery stops at that moment to consider whether he will be found out and come into the Divorce Court and have his name in the newspapers; and I think as a deterrent it is over-rated. Then, it is a "great hardship for a man or a woman that all the details of an unsuccessful charge of adultery should be published. Even though acquitted the damage done is irremediable. There is a growing tendency on the part of newspapers to treat the Divorce Court as the fountain-head of sensational news." In addition to that there are private letters of a very intimate character constantly published which ought not to be of any interest to the general public, and which I think it is rather shocking to have published and discussed in the newspapers.

42,383. Then you state your conclusion?—My Lord, might I just for one moment first speak of this question of publication?

42,384. Certainly?—I have here a "Daily News" of the — October or November, I think it is the — October, which gives in one column some evidence given before you as to the advantage of publicity by journalists who are in favour of publicity. In the very next column there is a suit of divorce presented by ——, and there are letters published here dealing with a woman who was accused, and the name is mentioned, and all these things are brought out, matters that cannot be of any real interest to the public, piteous letters from the husband to the wife, and so on, which are only put in really for the sake of sensation; and I think everyone must notice, too, that the evening papers in particular, and many of the papers, have got into the habit of regarding it as almost essential to publish some little thing from the Divorce Court every day; and it is frequently on the placard: "Barmaid's Divorce," "A London Woman's Divorce," or "Baroness's Divorce," or something of the kind. All that seems pandering to the taste for the purely sensational and undesirable, and if something could be done to stop it without doing more harm than the publicity does, I think it would be very desirable.

42,385. Then you give your conclusion?—"To sum up I am of opinion that the present laws are bad for the reasons above stated. In considering legislation I refuse to have regard to the religious views of particular sects. I admit marriage to be a contract which affects not only the two parties to it, but the community, and I consider that the community is bound to have regard to the moral tendency of the marriage and divorce law and to the interests of the children. The sanctity of marriage and the sanctity of the home (both of which are expressions frequently used in this connection) I regard as having no particular meaning in the case of adulterous homes or establishments where husband and wife have long been separated. I suggest, therefore, that the test that should be applied is whether any of the attributes of marriage are still in existence between husband and wife. Where the spouses have been separated for a term of years, where the children, if any, have already made their home with one or the other, and where no element of the marriage tie remains except some financial relations and the legal bond, there I suggest the law should step in, and, recognising the existing state of things, should sever the legal bond and leave the parties free to create new homes. In this connection it is worth while remembering that since the decision of Jackson v. Jackson the wife may leave her husband at the church door, and unless one or other of the parties takes advantage of the privileges which the law reserves for adulterers they will both remain compulsory celibates for the rest of their lives. I still think that the only ideal state of the law would be that set out in the Bill I presented to the House of Lords in 1902." But as we always proceed piecemeal in this country (and it may be advantageous to do so, perhaps) I venture to submit this Commission might recommend, if they think the evidence makes it desirable, four advances which are all of very great importance:—

"(a) Equality of the sexes.

"(b) Insanity a ground of separation.

"(c) All judicial separation to be capable of being turned into divorce à vinculo on the motion of either party at the expiration of two years.

"(d) County court jurisdiction."

42,386. Might I ask you one question about equality. "Equality" there used is rather a wide term; because how would you deal with the question of costs, which you probably know about? If you put men and women on absolute equality a woman would get no security for her costs; whereas, although changes are taking place, and women working, as a matter of general practice the woman is the person that looks after the house, and the man is the person that earns the money?—I think there is no objection to the present practice of giving the wife security for costs.

42,387. May I suggest you mean equality of sexes with regard to grounds of divorce?—Yes, that is what I meant; but at the same time I think it is sometimes unfair, giving one litigant the opportunity of litigating at the expense of another. I have had experience of it myself; and the wife having no ground for proceeding is able to litigate at the expense of the husband.

42,388. Does not that involve only that there should be more inquiry before allowing the order for security to go?—I think that might be met by some inquiry of that sort, though I do not see how the court is to arrive at a result without trying the issues if a number of allegations are made.

42,389. Well, you cannot do that?—It is very difficult to do. The important advance is the advance that a judicial separation could be turned into a divorce à vinculo at the end of two years. I am strongly of opinion that persons who have legislated have satisfied their consciences too readily by saying "You have judicial separation" without realising how harmful it is to public morals. Having left the grounds of judicial separation as now, but including insanity, I give an opportunity, at the end of two years, of turning it into a divorce à vinculo; you would meet those cases, and it cannot be said, when persons have lived apart and then had a decree, and still lived apart for two years, that you are breaking up a home.

42,390. That in cases of desertion would be four years?—Yes.

42,391. Because they get judicial separation for two years now?—Yes.

42,392. And after that you would allow another two, and then get a divorce?—Yes.

42,393. With regard to the conflict of laws, I do not think we need enter into that. With regard to the Appendix, you refer to some original letters. You do not indicate what those deal with?—I thought I sent them in.

49,394. Might I suggest, if you state the points they indicate, it would be far better?—I think your Lordship will find the majority that are important in the speech I made in 1902. They are from people who say they are in one position or another of hardship owing to the present law. Some are women who have been deserted by their husbands who have gone abroad, and found themselves practically, so they say, left to starve, or form an irregular alliance with another man; and there are other cases of long periods of insanity.

42,395. I think you may take it we have had such masses of those letters that probably what you have are only samples of those?—Yes, I think your Lordship would have them; and perhaps Mr. Haynes will put in some more to-morrow.

42,396. How many have you had?—Well, I have not counted them; but speaking quite roughly from memory, I should say it would be of the order of two or three hundred.

42,397. Then what is the "Table of some previous Discussions"; because I do not want merely to encumber the notes with matters that we have already discussed?—I think that, my Lord, refers to the various discussions that have taken place, from the Reformatio Legum downwards. I do not know whether your Lordship would allow me to call attention to some of those extracts if they are not before the Commission.

42,398. Would you let me see them first—we have had such an enormous number of these?—Perhaps I might indicate the places where they are, that the Commission may refer to them.

42,399. Well, if you just like to state the reference to them anybody can look at them, but I do not think it is worth having them printed as part of the Appendix. None of these would have anything like the evidence we have had?—No, my Lord, I feel that.

42,400. If you would indicate where they are to be found?—There is, I think, a mention in my proof, "The Question of English Divorce," published by Grant Richards.

42,401. Published anonymously?—Yes, my Lord. Then in the "Law Quarterly Review" of 1889 there is an article by Howard W. Elphinstone called "Notes on the English Law of Marriage." In the "Law Quarterly Review," January 1892, there is an article by Professor Dicey. In the "Law Quarterly Review," 1885, there is an article on "Offences against Marriage and the Relations of the Sexes," by H. A. D. Philips. In the "Law Quarterly Review" of 1885 there is an article on "The New French Divorce Act," by Thomas Barclay.

(Chairman.) I think that is all I need trouble you about, Lord Russell.

42,402. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) You would give no damages against a co-respondent, I understand?—I think it is rather a barbarous custom.

42,403. Then you leave the co-respondent without any punishment. Do you think that is desirable?—I do not know that you leave him without any punishment. He has the social exposure. I think it is more desirable than letting people think a wealthy co-respondent can buy another man's wife, which is what it comes to now.

42,404. It has been suggested that the court should have power, if the co-respondent has property, to make him make a settlement on the wife whom he has seduced?—Yes, I think that might be reasonable. It is damages to the husband which I think is so shocking.

42,405. (Mr. Burt.) Just one point, Lord Russell. You recognise that the expense of divorce makes an appeal to the Divorce Court practically prohibitive as far as the poor are concerned?—Yes.

42,406. And you suggest as an improvement giving the county court jurisdiction in cases of that kind?—Yes.

42,407. That, I suppose, is with the object of diminishing the cost of travel of the parties and the witnesses?—Yes, and also that the county court is a court that already exists in every locality with its machinery available.

42,408. It has been suggested to us by persons opposed to giving the county court jurisdiction that the case might be met by giving the assize court power to deal with divorce cases. What is your opinion with regard to that as an alternative to the county court?—I do not think it is a good alternative. It would certainly, I think, cost more; and I think the idea that underlies that suggestion is the same sort of notion that existed when the Divorce Act was passed in 1857, namely, that divorce is something so exceptional that you want some peculiar tribunal to deal with it. In the 1857 Act as it first passed not less than three High Court judges were required to pronounce divorce; and it is a survival of that sort of idea, that it is to be treated quite differently from any other legal contract.

42,409. (Chairman.) But very soon after it was reduced to one judge?—I think it was felt to be an absurdity, and I think it is equally absurd to suggest that a county court judge cannot try all these divorce questions. They are not difficult questions to decide from the point of view of law.

42,410. (Mr. Burt.) It is suggested by giving the jurisdiction to the county court you give it to a less qualified court than the High Court. Do you think there is anything in that?—Not at all unqualified, I think, to deal with the matter. There is this to be said about it, that you may get slightly differing practice in different courts, which you would not get in a court where there are only two judges in constant communication with each other, and who settle the practice. But I think the advantage of bringing divorce within the reach of the poor is that they may be able to avail themselves of it rather than make irregular unions as they do now, on account of the expense. I think the present expense drives them to irregular unions, which should be avoided if it can be done reasonably.

42,411. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You would make insanity, Lord Russell, a ground for separation?—Yes.

42,412. How would that act in cases of insanity that rapidly recover?—I think it is one year here. I think perhaps you ought to have a longer period than that. I have read the evidence given here by some doctors to the effect that it would be an additional hardship to the insane patient to know he might be divorced, or that proceedings might be taken which would end in a divorce. I think I should say that the interest of the sane person who has to live his life in the world ought to be considered also. After all, you do not compel anybody to obtain a divorce. If the desire is there to get rid of the husband or wife, as the case may be, who is insane, I do not know that very much is gained by compelling the person to remain legally bound to the other.

42,413. You are speaking of separation, not divorce?—But by the next paragraph you will see the separation should be made a divorce in two years.

42,414. But surely the insane spouse is as completely separated from the other as one can imagine?—Yes, if they are certified and in an asylum.

42,415. And if such separation were obtained it would automatically become a divorce in two years?—If either party desired it.

42,416. And you think separation might be made on insanity of twelve months' duration?—I think that might be extended.

42,417. Did you have medical advice in drafting that clause?—No.

42,418. That is your own conception?—Yes.

42,419. (Chairman.) Your separation is granted for insanity, and you say in the next sentence you would bring it into the line of divorce after a further period?—Yes, that is it, my Lord. The idea on paragraph C was that the present causes of judicial separation should give rise to divorce after two years, and that would still leave the question of insanity untouched; it was necessary to bring it in, and therefore I made it a cause for separation.

42,420. You would make it a cause for separation after a certain time?—Yes.

42,421. And at the end of that time give power to apply?—Yes.

42,422. That is to say if the insanity still exists?—Yes. If I may say so, I think the question of divorce is very intimately bound up with the question of marriage. I think if you had more careful marriages you might get fewer divorces; I think also there is the eugenic point to be considered. I have had a good deal of experience of asylums; I have been on the committee of several asylums for a good many years, and one knows cases of where husbands and wives are not permanently insane, but go out again and then have more children. I think that is very undesirable.

(Chairman.) Thank you for your evidence, Lord Russell.

Mr. ARTHUR WARREN SAMUELS, K.C., called and examined.

42,423. (Chairman.) You are one of His Majesty's counsel in Ireland?—Yes.

42,424. And a bencher of the Honourable Society of King's Inns?—Yes.

42,425. And a member of the English Bar as well?—Yes. Perhaps I should mention I was requested by the Bar of Ireland to give evidence, but not on behalf of the Council of the Bar.

42,426. No, I believe the Secretary of the Commission communicated with the authorities with the view of getting somebody sent from Ireland—a member of the Bar—and you have been selected?—Yes.

42,427. But you come really individually?—Certainly, my Lord. It is to be understood that the Council of the Bar have not considered the matter in any way. There are of course very varying views upon this subject.

42,428. You have had very considerable experience in matrimonial cases in Ireland, and in proceedings for parliamentary divorce instituted by persons resident in Ireland?—Yes, I have.

42,429. I may take it shortly. The old matrimonial ecclesiastical law remains still in Ireland?—Yes.

42,430. And the procedure is regulated by the Acts of 1870 and 1871?—Yes, as modified by the Judicature Acts; and the Probate and Matrimonial Division is now part of the King's Bench Division. We have not got a separate division now in Ireland.

42,431. No, since the Act of 1870?—1897.

42,432. Well, the effect of it is that the High Court in Ireland administers the old ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Matrimonial Courts?—Yes, my Lord, and it has this effect that any judge of the King's Bench is able to take a matrimonial case and try it.

42,433. But there has been no extension of the law?—There has been no extension of jurisdiction whatever.

42,434. You say, however, that, "The procedure of the tribunal has been to a considerable extent simplified and cheapened; but except in a few matters of practice the powers in matrimonial causes of the High Court of Justice are as limited as ever were those of the old Consistorial Court"?—Yes, that is in the matter of pleadings. The old libels have been done away with, and we have powers of discovery and so on.

42,435. And you say, "The Matrimonial Causes Act of 1870 provides, section 13 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 110), that in all suits and proceedings the court shall proceed and give relief on principles and rules which shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts of Ireland had given relief"?—Yes.

42,436. That relates "to suits for divorce a mensa et thoro, nullity of marriage, restitution of conjugal rights and jactitation of marriage"?—Yes, my Lord.

42,437. That leaves it that there is no conferring upon the courts in Ireland of such powers as are exercised by the Divorce Court in England?—No, my Lord, there is no power of dissolution whatsoever. Of course nullity of marriage is quite a different thing.

43,438. Just to complete that and to make it plain: the old practice that prevailed in England still prevails in Ireland of leaving the parties if they choose to apply for an Act of Parliament?—Yes, my Lord.

43,439. And the practice, I believe, with regard to that is similar to what it was in English cases prior to 1857?—Yes, my Lord.

42,440. There must be a suit in the court in Ireland. If it is a case for crim. con., there must be a crim. con. action, and lastly, a statutory decree obtained by a Bill passing through both Houses?—Exactly, my Lord.

42,441. Have you at the moment anything before you which will show the total number of Bills that have gone through the Houses latterly?—No, my Lord, I have not. I have not got the total number of Bills.

42,442. I think there was a return moved for by Lord Russell which shows the number of Bills?—I think Mr. Roberts can deal with that.

42,443. Well, then, I will leave it till Mr. Roberts comes. Now what do you say about any desire there may be in Ireland for any extension of the courts' power?—Speaking generally, I may say there is no desire whatsoever; in fact they would very strongly resist it. I say here in my note that "the whole body of the Roman Catholic clergy would oppose it very strongly and the vast majority of the Protestant clergy of all denominations in Ireland. Nor can there be said to prevail any desire on the part of the laity of any denomination to have such an Act passed for Ireland." I was recently in Belfast, and I took the opportunity of speaking to some of the leading members of the Presbyterian body there, and I was assured by them, and I have no doubt whatever that what they state is correct, that there is no desire whatever for anything in the nature of dissolution of marriage to be granted as you have it in England.

42,444. Why I want to get those figures that Mr. Roberts will give us is this; there are a certain number of cases that go through the courts, and ultimately come to an Act of Parliament?—Yes.

42,445. Have you any idea yourself what the cost of such proceedings is?—I have to a certain extent. An undefended case would cost something between 500*l.* and 600*l.*; that is the parliamentary procedure alone. Of that at least, you may say, 120*l.* will be House fees. I will give the details afterwards.

42,446. Can you tell us in addition the cost of carrying it through the court below?—That will depend on the amount of evidence, of course, and where you will have to bring your witnesses from. An undefended case would be got through for something like 50*l.* even with, say, five or six witnesses.

42,447. And the crim. con. action?—Well, the crim. con. action is very often undefended, but if it is a defended case it may run to anything. It is quite impossible to lay down a general figure.

42,448. What I wanted to get at was this with regard to Ireland. If there are any number of cases where people with sufficient wealth will incur those costs, and have carried through Bills in the Houses, does it not follow that there must be a large number, or a larger number, of persons in the country who, if they had the means, would take the same course?—I think there probably are. I have known instances myself, I have been frequently consulted in these cases, where people would have proceeded to the Lords and Commons and got a divorce if they had the means.

42,449. You have been consulted yourself?—Oh, yes; but the number is not large. There is a prevailing idea in Ireland of the sanctity of marriage amongst people of all denominations.

42,450. I quite appreciate that, but what view is taken of those persons who are prevented by reason of the cost?—Well I know a lady belonging to one of the best families in Ireland; the family met with disaster and became very poor, and she waited 20 years before she got a divorce. She went as a hospital nurse and accumulated funds and carried the case through; that was a case of great hardship. Then I knew a case of a master mariner who was involved in heavy expenses. The wife began to lead a very terrible life, and he determined to get rid of her, and it cost him 700*l.*; a very serious matter to him.

42,451. Do you mean the lady you speak of saved it up?—Yes. Her family were very largely hit by the land agitation, but they helped her as far as they could. However, it took her nearly 20 years.

42,452. But leaving aside some general matters, there is the machinery by which if you have money enough you can get rid of the guilty spouse?—Yes.

42,453. Although you are an Irish person?—Yes.

42,454. Why is it right that that should remain only the privilege of those who can afford that heavy cost, when there must be others who cannot?—I do not say it is right, but you would have a great difficulty in getting rid of it. I know it would raise a storm in Ireland if you introduced a Bill to dissolve marriage. As I point out in my memorandum, certain exceptional matters could be got over by introducing your practice as to judicial separation into Ireland, and making the man a co-respondent.

42,455. But out of those who object you must except those who are deprived for want of means?—Yes; well, you have to put up with that hardship. I think the House fees should be entirely abolished, or reduced very much.

42,456. You think they should be reduced?—Yes; you pay 1*l.* for each witness that is sworn; or I think it is 2*l.* it comes to, in the Standing Orders. The House of Lords' fees amount to about 75*l.* and the Commons to about 35*l.*

42,457. You say here: "They," that is the costs, "could be greatly reduced if certain reforms in Irish procedure were introduced, and individual hardship would be thus greatly mitigated." I suppose you include in the Irish procedure reduction of fees and so on in the House of Lords?—No, I am dealing entirely with matters before we get to the House of Lords. Under the Irish procedure you cannot make the adulterer a co-respondent. Then you have to take a crim. con. action if you are the husband before you can proceed for your divorce Act. That is a second procedure.

42,458. You mean you would join him in the first?—I would join him in the first, as you would here in a judicial separation, and you could get your damages against him then and costs. Now, in our proceedure at present in Ireland you institute your proceedings, but you cannot bring in the adulterer. You have to pay all costs if you are the husband unless the wife has separate property (it is the same costs procedure as you have here), and the result is, as soon as you have your divorce from your wife, you then have to proceed, if you can, against the adulterer in a crim. con. case, a very expensive suit very often, and it involves a second trial in Nisi Prius and all that that costs.

42,459. What would be your object in reducing those expenses?—Well, I think it is a very great hardship on a litigant to have to bring two sets of proceedings when it could all be done in one action.

42,460. That is with a view of getting on to the Houses of Parliament after?—Yes, if he is the person who wishes to dissolve his marriage.

42,461. If the object of reducing it, and possibly reducing expenses in the House of Lords, is in order to bring the matter more home to people, it is to mitigate the hardship that must be felt?—Yes.

42,462. And that is really recognising the right of divorce?—It is. You may take it members of the Roman Catholic Church will hardly ever proceed; they have their religious objections.

42,463. Yes we know that, although the returns show they do in some cases?—Yes; well, it is very very rare. But take the other case. As I told your Lordship, there is not, as far as I know (and I have enquired very widely from people who ought to know a good deal about it), there is not in Ireland a general desire; there are individual cases in which people do wish to go to the House of Lords for divorce, and one has to deal with this matter looking at it from the Irish point of view; not so much as a case of individual hardship as what is wanted by the people.

42,464. But the difficulty I feel about the position is that the individual hardship is mitigated when there is money, but it is not mitigated where there is not enough money?—Certainly 42,465. That seems to me, with deference to the views you put, a very unsatisfactory position?—I am afraid it is the same with all litigation. There is a great deal of litigation, we all know, that cannot be promoted for want of means.

42,466. Then, passing on, you say: "Leaving, however, dissolution of marriage——"?—"Leaving, however, dissolution of marriage aside, I shall endeavour to point out briefly some powers that might with great advantage, and especially to poorer litigants, be conferred upon the Irish court. These powers are (1) To make the adulturer co-respondent in adultery suits. (2) To provide for the maintenance and custody of the children of the marriage. (3) To rectify marriage settlements. (4) To modify the relief decreed in suits for restitution of conjugal rights. (5) To grant relief in cases of desertion.

"I.—Adulterer Co-respondent.

"In a suit for divorce a mensa et thoro on the ground of adultery in Ireland the only parties are the two spouses. Supposing it to be well founded, it results in a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro, which is a sentence separating the husband and wife from cohabitation, and placing the wife in the position of a feme sole (see Married Woman's Property (Ireland) Act, 1865, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 43) in respect of property. Neither party can marry again during the lifetime of the other. A husband bringing a suit in Ireland for divorce a mensa et thoro from his wife on the ground of her adultery has no power to make the adulterer a party to that cause. He can (unless his wife has adequate separate estate) be made to pay all the costs of his wife before the cause comes to a hearing, but in this cause he can recover no damages and no costs against the man who has ruined his home. At the common law side of the court he can, indeed, if he is willing twice to submit to the prurient curiosity of the public the story of his domestic troubles, bring an action and recover damages measured by the worth of the wife he has lost, but in this action the wife is not a party. He can obtain no relief in the way of divorce; and he has thus to have recourse to two tribunals to obtain a full remedy for his wrong. If it is his intention to proceed for parliamentary divorce, he must under the Standing Orders of the Houses of Lords and Commons show that a crim. con. action has been brought or give satisfactory reason for not having brought it and obtained judgment (H.L. S.O. No. 177; H.C., S.O. No. 190). A petition for judicial separation in England corresponds to a petition for divorce a mensa et thoro in Ireland, and the court in such causes acts like the Irish court on the principles of the ecclesiastical courts (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, section 22), but in England, in such a petition, as well as in a petition for dissolution of marriage a husband may claim damages from any person on the ground of his having committed adultery with his wife. The adulterer can be made to pay all the costs, and after the verdict has been given in the cause the court has power to direct in what manner the damages are to be applied, and to order in a proper case that the whole or part of them shall be settled for the benefit of the children of the marriage, or as a provision for the maintenance of the wife. (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, sections 33, 34, 35). There is no such power vested in any Irish court. In a divorce suit in Ireland the adulterer is never made a party. Damages are never recovered. If the wife is guilty no provision is made for her by way of alimony paid by the husband. If an action of criminal conversation is brought and damages are recovered, these damages are paid to the husband, they are not secured for the benefit of the wife or her children. The adulterer can throw aside the wife he has seduced from the shelter of her home, and contribute nothing to her maintenance. The husband cannot be compelled in any way to support her. The absence of any power to make an alleged adulterer a party to a matrimonial cause is also frequently a very great hardship upon a person unjustly accused of adultery."—I have known of several instances of this, my Lord.—"Such a person has no power of intervening in the proceedings. Cases occur where serious social and professional injury may be done to innocent persons by being named in a petition as guilty of adultery with the respondent. The proceedings may be settled between husband and wife, but the charge against the third parties is never disposed of and no opportunity of explanation or exculpation is given. If the cause proceeds to a hearing the persons so charged have no right to take part in it. They can neither examine or cross-examine witnesses, and the only position they can take up is the futile one of sending a watching brief to counsel who cannot intervene on their behalf. It would be most desirable to compel the petitioner to make parties charged with adultery parties to the cause and to have them served with the petition and permitted to appear and defend their interests." I do not think you in England make an adulteress a party, but there is a right to intervene?

42,467. No; we have often had that point brought before us?—"The necessity of bringing an action for crim. con. would thus be got rid of. The guilty party could be made to pay costs and damages and proceedings would be simplified and cheapened, and a multiplication of suits avoided, and persons unjustly aspersed could defend their reputations." With regard to the custody and maintenance of children, I do not know that I need read that.

42,468. May I take it there is no power to deal with custody and maintenance of children?—No; we must either make the children wards of court, or proceed under the Act of 1886 in the Chancery Division.

42,469. Then in matrimonial proceedings there is no power to deal with the custody or maintenance of children?—No.

42,470. And that ought to be dealt with?—Yes; and it is a matter of great grievance with a number of persons.

42,471. That is dealt with in a long paragraph?—Yes, my Lord.

42,472. Then may we pass to restitution of conjugal rights?—Yes, with regard to restitution of conjugal rights, of course that jurisdiction is one that is quite altered here now by a recent Act.

42,473. Have you the old procedure?—Yes, and your Lordship is aware we cannot serve a petition out of the jurisdiction. That is decided in Manning v. Manning because the remedy is attachment.

42,474. Is attachment still permitted?—Attachment is the only remedy for enforcing a decree for restitution of conjugal rights.

42,475. Is that actually done now?—It is.

42,476. And how long is it maintained?—I cannot tell you. I do not know of a case in which it has actually been resorted to, because these things are generally settled afterwards.

42,477. Is there no power to make an order for money?—No, there is no power to make an order for money; and the result is when you proceed or threaten proceedings you generally get a settlement between the parties. My experience in Ireland is that most of these things are arranged if you have sensible solicitors and counsel on both sides, as you generally have; and you can stop it before it comes into court at all.

42,478. On that point it remains in much the same position as it was in the old days in England?—Yes, my Lord. I think we ought to have your recent Act introduced here, by which a money settlement could be made.

42,479. Do you mean the Act of 1884?—Yes. I do not see that it would offend against public opinion in any way. Then with regard to desertion; that is a very serious matter, there is no remedy for desertion in the court in Ireland.

42,480. Not even as there is here with regard to judicial separation in the 1857 Act?—No.

42,481. It is supposed to be remedied by a restitution matter?—Yes.

42,482. But that does not work satisfactorily?—Certainly not. I think we ought to have two years and upwards as a ground for separation, as you have it here.

42,483. Of course, if you go to the House of Lords desertion will be applied by way of nullity?—Yes, for the relief of the lady, if the lady proceeds in the Bill.

42,484. Then you refer to the Married Women's Property Act, 1865, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 43. That is similar to what we have with regard to protecting the wife's property?—Yes. The procedure under that is very rare. I was asking Mr. Swift, a most experienced Dublin magistrate, a few days ago, and he says under that Act he only has a case about once a year. Then we have the Vagrancy Act of 1847, "11 & 12 Vict. c. 84, section 2, a person deserting or wilfully neglecting to maintain his wife or child so that she becomes destitute and has to be relieved out of the workhouse can be sent to gaol for a period not exceeding three months." That is the procedure by the guardians to the poor.

42,485. Now you have another statute?—Yes, the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act of 1895. That is your English Act, and does not apply to Ireland. Under the Act, when there is violence or cruelty, as your Lordship knows, they can get what practically amounts to a separation. We have not that in Ireland, but indirectly we work it in this way in Ireland. We have the desertion clause of the Act——

42,486. Might I say desertion under the Acts of 1849 and 1850 Victoria?—Yes.

42,487. According to your note, you say, "But the statute 49 & 50 Vict. c. 52, Married Women (Maintenance in case of Desertion) Act, 1886"—that is in force now?—Yes, that is in force; but really the procedure is carried out through "58 & 59 Vict. c. 39, Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, although that Act does not apply to Ireland. The statute 49 & 50 Vict. c. 52, Married Women (Maintenance in case of Desertion) Act, 1886, is not repealed as regards Ireland (see schedule), and still remains in force in Ireland." It is not repealed in the 58 & 59 Vict. c. 39. "Under this Act, a woman who has been deserted may summon her husband before the justices of the peace, and if the justices are satisfied that the husband is able to maintain his wife or wife and family, and has wilfully refused to do so, or has deserted her, they can make an order that he shall pay a weekly sum not exceeding 2*l.* to his wife. Adultery by the wife is a defence to any such application."

42,488. Then the Act of 1866, which governed England until 1895, is still applicable in Ireland?—Yes, in the case of desertion.

42,489. How do you deal with cases of wife-beating or cruelty?—Well, if the wife leaves the house in the case of wife-beating, the magistrates hold that she is deserted. If she is compelled to leave the house, if he has made her residence in the house impossible, they look upon it as desertion.

42,490. Then all they can do is to give a payment of money?—Yes.

42,491. They cannot protect her?—No, except by binding the husband over to keep the peace.

42,492. That is under the criminal power?—Under the criminal jurisdiction which the magistrates possess; and if she is driven from the house by violence it is deemed desertion. But that is defective, and it is a matter of importance to the poor, of course. In Ireland we have not got what is called here an affiliation order, and we have there under the Married Women's Maintenance (In Case of Desertion) Act of 1886 to go in for a very roundabout process. What is done is this. Though the English Bastardy Act of 1872 does not apply to Ireland, yet the Act of 1886, the Maintenance in Case of Desertion Act, says the decree for it is to be enforced in the same way as an affiliation order. Therefore the magistrates in Ireland have adopted the affiliation procedure of England. That leads to great delay. In the first place, the woman, if she is deserted, has nothing to live on. She has to take out a summons before the stipendiary or justices, as the case may be, and she gets an order in the first instance that he is to pay her a weekly sum. That takes a week to start the process. If he does not pay then the first time she can appear again is four weeks after; that is under the Bastardy Act of 1872; a month has to elapse before she can come up again. Therefore, she may have been starving for five weeks; and before you can enforce the order it will take another week; so you may say she has nothing whatever to support her for six weeks. There seems to be no reason why that sort of thing should not be at once remedied, and that the order should not be made on the first summons to pay; and if he does not pay then, to bring it up the first week. I have spoken to Mr. Swift and one of the other stipendiary magistrates in Dublin, and he said he thought it would be very desirable to have that amended. I took from the police at Dublin the following statistics showing the number of applications. In 1905 there were 65 applications and 51 orders made.

42,493. For what?—For maintenance in case of desertion under that second Act, adopting the procedure I mentioned to your Lordship. In 1906 there were 92 applications and 72 orders made. In 1907 there were 100 applications and 82 orders made. In 1908, 109 applications and 89 orders made. In 1909 there were 163 applications and 80 orders made. Apparently the number of applications and orders are increasing, but I think that is probably on account of want of employment in the last few years.

42,494. In all these desertion cases there is no remedy except an order for payment of money?—No.

42,495. There is no order for separation?—No, no order for separation at all. The people are separate, practically.

42,496. Is that Dublin alone?—That is for Dublin alone.

42,497. Have you got any figures which would show us the number of desertion orders made in the whole country?—No. I have not.

42,498. Are they published?—I have not been able to ascertain. I should think in Belfast there would probably be more, but you would have to get evidence from some of the resident magistrates in Belfast with regard to it.

42,499. Is desertion, according to your experience, desertion in the country or through the man's leaving the country?—Well, I spoke to the Dublin magistrates about this; they told me that on the whole these orders are effective, but of course it results frequently in the man going off from Dublin to Belfast or some other part of the country; and if so, it has been recently decided in the King's Bench that the warrants can be backed from Dublin and enforced in Belfast; that you may pursue him to wherever he may go. But that is an expensive process; the poor woman has to pay the expense of serving the process, and it will have to be proved to have been duly served; and it would cost a good deal of money for a woman who is starving.

42,500. Do you know if any of these desertion cases are cases where the person deserting goes abroad?—He does go abroad occasionally.

42,501. If he has gone there is no good applying?—No; if he goes to England even, you must come to England after him.

42,502. It is no good getting the order even?—No.

42,503. That is the only remedy with regard to desertion that a woman in Ireland has?—Yes.

42,504. Now take cruelty?—In cruelty you have the old matrimonial practice, which is a ground for a mensa et thoro.

42,505. Have you any idea what the cost for that is?—Well, they are not generally expensive suits, because we generally prove them by the wife and some servants or something of the kind——

42,506. Can those be bought anywhere except in Dublin?—No; but I was going to mention to your Lordship, particularly with regard to a question put by Mr. Burt to a witness I heard examined in this room, that in Ireland the cases are sent down to be tried at the assizes very often, and that certainly cheapens it very much.

42,507. Do you mean a suit on the ground of cruelty could be sent to the assizes?—Yes, I have acted in one or two at any rate.

42,508. That is to say, the jurisdiction exercised by the High Court is not confined to being exercised in Dublin?—No.

42,509. It may be taken at the assizes?—Yes, where the witnesses reside, and it cheapens proceedings very much. The preliminary proceedings are not very expensive.

42,510. But there is no summary procedure for protecting a woman from cruelty?—No; except this; that if she is driven out of the house by cruelty they will treat it as desertion and make a maintenance order.

42,511. Do you know how many cases of that there are in Dublin?—No, I could not give you that, nor do I think it could be easily ascertained through police statistics—I spoke to a gentleman of very great experience there, a clerk to the police courts, and he could not tell me. They are not segregated sufficiently.

42,512. If we wrote, who would be the authority in Dublin and in Belfast, or any other big town, to get the magistrates' statistics from?—I think if you were to write to Mr. Swift, who is the chief magistrate in Dublin, he would arrange to have it sent.

42,513. And from the different police?—Yes. We have the Metropolitan Police in Dublin, and there are the Royal Irish Constabulary in Belfast. But the resident magistrate there, Mr. Nagle, and another gentleman of experience—if you communicate to them, I think if you applied to the Constabulary Office or the Petty Sessions Office in Dublin Castle you would be able to get any information in regard to statistics.

42,514. One other question. You probably have read a good deal of the evidence given here. It has been suggested that insanity should be made a ground for divorce?—Yes.

42,515. Of course that is not the case in Ireland?—No.

42,516. Can you tell me at all what the statistics show as to the number of people confined for permanent lunacy in Ireland?—I could have got them at once. I did not think of doing so. The number is increasing, and increasing in a very alarming way. It is a most serious matter.

42,517. Could you tell me who would supply me with those statistics?—Well, the Census authority, if you apply to the Registrar-General, Charlemont House.

42,518. Dublin?—Yes; the Registrar-General has all those returns.

42,519. In Dublin?—Yes, and in the 1901 Census the matter was gone into very fully. A paper was read before the Statistical Society of Ireland by the late Registrar-General, Sir Robert Matheson, on 25th November 1904 which illustrates the subject by diagrams.

42,520. Is Charlemont House near Dublin?—It is in Dublin, in Rutland Square.

42,521. Then there is another point, though it is not within our cognizance, we should have on the notes, with regard to settlements?—I think whatever powers are vested in the English court with regard to judicial separation should be extended to Ireland, though you do not exactly rectify settlements in these cases, I think you can direct a settlement to be made. Again, in the case of nullity of marriage we have to take a specific proceeding in the Chancery Division where the marriage is null and void, instead of dealing with the matter before the divorce tribunal.

42,522. But the powers to deal with settlements are in case of divorce?—Yes, but you have power not to rectify settlements but to get settlements made in cases of judicial separation.

42,523. But what do you want?—I want to have a power given in cases of judicial separation that the settlements should be made instead of mere alimony orders.

42,524. Now as to county courts?—Well, "there is no necessity to extend any of the matrimonial jurisdiction to the county courts for the benefit of the poorer classes in Ireland. Matrimonial offences requiring the intervention of the courts in any class of the population are rare, and there can be little doubt that the public would object to any attempt to extend divorce jurisdiction to the county courts. As an example of the rarity of matrimonial offences in the county districts, I may mention that one of the most experienced resident magistrates in Ireland informed me recently that he only remembered one application being made to him for maintenance in case of desertion in a period of five years, and that this was the probable average. The district in which he acted as magistrate was a very extensive one in Leinster. Applications for maintenance are, however, much more frequent in the large cities, but no public demand has ever existed for facilitating divorce among the lower orders whether Protestant or Roman Catholic. Contentious divorce litigation is undoubtedly expensive, but the power of sending down a cause to be tried at the assizes is availed of to some extent, and where the case depends upon the evidence of local witnesses considerable expense is thus saved.

"If the existing law was reformed so that the expense of a multiplicity of proceedings could be avoided, and the whole domestic litigation decided in one cause, it would be of great public advantage.

"The Council of the Bar of Ireland had the matter under consideration during the years 1889 and 1890, and at their request I then drafted a Bill which was approved of and printed by the Council." Though, as I told your Lordship, at present they do not wish to take any part whatever in this matter, This Bill had been approved of, too, by Judge Warren, who was then President of the Matrimonial Division. Then I say: "If such a procedure Bill were introduced, it would probably be unopposed as it would not touch upon the question of dissolution of marriage in any way, but would tend to prevent the public disadvantage of recounting private scandals in different phases of a litigation which might well be terminated in a single cause."

42,525. All those amendments assume the present state of the law remaining except with regard to the House of Commons and the House of Lords?—Yes.

42,526. Then as to publication?—

"I do not think that at present it would be advisable in Ireland to interfere with the discretion of the Press in reporting divorce cases. The number of Irish matrimonial causes is few. Their comparative rarity has undoubtedly the effect of exciting undue curiosity about them when they do come to a hearing; but the Irish Press exercises reasonable reticence in reporting the evidence in such cases. There is, however, a large circulation in Ireland of English Sunday papers which contain vivid accounts and objectionable details of proceedings in English divorce cases. Their circulation has a deleterious effect in Ireland, and there is no doubt that if the evil of over-reporting such cases can be checked in England, it would reflect advantageously in Ireland. If legislation to control reporting is introduced for England, it ought to be extended to Ireland. The Irish court always hears cases of nullity on the ground of physical defect in camera, and has power, following the practice of the ecclesiastical courts, to direct suits for divorce a mensa et thoro to be heard in private, if it thinks the circumstances of the case require it. This power has been recently exercised in a case where the offences charged were of an abnormal character; but the exclusion of the public is only resorted to in very exceptional cases.

"The judicial statistics show the very small number of matrimonial causes instituted in Ireland, and the still smaller number which are finally determined by decree.

"Cases where matrimonial troubles arise in Ireland are very frequently settled by family arrangement, and not by recourse to litigation; and even where petitions are filed for divorce, the great majority of cases are compromised before final hearing. Unless the parties desire to proceed for parliamentary divorce, arrangements can generally be effected through the legal advisers of the parties, which will practically secure all that can be gained by litigation, and the pain and family injury caused by the publication of domestic scandals is thus avoided." Then I set out the statistics.

42,527. Perhaps you will allow that schedule to be annexed and form part of your proof?—Yes.

The following is the schedule referred to:—

Year.	Petitions filed.	Petitions for Divorce a mensa et thoro.	Petitions for Nullity of Marriage.	Petitions for Restitution of Conjugal Rights.	Decrees granted.	Dismissals.
1901	22	21	0	1	4	4
1902	30	27	1	2	3	1
1903	17	16	1	0	2	0
1904	22	20	0	2	4	0
1905	21	18	1	2	3	0
1906	31	29	1	1	5	2
1907	25	25	0	0	6	0
1908	31	29	2	0	6	0
1909	21	18	0	3	3	0
Total for 9 years	220	203	6	11	36	7

42,528. Then you proceed to the Bill in Parliament?—Yes, my Lord; what I state about that is—

"Persons of Irish domicil who desire a dissolution of marriage must proceed by way of Divorce Bill introduced into the House of Lords. Witnesses are there examined on the second reading. The Bill is then carried through its stages in both Houses until it becomes an Act of Parliament. Relief is given on the principles applicable to suits for dissolution of marriage in the English Divorce Court.

"If the husband is the petitioner he can obtain a parliamentary divorce on the ground of adultery by his wife.

"If the wife is petitioner, she is required to prove not only adultery by the husband, but also that he has been guilty of desertion, cruelty, or other such matrimonial offence as would enable her to a dissolution of marriage under the English divorce law.

"A very oppressive burden is imposed upon suitors in parliamentary divorce proceedings by the heavy House fees charged in both the House of Lords and House of Commons under Standing Orders. They amount to at least 75*l.* in the House of Lords, and 35*l.* in the House of Commons. This is a tremendous tax upon redress to inflict upon a private suitor. If he is a husband, he has already incurred the heavy costs of a double litigation against his wife in divorce a mensa et thoro where he has probably had to pay all her costs, and against the adulterer in crim. con. where he possibly may have had to proceed against a defendant who may not be a mark for costs and damages. On the other hand unless a wife has considerable means, it is impossible for her to institute proceedings for parliamentary divorce. The greater portion of the expense in parliamentary divorce is caused by the enormous fees exacted on the different stages of the Bill under the schedules to Standing Orders. If these fees were reduced by 90 per cent., it would be an approach to what would be reasonable. It must be remembered that as the hearing of evidence takes place at Westminster, the expense of bringing witnesses there from Ireland is of itself considerable, and the imposition of such enormous House fees is unjustifiable."—Perhaps I might modify that to some extent. Frequently the witnesses are English witnesses, and sometimes witnesses from France too; and then the witnesses would be cheaper than in Dublin. Then I say: "I have obtained from the solicitor in two recent Divorce Bills, in which I was counsel, where a lady was in each case the petitioner, a note of the House of Lords and Commons fees. In the first of them the House of Lords' fees were 82*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*, and the House of Commons, 40*l.* The petitioner in this case had been for years endeavouring to save enough money to enable her to promote a bill to dissolve her marriage."—That was the case I referred to. I was wrong in saying 20 years. It was 20 years from the act of adultery; but it was 13 years that she was laying by for proceedings.—"In the second case the House of Lords' fees were 78*l.*, and the House of Commons fees, 39*l.* Both Bills were unopposed."

42,529. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I gather from your exidence you are decidedly of opinion that public opinion in Ireland is against divorce?—Yes, certainly.

42,530. But not equally against what we now call judicial separation?—Oh, no, there is no feeling against that, except, I may say, this, that amongst the country people—the peasantry—it is always looked upon as a disgrace if there is any separation between husband and wife at all. If a wife lives away from her husband she is looked upon as a disgraced woman, but that is a matter of public feeling.

42,531. But there is no objection on principle to divorce a mensa et thoro or judicial separation?—No.

42,532. But I gather from your evidence that there are practical reforms necessary for the carriage of proceedings for judicial separation?—Yes, I think so.

42,533. Whether it is carried on to Parliament for a divorce or not?—Yes, that is it exactly.

42,534. I gather at present what can in England be done in one suit takes three proceedings, does it not?—Yes.

42,535. First, there is the suit for divorce a mensa et thoro; secondly, there is the action for crim. con.; thirdly, if necessary, there must be an independent proceeding for custody of children?—Yes.

42,536. And your view is that all might be done in one action?—Yes, the whole family litigation could be done in one thing.

42,537. Why is it that the Irish public opinion objects to conferring divorce a vinculo jurisdiction on the courts while it does exist in fact in Parliament?—Well, of course, you may take it the large body of the population is Roman Catholic, and they look upon dissolution of marriage as a violation of a sacrament. They look upon marriage as a sacrament. The Protestant bodies do not look upon it as a sacrament; but undoubtedly amongst the Irish people there does prevail a strong view of the sanctity of marriage. The marriage at the registry office is not looked upon as a right thing at all, though it is a legal marriage. There is that strong feeling that marriage is a very sacred thing.

42,538. Then it is recognised that the proceeding by legislation is a different thing in principle from judicial action of a court?—Yes; it is not the general law of the land but a private Act of Parliament got by the individual.

42,539. Parliament can do anything?—Yes.

42,540. And any responsibility for that Act is on Parliament?—Yes.

42,541. Is that the view?—Yes; and on the individual.

42,542. Is it the view that it tends to the recognition of the permanence of the marriage tie that divorce should not be part of the regular judicial system of the country?—I believe that is the view.

42,543. But you are in favour, if the present system is maintained that the fees in Parliament should be very much reduced?—Yes, I think it is a great hardship on the individual.

42,544. You regard them as unjustifiably high?—I do.

42,545. You say you have known of many hard cases in Ireland. But, recognising the hardship of those cases, public opinion in Ireland does not regard that as a sufficient reason for altering the law?—Yes. I think if hard cases make bad law, Ireland would think hard cases make bad legislation in that way.

42,546. You have told us that you used the power which I think was included in our Divorce Act of 1857 of sending judicial separation cases to assizes?—Yes.

42,547. In your view does that system work well?—Very well. I have known of cases where the expenses have been very considerably reduced.

42,548. And are the cases as satisfactorily heard in that way at assizes as in Dublin?—Oh yes, quite. I ought to mention, perhaps, with regard to the county court jurisdiction, which I see a good deal of your evidence has been directed to, an extension of it to divorce would not be satisfactory in Ireland (I do not say for a moment the county court judges are not gentlemen of great eminence and ability) but the procedure could not be very well adapted to it. The county court jurisdiction is an excellent one; it is very old. what is called Civil Bill procedure; and the cases are heard in a very cheap way; originally dealing with contracts or torts and now extended to a large number of equity cases. They are heard by the county court judge sitting alone. In a certain class of cases he can get a jury of six; but the method of appeal in Ireland is different to the English. You do not go up to Dublin on a case reserved as you do in London, but the whole case comes on for rehearing before the judge of assize; and most of the assize business in Ireland is now taken up by hearing those Civil Bills. The judge hears it, but he never has a jury. It costs very little money; it is most popular with the people; anybody can have a case decided by one of the highest judges of the land. But I do not think that is quite applicable to divorce proceedings, because it is very desirable—and I know judges wish—to be assisted, in cases of adultery particularly, by a jury; and an appeal case heard with a jury would be a new procedure, and an expensive one following on a trial before the county court. At present in divorce cases the preliminary procedure in Dublin is not very expensive, and by sending it to the assizes you can get a case tried satisfactorily.

42,549. Your county court procedure is very different from ours?—Yes.

42,550. But you are of opinion that hearing these divorce cases at assize courts will answer?—It does to the limited extent to which I have experience of it.

42,551. In Ireland?—Yes.

42,551A. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Is there a county court appointed for each county?—The county court judges are grouped. There used to be a county court judge for each county, but they are grouped now, and a county court judge deals with three or four different counties.

42,552. How often does he sit?—Four times a year—quarter sessions.

42,553. In one centre?—No, he goes about to different centres and sits in three or four places in each county, so that the procedure is brought home to the people's very doors. Then at assizes the appeals are heard at the county town, that is the assize town, in each of these counties.

42,554. How many inhabitants do you suppose there are in each county court district?—I should have to look into the statistics

42,555. Would they exceed 100,000?—I should not like to say.

42,556. They only sit three or four times a year?—I mean there are four different sittings at which you can institute proceedings, but they sit for a considerable time. I mean you have the January sessions, the April sessions, the July sessions, and the October sessions. They last till all the business is done in each town, and then he goes on to another town.

42,557. Perhaps a week at each sessions?—Yes, or a fortnight or three weeks.

42,558. It is a different system to ours, where the judge sits in so many different towns during the month?—Yes.

42,559. (Mr. Brierley.) You say that public opinion in Ireland is against the establishment of any divorce jurisdiction at all?—That is dissolution.

42,560. I mean dissolution of marriage?—Yes.

42,561. As a matter of fact, is there any public opinion against the granting of divorce by Parliament?—No, I do not think there is, because it is looked upon that the individual can do as he likes.

42,562. The result is that it does allow divorce for the wealthy?—Yes, certainly.

42,563. As a matter of interest, what did the Irish Parliament do before the Union in the matter of divorce? Did they entertain divorce Bills as in England?—Yes, they entertained divorce Bills. I do not know that I could mention one at present, but they were entertained by the Irish Parliament before the Union.

42,564. Although at one time the Irish Parliament would contain Roman Catholics?—No, Grattan's Parliament was entirely Protestant. Except in James II.'s time no Roman Catholic ever sat in the Irish Parliament. I mean, of course, since the Reformation.

42,565. Jnst one word about what you said as to the police courts. The police courts in Ireland have no power of granting separation at all?—No.

42,566. You had a conversation with Mr. Swift about it. Was it his opinion that that was a drawback?—I think not. They practically get all the remedy that would be possible to give according to Irish public opinion. As I said, if there is such cruelty as drives the unfortunate woman out of the house it is treated as desertion, and then she gets a maintenance order, but the procedure is very lengthy; she would have to wait perhaps six weeks.

42,567. That does not prevent the husband thrusting himself on the wife if he wishes?—No.

42,568. You do not think the need has been felt?—I think not; there is certainly no outcry about it.

42,569. (Chairman.) Would you tell me what the jurisdiction of county courts in Ireland is with regard to amount?—50*l.* in tort or contract, and then you go up to 500*l.* in equity.

42,570. That is where property is of that value?—Yes, property is 500*l.*

42,571. One other matter. You said to Mr. Brierley that there was no public opinion against proceeding by Bill for divorce?—I think not.

42,572. Then although theoretically it is a legislative Act, practically it is a judicial Act?—Well, as far as public opinion goes about the matter it is limited practically to Protestants, and I think the public opinion amongst Protestants is, that though it would be very undesirable to have a dissolution of marriage act passed for Ireland, yet if an individual chooses to go and get an Act of Parliament for himself there is no objection to doing it.

42,573. That leads me to ask you, why would you reduce the fees?—Because I know myself there are a number of people who are anxious to get this divorce. I do not say a very large number; but most people have very limited means in Ireland; money is a very hard thing to get in Ireland, and it is serious that you should have to pay 120*l.* for House fees.

42,574. But the logical position is this ——?—Oh! we have no logic in Ireland!

42,575. I was not suggesting you had; but if there is no public objection to taking proceedings which, though theoretically legislative, are practically judicial, and if the wish is to reduce the fees, it seems to me

there is no substantial difference between that and the constitution of the tribunal that would deal with the matter so that everybody could get it?—Well, all I can say is, I think I know public opinion pretty well in Ireland, and there would be a tremendous storm if such a suggestion was made that there should be a general Act ——

42,576. Would it be right to describe it as an illogical storm?—It may be; we have a great many illogical storms, and perhaps they are the angriest.

(Chairman.) I ought to thank you very much for your evidence, and for giving us the necessary information for following up the statistics that we may require.

Mr. LLEWELLYN ARCHER ATHERLEY-JONES, K.C., M.P., called and examined.

42,577. (Chairman.) You are one of His Majesty's Counsel, practising on the North-Eastern Circuit, and, of course, in London?—Yes.

42,578. You have been a Member of Parliament for a number of years?—Recorder of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Bencher of the Inner Temple.

42,579. How long have you been in Parliament?—I have been in Parliament, I am grieved to say, for 25 years.

42,580. Always for the same constituency?—Yes.

42,581. Which is that?—North-West Durham.

42,582. You have taken some interest in this divorce question?—Yes.

42,583. I believe you framed a Bill for the purpose of introducing the matter to the House?—Yes, I prepared a Bill some years ago. That Bill was never introduced in the House, but I was very much interested in the subject. My view was it was more difficult, and still is more difficult, to obtain divorce now than it was in pre-Reformation times, and I therefore drafted in a Bill certain amendments of the divorce law. I made inquiries—informal inquiries—amongst the working-class population, as far as opportunity afforded, and to some extent, amongst representative persons; and the conclusion which I came to was this: that although, of course, it was most necessary to jealously guard the sanctity of marriage—I regarded it from an ethical standpoint rather than a religious standpoint, not as wishing to regard as anything but of the greatest importance the sanction which religion attaches to marriage—I came to the conclusion that to some extent the grounds on which divorce a vinculo might be conceded should be enlarged. I came to the conclusion that what is now called judicial separation should be abolished, subject to limitations. The conditions which now enable a person to obtain judicial separation should thenceforth enable him to obtain divorce a vinculo. I also came to the conclusion that the tribunal for granting divorce should be enlarged. If I remember aright, the Act of 1857 does contemplate (I now speak with reference to the evidence which was given to your Lordship) that judges on assize should try divorce cases.

42,584. No, judicial separation, not divorce?—Then I am wrong. I thought there was a provision in the Act as amended that the Lord Chancellor—no, by Order in Council, I mean—the divorce judge might travel on circuit.

42,585. The provision was that the Court of Divorce might sit in London or elsewhere according to Order in Council?—Yes.

42,586. But that the judges of assizes should have jurisdiction in judicial separation and restitution suits only?—It was my mistake. I meant that the judges of the Court of Divorce might sit elsewhere than in London by Order in Council. That is what I meant to say. My own view is that this jurisdiction in divorce might be granted, under limitations again, to judges of county courts. I do not say it should be granted indiscriminately to all county courts (because I quite recognise the vast importance of deliberation, gravity, and all that pertains to decency, the absence of hurry and haste, attaching to a court which performs the function of granting divorce), and my own view is that, although (and that is confirmed by the evidence I have read, and which has been given before this Commission) this jurisdiction might be conferred upon judges selected from the county court judges to sit and adjudicate, and to have that jurisdiction over certain areas. I do not think it would be necessary or desirable that every court judge should, in the ordinary course of his business, be enabled to deal with divorce cases, but I think there should be judges chosen from the county court judges appointed for that purpose, to hold their sittings at certain intervals which should cover a certain area.

42,587. Have you got a copy of the Bill you drew?—No, I am sorry to say I have not. I searched for it but I could not find it.

42,588. Can you tell us if it dealt with the matter from the point of view you have just expressed, or whether it was limited in any other way?—No, the point of view I have just expressed.

42,589. It embodied provisions which carried out that view?—Yes.

42,590. Why was it not introduced?—I am afraid it was not introduced for the simple reason that the opportunity for an un-official member passing legislation now is almost extinct, and much useful legislation is barred therefore, and I was not successful in the ballot, and I thought it useless to introduce it.

42,591. To what extent are you able to represent the general opinion of your constituency with regard to giving increased facilities for divorce in the district?—Of course, it is not a matter I have ever expressed my views upon (except, perhaps, in answer to a question) before my constituents; therefore my view has been obtained quite informally; but I may say this, I have found a general concurrence of opinion amongst those people I have asked, not in any way confined to my own constituency. I may parenthetically observe that since I have been in Parliament I have had about half a dozen—not more—letters written to me, more as a Member of Parliament than perhaps as a lawyer, from different parts of the country, complaining of the difficulties that confronted poor people in obtaining a divorce—the procedure in formâ pauperis not altogether fulfilling the conditions necessary to save expense, because there is still considerable expense involved in formâ pauperis, besides the great inconvenience of coming to town. The result of those inquiries which I made showed me this; that, although I believe the working classes of this country are distinctly moral, there is no doubt about it that there are a great many cases (we have no data as far as I know, except as far as the records of illegitimate births afford information) there is some percentage of persons who do not enter into matrimony, but live in concubinage; and that, to some extent, is due to the difficulty of obtaining divorce. I am speaking from the result of inquiries I have made. I think it was Bentham who said that prohibition to go out involves prohibition to go in, and I think to some extent the difficulty of obtaining a divorce does militate against marriage, though perhaps to a very small extent.

42,592. But to what extent are you able to say there is a feeling in your own district in favour of facilities to try these cases locally and at less expense?—If I understand your question, I have never tried to ascertain in any formal manner, but merely from conversation I have had with my constituents occasionally and very rarely (I do not profess to have made any investigation among my constituents) they are favourable to that jurisdiction being conferred on the county courts. I have not attempted anything in the way of a plebiscite, or anything of that kind, but merely casual conversations.

(Chairman.) I think these are all the points you have in your memorandum?

42,593. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) While you think it would be good to have county court judges kept for specific districts, you still recognise the necessity of making the court accessible to the people?—Yes.

42,594. And I suppose your constituency give you this information that the poor people cannot afford to go any great distance, and take their witnesses any great distance?—Yes; I regard that as the principal reason in my view.

42,595. Therefore, if you fix the centre for the judge you must fix a sufficient number of towns to bring the people within reach of his court?—Certainly. I quite conceive in these days of railway communication local conditions are not so important as they were formerly, but they are important to a considerable extent still.

42,596. That is that people should be able to get to the court and back again in one day?—Yes.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much for your evidence.

Mr. James Roberts called and examined.

42,597. (Chairman.) Your name is James Roberts?—Yes, of the Inner Temple; a member of the English Bar.

42,598. Are you a member of the Irish Bar too?—No; I completed my course as student there, but I did not get called. I came over here.

42,599. Your memorandum which you have been good enough to supply deals with Ireland?—Yes, my Lord, because I have had considerable experience in these cases. My first case, two or three weeks after my call, was one of these Bills, and that led me to take a great interest in the subject, and to go into it historically, and I have been engaged in about one-third of these cases since.

42,600. You have often been employed in the Bills in Ireland which come to the House of Lords?—Yes, my Lord; one-third of them since I was called.

42,601. How long have you been at the Bar?—Since January 1887, my Lord.

42,602. I think you communicated yourself with the Secretary with the view to giving evidence?—Yes, my Lord, I did. Shall I read the memorandum?

42,603. Yes, please?—"Divorce a vinculo of parties domiciled in Ireland is obtained (as in England before 1857) by private Acts of Parliament. Decrees of divorce a mensa et thoro were formerly granted by the Ecclesiastical Courts, Now the divorce a mensa et thoro is granted by the King's Bench Division of the High Court exercising the powers of the older Ecclesiastical Courts. Where the husband is petitioner, an action for crim. con. must also be brought if it is possible to do so. The circumstances under which the bringing of such an action would be excused are those in which a petitioner would be excused from making a co-respondent in England. Where the husband is petitioner, in most cases two distinct trials must be had in the King's Bench Division. The case against the respondent must be again proved by oral evidence (unless otherwise ordered on petition) in the House of Lords on the second reading of the Bill. Once more the guilt of the respondent must be proved to the satisfaction of a Committee of the House of Commons."

42,604. They do not take evidence there again, do they?—I wish to come to that in a moment, my Lord. "That Committee accepts, as a rule, the evidence given before the House of Lords, together with that of the petitioner and one other witness." They have recently made a rule within the last few years, under which they must have one witness to the adultery.

42,605. Besides the petitioner himself?—Yes. Formerly, before 1839, the Committee re-tried the case. In that year, through some accident, the agent in Allison's case had not any witnesses there at all. Hence the practice originated of reading and acting on the evidence given before the House of Lords. From 1840 the petitioner had to attend under the Standing Order of the House of Commons, with a view to being cross-examined in case of suspected condonation. That Standing Order was made before he was legally admissible as a witness. It was the same as the procedure in the House of Lords exactly. Then in later years, when he became admissible as a witness, the Committee of the House of Commons finding the Standing Order there, and finding the petitioner always in attendance, thought they must ask him something, as it was not logical to have him there and ask him nothing, and they asked him to prove his marriage and to produce the certificate; and in recent years they require one other witness.

42,606. The whole case has to be brought before the Committee of the House of Lords?—Before the House itself, not a Committee, on the second reading, and then again before the Divorce Committee of the House of Commons.

42,607. But it has to be proved by one witness to the adultery?—Yes, in the Commons. In the House of Lords the case must be fully proved as in the English court. In the only case in which I appeared before the Commons (as usually counsel do not appear) they required the petitioner to be called specially to give evidence to supplement the evidence before the House of Lords. They were not satisfied with the evidence before the House of Lords. It is really an independent hearing.

42,608. Is the matter taken before the Committee sitting as the House or in Committee?—Before the Divorce Committee of the House of Commons, sitting in one of the committee rooms.

42,609. That is the same as in the House of Lords, then?—Yes; practically it comes to the same thing, only it is a different form altogether.

42,610. I think, if I remember rightly, the House of Lords takes the evidence in Committee?—No; the evidence is given before the House itself on the second reading of the Bill, early in the morning, just before the noble and learned Lords hear the appeal cases, and the House is constituted as it would be constituted for hearing an appeal.

42,611. I have sat on it myself, but could not say if I was sitting as the House ——?—It is not a Committee in the case of the House of Lords, and in the House of Commons the Divorce Committee consists of the Law Officers, ex Law Officers, English and Irish, and the Lord Advocate and some other members, nine or ten in all. "Owing to the majority of the Irish people being of Roman Catholic religion, there is a determined opposition to a court in Ireland granting divorce a vinculo. This opposition is shared by the Protestant population generally." I have copied out the protest of Lord Ashbourne from Hansard if your Lordship thinks I might read it.

42,612. I do not think it is necessary. You say there was a protest?—Yes. The point of it is that from 20 years in public life at the Bar in the House of Commons and as Lord Chancellor of Ireland he said he found no section of the population in favour of a divorce court at all, either Protestant or Roman Catholic. "But the parties needing relief bitterly complain of the trouble and expense to which they are put."

42,613. Will you explain that a little more?—All my clients have always said, what a ridiculous position the whole system is, and what a tax it is on them having to find all this money and go through so many hearings. That is the view not only of the lay clients but the solicitors as well.

42,614. Your view is, though it is legislative, it is practically judicial?—Yes, my Lord, and that view was discussed in Shaw v. Gould. Lord Westbury held in that case that the English law recognised divorce before 1857, but by a special tribunal, that is. Parliament; but I do not think from the ultimate decision in the case that the House accepted that view.

42,615. Can you answer whether the Irish Parliament allowed proceedings of this kind before the Union?—Before the Union all Bills for Ireland came before the Irish Parliament with the previous consent of the English Council; no Divorce Bill passed until it was passed by the English Council. That was until 1782, and from that year until 1800 it was not necessary. There were nine Divorce Bills passed and one rejected in the Irish Parliament before the Union.

42,616. Between 1782 and 1800?—No, from 1729 up to 1800, altogether; most of them in the latter part of the century. There were nine altogether. Then in the year 1753 there was a Mr. Low, a barrister of the Middle Temple who resided in Ireland, and he came to the English Parliament and got a divorce; and in 1768 a Mr. Daly, and a Mr. Martin in 1793, did the same thing, and there was no idea of their validity being questioned in Ireland. The practice of coming over to England is shown in those three cases to have existed although the Irish Parliament acted.

42,617. But they did before the Irish Parliament?—Yes; that was the proper way.

42,618. Did they go independently of getting a certificate from here?—Not until Grattan's Parliament in 1782, after the time of Poyning's Law.

42,619. After that they went ——?—At first they were initiated in the House of Lords, and at a certain stage the Bill received the approval of the English Council, and finally the Act was passed.

42,620. Was that practice general until the Union?—Until 1782.

42,621. Between 1782 and the Union the Irish Parliament dealt with it alone?—Yes, without any reference to the English Council.

42,622. How many Bills were there in that time?—I could not say how many out of that nine. Some of those nine were in that period, but there was no difference really in the procedure.

42,623. Now, you speak of your own clients who have complained of the trouble and expense. How does that enable you to judge how many people who have not the money might use the tribunal if it were constituted?—Shall I go through my memorandum? I was coming to that point later on.

42,624. Very well?—"Since the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 there have been 39 Irish Acts"—there was one this year, and I have brought it up to date—"all of the petitioners were Protestants, and all those Bills were undefended as far as the causes of divorce were concerned." There were defences with regard to settlement and custody of children and the like matters. "The last contested Bill in 1857 was an Irish one, and it was bitterly opposed in both Houses of Parliament. (Members of the House of Commons congratulated themselves that it was the last of the old régime.) However, it is a mere accident that none have been contested in Parliament since 1857.

"Besides the ordinary expenses attending such trials, there are the additional expenses caused by bringing the witnesses to London, as well as solicitors or counsel from Dublin.

"The parliamentary costs of the parties average 115*l.* A return showing such costs was ordered by the House of Lords to be printed on 8th August 1907." I sent the Secretary a copy of that return, and I have it here. In one respect the return is inaccurate; that is, the second and third columns, but not with regard to the figures. The printer has got them muddled, and the numbers do not apply to the proper cases. But that does not affect the evidence before the Commission. I have a corrected copy here. (See Supplement at conclusion of witness's evidence.)

42,625. This shows the costs?—This shows the costs as regards the parliamentary fees only.

42,626. 115*l.*?—That is the average; for the purpose of this inquiry the return is correct. I may say I did my best to get figures of my cases, my Lord, but the solicitors in most cases objected, and in most cases the expenses were heavy, owing to quite exceptional circumstances not connected with Parliament at all.—"As an illustration I give a case in which the witnesses called were only the petitioner, the solicitor, and one witness from the West of Ireland (another may have been in attendance). The following particulars have been supplied to me by a client for the purpose of this inquiry:—

"The costs of the original divorce proceedings in Ireland amounted to about - - - - - - - -	100	0	0
"The English agent's bill of costs for the proceedings in Parliament amounted altogether (without including any charges of our own) to	429	8	1"

—This case is No. 5 in the printed return, my Lord, and out of that 429*l.* there is 122*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* that is mentioned in the return, and which is included in that 429*l.*

42,627. For the fees?—Yes, that would be included.

	£	s.	d.
"The petition for the House of Lords was prepared by us, and all the evidence procured here, and certain portion of the briefs, &c., and our bill of costs, including the journey of our Mr. to London came to - - - - - - -	137	11	10."

—The cheapest case I ever heard of was between 450*l.* and 500*l.* altogether.

"I should explain that there was in this case a petition for substituted service in each House of Parliament, which increased the cost slightly over what it would otherwise have been. In any case the costs must be very much greater than under similar circumstances of an English case.

"The first result of this expense is delay. In one of my cases the petitioner was a mechanical engineer who could not afford to promote a Divorce Bill for 10 years after he had obtained his divorce a mensa et thoro in Dublin; the guilty parties meanwhile were living as husband and wife in America. In another, the petitioner could not proceed owing to the want of means for eight or nine years, and at the end of that period could not go on because it could not be proved whether the respondent was alive or dead. In a third case (one of those in the printed return) the petitioner only obtained an Act 13 years after the decree in Dublin, and even then only with financial assistance from friends."—That is the case my friend has already referred to. Mr. Samuels and I were both in that case, and that is the same case.—"There is, however, a more serious result of the great expense attending these cases. There is a great temptation to avoid it by obtaining a decree in England by taking a house there temporarily, and then the petitioner persuading himself that he wishes to remain so, that he may declare he has an English domicile; then he can change his mind again. I have known that course to have been advised, but it was before the decision in the case of Le Mesurier"—which was in 1895—"I was informed of another case (also before Le Mesurier's) in which eminent counsel advised the same course to be taken, because there was no direct precedent of a Bill being passed in the circumstances of that particular case. An English decree was obtained in due course.

"The validity of a decree so obtained was first questioned in 1896 (with respect to an English decree obtained in 1885) by the trustees of a settlement refusing to recognise the order of the English court varying the trusts."—This information is taken from the Law Reports.—"The petitioner then obtained a Divorce Act (1897), but the House of Lords refused to allow it to take effect as proposed in the Bill from 1885."—they were asked to do that, but declined.—"By that Act the same variations of settlements were made as had been ordered by the court in 1885. In a subsequent case the effect of the English decree was questioned in regard to a question of title to lands sold under the Irish Land Acts. As both parties to the suit 13 years before had married, and there was issue of the petitioner's second marriage, it was sought by the Divorce Bill to make it effectual as from the date of the English decree."—There is a note to that in the printed return, but it is put to No. 4 wrongly.—"Two years later a similar case arose and was dealt with by another 'Validation' Act"—that seems to be the practice now, to obtain a Validation Act in cases where an English divorce has already been obtained and has been questioned. "As there was no question of want of means in any of these three cases, there is little doubt that where money is not plentiful many cases exist of English decrees having been obtained for what they may be worth thereafter. Speaking generally, the lay mind is very hazy on the question of domicile and persons do not realise the risk of having a divorce and perhaps subsequent marriages declared invalid in after years. The extension of jurisdiction in England to either county courts or courts of summary jurisdiction would increase the facilities for decrees which, in the case of Irish people (especially when suing in person), might prove disastrous to the parties or their children at a later time.

"The fact that the causes for divorce, bars, &c., are identical in both countries (the House of Lords having intimated it will give relief in circumstances in which relief could be obtained by English petitioners) and the circumstances connected with 'Validation' Acts mentioned above indicate a remedy,"—this is purely my own suggestion; I do not represent anyone in saying it—"namely, to give jurisdiction to the court in London to grant divorces in Irish cases." I should add, naturally, to give the right of audience to Irish counsel in these cases.—"The parties would then have only one journey to London and one trial. This they have to do already when coming to the House of Lords. The expenses in their cases would still be very great, but not more than one-fourth of what they have to bear at present."

42,628. Do you think that suggestion would meet with approval or not in Ireland?—I do not know, my Lord. It would completely meet the objection of those who did not want a divorce court in the country.

42,629. And I gather in practice you say they used it in that way by coming here?—It has been done. The first case I ever had illustrates it. A friend of mine, a solicitor, told me when I was a student that he had a divorce case coming on, and his client was advised to take a house and become a ratepayer in London for six months. We were out walking and just talking casually. I called his attention to the danger; I had the case of Deck v. Deck in my mind where a subsequent marriage was upset in like circumstances. Some months after he told me he did not realise what I said at first, and that he had got the late Mr. Searle's opinion, who said I was quite right and thereupon he asked me to undertake my first case.

42,630. Was that his case?—Yes; the first case I ever had was that particular case.

42,631. Your first case was conducted in the House of Lords, and that was what he had to go through in order to get a divorce?—Yes. Since Le Mesurier's case counsel are more careful, but at the same time there may be cases, and I have heard of cases, in which I have reason to believe that the same thing has been done; one was quite recently.

42,632. I think we understand the procedure pretty clearly. Although the opinion generally may be averse to divorce a vinculo in Ireland, what do you infer from the cases you have had as to the possible number of persons who cannot afford this extraordinary expense, and yet would really seek to obtain a divorce if they could?—I have no means of knowing, because not practising in Ireland I am not consulted about cases until they are practically ripe for Parliament. In a case of ten years' delay I was consulted in the beginning, i.e., when the divorce a mensa et thoro was obtained, and then again ten years later, when the petitioner had found the money.

42,633. Does not the fact that there are a number of cases in which the expensive proceedings are gone through by those who can afford it lead to the inference that there must be in a large population a number of cases where it cannot be afforded?—I think so. I think that is the natural inference. Now, there is another point that I should like to mention. It bears on another point altogether, but it will be very short, and that is about the equality of the relief afforded to the two sexes. The origin of the difference is of course purely historical. I do not know that I need quote Mr. Macqueen's book "On the Appelate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords, &c.," published in 1842, but the whole thing was threshed out in Mrs. Addison's case, and Lord Thurlow laid down strong views there and converted some of the opponents to the measure to granting relief, and there were subsequent cases where the wife was petitioner and Mr. Macqueen says this (at p. 479), "Although these "two cases passed on different principles, yet I think it "may be held, that from them both this general rule "is derivable: namely, that wherever the husband's "delinquency has been such as reasonably to bar "reconciliation between the married parties, the Bill "of the wife will succeed." If the circumstances were such that reconciliation were possible or probable then the Bills were refused, and I think that is the origin of the distinction between the two sexes. With regard to that I have had occasion to go into the question of the Canadian procedure, which is by Private Bill, and also I have a book here that the author sent me in 1889, which completely deals with the Canadian position. There the Canadian Parliament has recognised the equality, and it was fully debated in the Senate in 1888, and they decided not to be bound by the English practice in the House of Lords, but to treat both sexes alike, and a wife can get divorce by a Private Act on the ground of the husband's adultery alone. Then they were met with the same difficulty. In the law, there, before the Dominion they could not get a Private Bill through because of the conscientious objection of the Roman Catholics. When the Dominion Act came the grounds of divorce were within the purview of the Dominion Parliament, and the local Parliaments ceased to exercise it, but the Dominion Parliament exercised it. The exception to that is British Columbia. It is decided that British Columbia has the ——

42,634. Some of the eastern colonies too are in the same position?—Yes.

42,635. May I ask what book that is?—The author was the late Mr. Gemmill.

42,636. Does he give the whole of Canada?—He gives an account of the eastern colonies, but does not say anything very much since the Federal Parliament; but he does distinguish British Columbia. In British Columbia an ordinance was passed incorporating the English law, and under that they incorporated our Act of 1857. That has been finally recognised by the Privy Council. I can leave this book with the Secretary if any members of the Commission would like to see it. It gives a full account of the debate on the Tudor-Hart case. One other question about the number of Divorce Acts. I have a return here. The Irish Divorce Acts since 1857; there were two in the first 10 years; three in the next 10 years; five in the next 10 years; 10 in the fourth 10 years; then 15 in 10 years; and then one a year since in the last three years, so that the average is only ·735 per annum scattered all over that long period. I had the curiosity to make a Canadian return and compare the two. The figures are worked out from 1867 to 1907. In the first 10 years there were four; in the next 10 years there were 18; in the third 10 years there were 36; in the fourth, 53, and there have been 20 since. There have been 15 in 1909.

42,637. Before the Canadian Parliament?—No, I start with 1867 from the creation of the Federal Parliament.

42,638. I know, but you said there were so many in 1909?—Yes, 15.

42,639. That is before the Federal Parliament?—Oh yes, all these are before the Federal Parliament. I attribute that increase in 1909 probably to that Scottish case which the newspapers were filled with about a year or two ago, in which title to property in Scotland depended on the recognition of an American divorce in Canada; that case probably brought home to the practitioners in Canada the importance of confining themselves to their own Parliament instead of going to the United States for divorce.

42,640. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Do you know anything as to the county court judges in Ireland?—I am not competent to speak on that. I practise here. I go backwards and forwards to Ireland of course, and I have my relatives there.

42,641. Would they be gentlemen that could try divorce cases?—I have no reason to suppose they could not. They are in a very responsible position, but I am not a competent witness on that.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much, Mr. Roberts, your evidence will be very useful.

Adjourned for a short time.

Supplement to Mr. Roberts's Evidence.

This is the corrected Return to an Order of the House of Lords, dated 16th July 1907, referred to in Qs. 42,624 and 42,625.

† March 30th on hearing of Petition for leave to present Divorce Bill, leave given to present in lieu thereof a Divorce (Validation) Bill.

Mr. FRANK MARSHALL called and examined.

42,642. (Chairman.) Your name is Frank Marshall?—Yes.

42,643. Of 1, Mosley Street, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, a solicitor?—Yes.

42,644. I think your firm is the firm of Wilkinson and Marshall?—That is so.

42,645. Newcastle-on-Tyne, solicitors; and you have been in practice for 27 years?—28, I believe now.

42,646. I believe your evidence was invited at a time when you were abroad?—That is so.

42,647. At any rate it happened either by that or by the meetings of your society, that it was not convenient to take your evidence at the time we were taking this class of evidence?—That is so.

42,648. You are "the Honorary Secretary of the Newcastle-upon-Tyne Incorporated Law Society, have been a member of the Standing Committee since 1889, and served as Vice-President in 1897 and President in 1905." Have you been "requested by the society, which is composed of solicitors (200 members) practising in Newcastle-upon-Tyne and Northumberland, and in some of the neighbouring towns in the county of Durham, to give evidence before this Commission"?—That is so.

42,649. I do not know that we need read the next sentence. That only explains the reasons for your coming here?—And the efforts we have made to bring the request of the Commission to the notice of every member of the society in the neighbourhood. We sent out a special notice calling an extraordinary meeting of the society to consider the matter.

42,650. And then there was a general meeting?—A special general meeting to deal with this matter.

42,651. When was that held?—On January 13th.

42,652. At that general meeting there were recommendations which you have given on page 2 of your proof?—That is so.

42,653. With one addition they were adopted as the expressions of the opinion of the society on the questions mentioned in the letter from the Secretary of the Commission?—Yes.

42,654. Which is the addition?—The one requiring magistrates' clerks in all cases to keep a note of the proceedings.

42,655. Will you kindly read the recommendations?—The first is "A. (1) That the petitioner should have the power of beginning a divorce or matrimonial cause in the district registry of the High Court within the district of which either (a) the respondent resides, or (b) the petitioner and respondent resided together for the longest period during the six months immediately prior to ceasing cohabitation." I do not know whether I may mention anything that occurs to me as I go along.

42,656. Oh, if you please?—We have been following the evidence. There is the question as to the territorial jurisdiction either of a district registry or a county court, and that I think has not been very clearly dealt with. In the report of the County Court Committee over which your Lordship presided it suggested giving jurisdiction to county courts, but there is no suggestion of how the territorial jurisdiction is to be decided. One suggestion I saw was that wherever a petitioner had a permanent place of abode a cause might be brought. Well, the principle hitherto adopted has been that the plaintiff must seek the defendant or else go where the cause of action arose, and it seems to me that that ought to be the principle adopted if possible in determining the territorial jurisdiction either for district registries or for county courts. Otherwise you may have a petitioner going away to a distant part of the country with intent, and establishing a permanent abode (the question of what is a permanent abode I suppose is always a question of degree) and putting the respondent to a very great disadvantage.

42,657. Is not the safest plan the place where they were residing at the time the home was broken up?—That is practically what is aimed at in the second suggestion; either where the respondent is, or at the place where they resided immediately preceding the cessation of cohabitation.

42,658. There is one case that is not met by that. The petitioner might be a woman who might return to her parents, necessarily, and they might be in another part of the country. Would it be desirable that she should be compelled to sue where the respondent was, or where they lived. Why should not she sue where she is?—Well, her cause may or may not be good.

If it is not good it is a hardship that the husband should be brought from a considerable distance and have to bring witnesses from where they were living down to where she went to live with her parents. The subject is full of difficulty, of course.

42,659. Well, after all, that would be a matter for rules of proceedings?—The jurisdiction would be a matter for statute, I take it.

42,660. Not the jurisdiction, because the parties might be altogether in different parts?—But I mean as to which county court or district registry would have jurisdiction I should have thought would be settled by statute. I think it is in the present County Court Acts. Either the plaintiff has to go to the defendant or bring it in the court where the cause of action arose.

42,661. Well, your two suggestions are contained in No. 1.?—Yes, my Lord, that is so. Then—

"(2) That in any cause so begun appearance should be entered, and the proceedings continue in the district registry, unless removed by order to the principal or another district registry on good cause shown.

"(3) That any cause begun in the principal registry should be removable to any district registry by order on good cause shown.

"(4) That the procedure in the district registry should be the same as in the principal registry of the Divorce Division, minutes being kept of the proceedings by the district registrar.

"(5) That any divorce or matrimonial cause (whether proceeding in the principal registry or a district registry) should be triable at assizes, the place of trial being determined by order as in the King's Bench Division."

Those deal with the district registry. Then—

"(6) That it is most undesirable that jurisdiction in divorce and matrimonial causes should be conferred on any county or other local courts."

42,662. How many assizes have you at Newcastle?—Two civil assizes and three gaol deliveries.

42,663. That leaves some months between?—February, the end of June, and the end of November.

42,664. But civil work?—For civil work, two, February and June. We are agitating for more.

42,665. But you may not get it?—We may not get it.

42,666. Do not you think these cases require to be settled rather quicker than that?—I do not know that the cases would be so very, very numerous and I do not know that they suffer, broadly speaking, from a little delay. One has known it rather advantageous than otherwise in some cases.

42,667. One other point I would like to mention; you would have no judge in the locality during any part of the time except when the trial was on?—Yes.

42,668. How would you propose that interlocutory proceedings, which are numerous in divorce cases sometimes, should be dealt with?—Before the registrar in the first place, with an appeal to the judge.

42,669. Appeal to the judge in London?—In London.

42,670. That at once gives rise to expense and difficulty?—Yes; it is the same procedure as in all the other branches of the court though; we have common law and the Admiralty in the registry.

42,671. But you have the county court for smaller debts and the High Court only for the larger ones?—Yes.

42,672. One of the main objects in dealing with these local cases is to deal with cases that cannot afford to come to London?—We feel that, of course; the expense of witnesses, which is very great, coming from Newcastle to London. I may say there is only one member in the whole of our society who expressed an opinion in favour of the county court. The reasons were practically what you have had before you, the ideal being that divorce work should be strictly limited to an experienced court; but feeling it is necessary to increase the number of judges and the variety of views as little as possible, it is felt that trial at the assizes would probably meet what is desired.

42,673. You weigh, of course, that all the King's Bench judges are on the rota for assize?—Yes.

42,674. How do you propose to deal with a set of trials at assize if the judge coming round happens to be a Catholic, or, as in some instances we know, is entirely averse to divorce business?—That is a difficulty. And that is a difficulty I foresee in the county courts also.

42,675. It would not be necessarily so if what has been suggested by some witnesses were done, namely, a selected number of judges?—Well that can be done in the High Court, I suppose, too.

42,676. There is a difficulty there because circuits go round and deal with all the business?—Well, apart from getting a judge who would decline to take it, there may be very wide divergence between the discretion administered in divorce practice as between judge and judge. There are 55 county court judges, I think, and apart from getting a judge who may decline to try the cause, he may take some extreme view as to proof which would make it almost impossible to get a divorce, and you may have another judge in an adjoining district with whom it was comparatively simple.

42,677. Well, would you read on please?—

"The feeling of the society was that in dealing with this question the point to be considered was not so much the cheapening of the cost of divorce as the removal of the difference in cost between London and the provinces, due to the proceedings being conducted, and the hearing taking place, in London. It was thought that by allowing the proceedings to be conducted in district registries and the hearing to take place at assizes the difficulty would be sufficiently met, especially if the circuit system were remodelled for civil business on the lines suggested in the report of the committee which recently considered the question of county court procedure. With the exception of one member, who was unable to be present at the meeting, and wrote a letter expressing his views, no member suggested giving jurisdiction to county courts."

"The question of the terms on which jurisdiction should be given to county courts, if it were decided to give such jurisdiction, was considered by the standing committee, and their views were as follows."

42,678. Is that the same standing committee?—No, the previous one was a general meeting.

42,679. Can you tell us how many were at the general meeting?—No, I cannot. The first meeting was a considerable meeting. The second meeting after the recommendations were circulated was comparatively small; but that was because it was confirmatory rather than otherwise.

42,680. Well, the general meeting would be a substantial body of solicitors?—Yes.

42,681. And this committee; what is that?—17.

"1. Jurisdiction should only be given to specified courts, say, one on each circuit where the registrar is also a district registrar of the High Court."

I see it has been suggested in some evidence that all courts should have jurisdiction. In Northumberland there are several outlying courts which are only courts in name, the clerk receiving plaints and so on, and no resident registrar even. That seems to be entirely out of the question.

42,682. It is a fact that in Northumberland you have only one High Court registry?—Yes, that is so, but, of course, Newcastle is really the centre for all Northumberland.

42,683. But it is a long way from the north?—Yes.

42,684. Is there no place further north in the county which is big or important enough to have established a district registry?—Not as a district registry. Berwick, of course, is the extreme and Alnwick is about halfway.

42,685. There might be a bankruptcy registry?—No, that is in Newcastle.

42,686. Is there good communication by rail from most parts of Northumberland to Newcastle?—Oh yes, excellent.

42,687. A day would do it?—Oh yes.

42,688. Then No. 2?—

"2. The court in which a case might be begun would be determined as in A. (1) above."

That is the territorial matter which we have dealt with.

"3. The jurisdiction should be limited to cases where the joint incomes of the petitioner and respondent do not exceed the sum of 300*l.* per annum."

I may say the idea is that if jurisdiction is going to be given to the county courts, there is a class above the extremely poor and working classes who deserve consideration, and that is the clerk class, whose income may be a little more, but who find it very difficult to deal with a trial in London at present.

42,689. What limits would you place on that class of person?—We suggest a limit of 300*l.* here, my Lord.

42,690. That is 6*l.* a week?—Yes, my Lord. I think that is a little high perhaps, and I also see difficulty in requiring proof of the joint means.

42,691. Why?—More in the poorer classes. Probably a wife would swear that her husband was a working man earning so much, but if he deserted her I do not know how she is going to give evidence on that.

42,692. She could say what he had at the time he left?—Yes, I agree.

42,693. At any rate there would have to be some latitude about it?—Yes. Then:—

"4. Hearing should be before the judge alone.

"5. An appeal should be allowed on questions of fact.

"6. The damage to be recovered against a co-respondent should be limited to 100*l.*

"7. Solicitors should have the same right of audience as in other matters in county courts."

That deals with the first question put by the secretary of the Commission. The second was as to separation orders, and the recommendation was that the magistrates' jurisdiction "should continue, except that the power to grant an order for separation should be limited to cases in which such an order is necessary for the adequate protection of the complainant."

42,694. That is against the view of permanent separation orders?—Against separation orders.

42,695. By "adequate protection" you mean temporary protection?—Well, where it was so serious a case that it was felt nothing short of a separation was enough for the wife's protection; it might be a temporary order to come up for revision: in other cases only maintenance orders. This is the practice really before the magistrates at Newcastle (Mr. Roberts gave evidence here), and the proportion of separation orders made is very small.

42,696. Then would you read on?—

"This recommendation (which embodies, I am informed, the existing practice in many courts of summary jurisdiction) must be read in the light of the previous recommendation against giving jurisdiction to county courts. I cannot say whether or no the society would be in favour of transferring the magistrates' jurisdiction to the county courts in the event of general jurisdiction in divorce being given to the county courts. Reasons for retaining the magistrates' jurisdiction are (1) that the fees payable are less than the fees that would probably be exacted in county courts, and that the magistrates' clerks have the power, which is frequently exercised, of remitting the fees; and (2) that the cases can be brought to hearing more expeditiously. If only specified county courts were given jurisdiction in divorce, it would be necessary to preserve the magistrates' jurisdiction in other places, and it would probably be found that to transfer the magistrates' jurisdiction to county courts in populous centres would throw too much work upon the county courts."

42,697. Have you any light to throw on the question of enforcing the magistrates' orders?—None whatever, my Lord. I never had anything to do with that personally.

42,698. Then the same committee is it?—No, this is now the general meeting again; and so was the last one; "(a) conferring jurisdiction on local courts; (b) separation orders; (c) publication of reports;" "(b)" was a separate heading of the enquiry.

42,699. "(b)" is the general meeting?—Yes.

42,700. Now the general meeting deals with the publication of reports?—Yes:—

"1. That a register of all decrees in divorce, both nisi and absolute, should be kept in the central office of the Royal Courts of Justice, open to inspection on payment of a small fee.

"2. That in the public interest the publication, other than in the recognised law reports, of anything more than the bare statement of the result of the trial of divorce and matrimonial causes should be prohibited.

"There was a strong feeling against allowing the publication of the details of cases in the press. At the same time, it was thought that a readily accessible register of decrees was desirable." There was also a suggestion that it might be desirable to insist on local advertisements of the decree.

42,701. By whom?—By the successful party who obtained the decree in a prescribed form. That is rather from the point of view of a deterrent against the commission of matrimonial offences; the knowledge that publication to that extent would follow.

42,702. In order to prevent a petitioner putting in what he pleases, you would rather suggest he should pay a small fee to the registrar and let him put it in?—Yes, in a prescribed form. The same authority that sent the notice to the Royal Courts should arrange for the advertisement. Then the next point; this is the society in general meeting again:—

"(d) Amendments.

"The society recommended—

"1. That the procedure and the court fees payable in the Divorce Division should be assimilated to the procedure and court fees payable in the King's Bench Division."

42,703. Let me know what that means in substance. We know there is a different practice, but would that be more economical?—I think so.

42,704. Could you tell us the principal point that would show that?—Yes. I should start with a writ as in any other division. Serve a plain copy.

42,705. You go on to explain here?—Yes. "This recommendation has in view facilitating the procedure in the district registries, and reducing the cost in all cases." When I refer to the facility in procedure, it was the desirability of not having another form of procedure adopted in certain particular cases. I do not know why divorce cases were excepted by the Judicature Commission.

42,706. It was the old ecclesiastical procedure?—Yes, I know, but why it was preserved when the other special procedures were done away with, I do not know.

42,707. The Admiralty procedure was altered?—Yes, and the Chancery too; and the Divorce, as far as I know, is the only one preserved. "It is suggested that a writ should be substituted for the citation, and a plain copy served as in other divisions of the High Court, that a statement of claim, verified by affidavit, should be substituted for the petition"—verified by affidavit; now we suggest the verification by affidavit be dispensed with. We see no reason why——

42,708. As I said to one of the witnesses this morning, the reason why that has been put forward is to prevent claims being made to harass people?—I should respectfully say I doubt if it has any effect whatever in that respect nowadays. It is a sort of common form affidavit, which I am afraid is not much regarded, and harassing claims are allowed without similar protection in other divisions of the court, and are by no means infrequent.

42,709. I should have thought myself that removing even what affidavit there is would tend to allow claims to be put forward for which there was absolutely no foundation?—Well, my Lord, feeling as I do very much doubt whether the affidavit in support of the petition is much, if any, protection in that respect——

42,710. It might be suggested that that should be strengthened by an affidavit of the solicitor, saying he has investigated the case and thinks it a reasonable case?—That might be useful if the object is to stop unfounded claims. But it is not applied in any other branch of legal procedure.

42,711. No; but there are immense differences. Take the case of a woman who sues, and then immediately after applies for costs against her husband to be secured. If she has not even to say on affidavit that she has a good case, she can put him to immense expense without any foundation at all?—I agree, but I doubt whether the affidavit stops—I was going to say—a fraction of one per cent. of the claims. Of course it is a cause of expense—both the affidavit to the claim and to the answer.

42,712. There is no affidavit required with regard to the answer, unless it makes a cross-charge?—Yes, and what we have been saying before applies to that. It further suggests "that the practice as to alimony might be simplified by permitting the application to be by summons in the cause without a separate petition, entry of appearance, answer, &c."; that alimony might be asked for in the writ. The petition for alimony is practically only the substance of the affidavits that will be used in support of it after.

42,713. It is a wasted expense, you mean?—Yes, and if one wants to reserve the power to enter appearance as to alimony only, a limited appearance could be allowed; an appearance only on that point. "That applications for orders for substituted service should be by summons and not by motion; that the procedure on motions should be modified by dispensing with the case on motion." That obtains in no other branch of the court, and it means settling the document and copying it, and filing it, and paying a fee, and all the information in the affidavits and the notice of motion which have to be filed; "and that the settling of the questions for the jury should be dispensed with." They are very plain questions.

42,714. The point really you make is that there is a lot of formality which by careful looking to it the procedure might be cheapened?—Yes, and the fees reduced. The removing of this formality would do away with a number of fees at the same time, of course. "(2) That there should be discretion as to dispensing with security for the wife's costs where it is shown she is possessed of sufficient separate estate." I do not know that the note on that is of much importance.

42,715. You say on that that you passed it without due consideration to rule 158 of the Divorce Rules. That does provide for it?—Well, it provides for the registrar postponing the decision till it is brought before the court, which means further expense. I should have thought the registrar could deal with it on his own discretion in the first instance, and leave it to either party to take it to the judge then.

42,716. I think he leaves it till after for the judge if there is any question?—Yes, it is tied up and referred to the judge if there is a question:—

> "3. That the High Court should be given the same jurisdiction as is given to courts of summary jurisdiction by section 5 of the Licensing Act, 1902, without any limit as to the amount of maintenance to be allowed.

"There seems to be no good reason why the remedy of a husband or wife of a habitual drunkard should be limited to courts of summary jurisdiction, or the amount of maintenance to be allowed should be limited to 2*l.* per week. A 'habitual drunkard' is a person not amenable to lunacy jurisdiction, who is by reason of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating liquor, at times dangerous to himself or others, or incapable of managing himself or his affairs. Cases of this kind are unfortunately not confined to the poorer classes, and in cases of people in better circumstances there is great hesitation in bringing the matter before the local police courts, and the maximum allowance for maintenance is insufficient."

42,717. I do not know why that comes about in that form. It may have been overlooked. People may be habitual drunkards where they possess means as well as where they do not?—I have had cases where people would not go to the local police courts to get a remedy, and would have had means to go to London if there had been that remedy here.

42,718. At present they cannot apply here?—No.

42,719. And if they go to the magistrate they can only get an award of 2*l.* or less a week?—Yes. Then the last is the addition made at the general meeting that I referred to:—

> "4. That in cases under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and under section 5 of the Licensing Act, 1902, it should be made incumbent upon justices' clerks to to take a note of the evidence, and to supply a copy thereof to either side on payment of a prescribed fee."

Then there is reference to the fact—

"Notwithstanding repeated expressions of opinion by the judges of the Divorce Division, it is not infrequently found that no note is taken of the evidence before the magistrates, causing trouble and expense on appeal."

42,720. Have you found that yourself?—Personally I have not, but I have had it brought to my attention by practitioners who do practise in that class of work. More than one I have heard of. Not in Newcastle; I have to protect that. We have a very competent magistrates' clerk there. It is more before the country benches where no proper note is taken.

42,721. You omit from your resolutions one important matter which I myself have had to call attention to from the bench; the omission to give the reasons for the decision?—That would be a desirable addition.

42,722. We have indicated that from the bench on several occasions?—Yes.

42,723. Recollect, it is an appeal to the divisional court?—Yes.

42,724. Therefore one wants the real materials, namely, the evidence and the reasons for the decision. We have had to send cases back for that cause?—One view is it should be made incumbent on the clerk to take a note, and I agree a statement of the reasons should be given also.

42,725. On the last part of the suggestion, do you think that is a case in which there ought to be any fee at all?—For giving a copy?

42,726. The class of case is often where there is no means at all. Do you know at all what the cost of a copy of the notes of, say, three witnesses' evidence in an ordinary case of this character would be?—It would not be very much. If we take it at fourpence a folio, which I suppose is what would be asked—judging from ordinary depositions—a sovereign would cover 60 folios, which is a good deal of matter.

42,727. (Mr. Spender.) You say, Mr. Marshall, "In the public interest the publication other than in the recognised law reports of anything more than a bare statement of the result" should be prohibited. Do you contemplate in that a regular official report being taken?—No, I refer merely to the existing law reports, which give cases that have some question of real importance; not to keep a record of everything.

42,728. Do not you think in these circumstances that you contemplate it would be very important to have a full record of the court?—I do not see that the prohibition of publication in the press would render it any more necessary than it does now.

42,729. There would be no means of referring in any case to what actually occurred. There might be a difference of opinion as to the varieties of guilt on the one side and the other. People's characters and the characters of witnesses even might be in dispute?—One would never refer to a newspaper on a question of that kind, surely.

42,730. In certain cases a full report in newspapers is something that might be referred to?—My experience of newspaper reports is that they are invariably incorrect and incomplete and are of no use, and the report you get in a divorce case consists of what is supposed to be attractive so as to sell the paper and is really valueless as a report. I should think they are of very little value.

42,731. But do not you think it is desirable in the view of possible different constructions being put on a trial in a divorce case affecting people's character to have some report that could be referred to?—The only thing I would suggest would be the official shorthand writer; and there is a good deal to be said for applying that to all courts.

42,732. (Chairman.) There is an official shorthand writer in the Divorce Court?—Yes, and he has his records which can always be referred to.

42,733. (Mr. Spender.) Well, suppose this sealing up of the court is practised, do not you think that official report should be accessible?—It is accessible. A year or two ago I applied to the official shorthand writer, and I got a report of the proceedings of a case.

42,734. But I mean accessible in the sense that it might be referred to by the public?—That I should think not. Anybody who wants a record now can get it by paying for it, and I think that is sufficient.

42,735. You do not regard the public as having an interest in the case?—Yes, I do to an extent; but I think the public are sufficiently protected by the judge and the counsel and the solicitors on the two sides, and the admission of the public.

42,736. Cannot you conceive a case where there was an innocent party to a suit of this kind, and the construction put on the case may entirely depend on what took place in court. You could not arrive at it by a mere statement of the result?—No, but if the innocent party was put to proving that the general impression was wrong he could always get a copy of the transcript of the official shorthand writer and use it.

42,737. How could he prove that apart from publicity. Take a common case before us here of a more or less distinguished public man, or a man well known in his locality who has got involved in proceedings of this kind. In a case of that sort a fully reported public cross-examination is of great value to him. If you supersede that, are you going to give him any other remedy?—Well, he could get it from the official shorthand writer, and print it and circulate it if he wished.

42,738. You would allow that to be printed and circulated?—I think so—an individual to protect his character. I do not see how you can prevent it—his own evidence.

42,739. Do you see any objection to allowing newspapers to do the same?—On the whole, I do. I do not think that is the point of view from which newspapers report these cases at all, if I may say so.

42,740. Do not you think the same class of consideration refers to a vast number of criminal cases?—I do, and I think it is very regrettable ——

42,741. Then you would extend your theory and principle of shutting these courts to those cases?—I do not suggest to shut the courts at all. Courts existed before newspapers, and I do not think by prohibiting a certain amount of publication I am shutting the court.

42,742. You withdraw a particular privilege from a particular court which belongs to the other courts?—Yes.

42,743. All I want to know is whether you think that would meet the case. I am assuming your objections to details which are presumably justified. I suggest if you do that merely for one court you leave open a very wide field still to the same class of matter?—In other courts?

42,744. Yes?—There is a certain amount, no doubt. If you take any criminal court there is a certain amount of matter not desirable to be published, and which I should be glad to see prevented being published. But because you cannot deal with all that, I do not see why you should not deal with this matter in the Divorce Court, which is a crying evil.

42,745. Do not you think there is a public interest in the Divorce Court. I am not using the word "interest" in the sense of curiosity; but that the public is to a certain extent a party to a divorce proceeding?—Yes. I agree it is, but I think the judge and the counsel there, and so on, are quite sufficient protection without such reports as you get in the newspaper. I have never seen them before, but about a month ago I was in town on a Sunday, and knowing I was coming here I bought a number of Sunday newspapers; and I think the more they are prevented from publishing this kind of thing the better.

42,746. I daresay we should agree with that, but the point is to find a remedy?—I cannot personally see that the community at large would suffer by this. That is our feeling in trying to look at it from a broad point of view.

42,747. I think you said in the course of your evidence, or you laid stress on the possible variety of decisions which might arise supposing jurisdiction were extended to county courts?—Yes.

42,748. Would that objection be modified in your mind supposing the grounds of divorce were simplified or extended in such a way as to eliminate some of the main difficulties?—Obviously the main difficulty is the question of discretion; therefore, so far as you remove that element you remove the objection. The objection is to the number of 55 judges of varying character, experience, and temperament and with little opportunity of intercommunication and consulting together, and the varying of the basis on which things would be done.

42,749. Supposing the grounds of divorce were equalised between the sexes, and the ground of cruelty were eliminated, by doing that do not you think it might become a very much simpler matter?—No doubt the matter would be simplified by that.

42,750. That might modify the view of your society?—Yes, of course, if you simplify the question to be submitted you leave less room for variance of opinion, and the objection to that extent falls.

42,751. You are merely suggesting this on the assumption that the law remains as it is?—Yes.

42,752. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Your society is definitely of opinion, I gather, that divorce cases had better be heard by assize than county courts?—That is so.

42,753. And they realise in that—I mention that as it adds influence to that decision—that that involves counsel being heard at the assizes?—Yes.

42,754. So to that extent it is a self-denying ordinance?—If there is any virtue in that I think, considering the distance we are from London, the whole recommendation is a self-denying ordinance, but I do not think we considered that.

42,755. But that adds emphasis to it?—Yes.

42,756. Then you know the Committee that Lord Gorell presided over reported that counsel were necessary?—Yes.

42,757. Have you a large local bar at Newcastle?—Not a large one. We have under half-a-dozen. I think five local barristers.

42,758. Well it is a small body?—Yes.

42,759. And I suppose it would not be practically possible to get counsel in the outlying county courts for divorce cases?—Oh, it is practical—but you come to the question of expense again.

42,760. You would have to pay them?—Yes.

42,761. But the view of your society is that if jurisdiction is given to county courts then it would be wrong that the right of audience which the solicitors now have in county courts should be restricted by not being applied to that part of their jurisdiction?—Well if it is decided to apply it to county courts we presume it is with a view to cheapening and simplifying the matter, and that that would not be accomplished unless you gave the solicitors the same right of audience that they have now; and I think, broadly speaking, solicitors, as a profession, claim that they ought not to be excluded from the county courts whatever jurisdiction is given.

42,762. From any of their jurisdiction?—Yes.

42,763. And that is one of the elements before the minds of the society in coming to the conclusion that the assize was a better forum for divorce?—Yes, and the idea was also—it is rather more sentiment than anything—that it was more seemly and that there was more dignity about it. In small country towns if it is known there is going to be a divorce day there will be a crowd attracted, and a tendency, possible even to advocates, to play to the gallery, and conduct of that sort which one would not find in the case of experienced counsel in London. Cases of this kind should be treated with the gravity which they deserve.

42,764. Turning to publication of reports, I gathered from your evidence when you said you proposed that reports of cases in the law reports should continue you meant that where a report of a case was necessary for some legal purpose its publication should still be possible?—Yes.

42,765. Whether in the authorised law reports or in the unauthorised law reports?—Yes.

42,766. You were speaking of reports apart from newspapers?—Yes, we do not refer necessarily to the authorised law reports as distinct from the Law Journal and Law Times.

42,767. You mean as distinct from the ordinary press?—Yes.

42,768. It is suggested that there are cases in other courts that are unfit for publication, and that you admit?—Yes.

42,769. But would you say there is no other court except the Divorce Court where there is such a large proportion of cases the issues in which involve sexual matters and are quite sui generis?—That is the case. You get the record of any criminal court and a certain amount of material is objectionable; but in the Divorce Court it is involved in the very nature of the cases.

42,770. Then it was suggested to you that the difficulty might be removed with regard to the discretion exercised in different ways by these judges if the causes of divorce were multiplied. But is that quite so?—That was not quite the suggestion put to me. I gathered, if they were simplified and made more absolute, involving less discretion; that was the suggestion made by the other member of the Commission to me.

42,771. But the suggestion that is before the Commission is that they should be simplified by multiplication. For instance, instead of divorce being possible by a wife where there is adultery and cruelty or adultery and desertion, that divorce should be obtainable either for adultery, or for desertion, or for cruelty?—I gathered cruelty was to be done away with by the question put to me on the other side of the table.

42,772. Well, let me ask you an independent question then. Supposing cruelty became a sufficient ground of divorce by itself; I suppose your difficulty as to the different ways in which discretion might be exercised on the issue of cruelty would remain, would it not?—Yes. In the most recent case of cruelty before the President, which was the case of Cochrane v. Cochrane, a few weeks ago, one sees that.

42,773. Whatever discretion there was would remain?—Yes.

42,774. If the issue were cruelty instead of cruelty plus adultery?—Yes.

42,775. And if it were multiplied by having incurable insanity as a ground of divorce; there again the element of judicial discretion would come in, would it not?—Yes; and, of course, if that became a ground for divorce, it seems to me another reason against county courts, because, on a question of incurable insanity you would want high expert evidence, and that could only be had at expense.

42,776. And that evidence, though it might be produced on affidavit, would not be satisfactory unless it were open to cross-examination?—I should not think so. I should think such an issue could not be tried except on viva voce evidence, and to get that in the country would be necessarily expensive.

42,777. And rather difficult on the ground of expense?—Yes.

42,778. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) I suppose you recognise that if jurisdiction were given to the county courts, that jurisdiction could be limited to cases where the only issue probably was adultery?—It could be, no doubt.

42,779. And supposing the sexes were made equal, and that adultery in the husband entitled the wife to divorce, then if jurisdiction was given to the county courts, and they were at liberty to hear cases only in which adultery was a ground, the issue would be comparatively simple, would it not?—Well, it is a plain issue of fact.

42,780. I mean it is a pure issue of fact?—Yes.

42,781. Then if the grounds of divorce were extended so as to include insanity and other grounds, they could be left to the higher tribunal to decide, still giving the poorer classes the opportunity of getting to the county court where the issue was simply adultery; that could be done?—It could. Personally, I have not heard it suggested before, and it does not strike me as desirable off-hand.

42,782. The difficulty at present is that it is pretty clear from the evidence that there is a grave denial of justice to the poor people because they cannot reach the divorce court?—That is so. I know it of my own experience.

42,783. And the courts that are most readily accessible are the county courts?—Well, I suppose the magistrates' are the most readily accessible, but I agree they are a less desirable tribunal.

42,784. As judges of record they are the most accessible judges in the kingdom?—Yes.

42,785. And if the poor people could get a remedy in case of adultery it is better than leaving the condition of things as it is at present?—Well, it is a matter of degree and how one looks at these things. I have known cases in which the impossibility of going to London—I had one last year—resulted in the parties coming together again, and they have lived together happily until now.

42,786. That would be a reason for not allowing divorce at all?—I think a little delay is not to be regretted.

42,787. Well, the expense is the question; not so much the delay. Now, take the assizes; I suppose you are aware that the London Law Incorporated Society objects to assize?—Yes, I think they did. I had a conversation with Mr. Winterbotham in the early part of the year about it, and I believe that is so.

42,788. Is not there this difficuly about the assizes. First of all it would be very difficult to get a special day fixed at the assizes to hear these cases; and in the next place the parties would have to go some distance to the assize town and wait till the case came on?—They are in exactly the same position as other litigants. If the litigant in other cases cannot get a fixed day——

42,789. The answer is that in other matters you do offer the county court for the poor people and that is why those courts were created?—Yes, to an extent, but we measure these other matters by money—you give jurisdiction up to 100*l.*; here it is not so; it is adultery or cruelty and the issue is the same whatever class it is, and the reason you are going to give the facilities is the position of the parties and not the question to be tried.

42,790. Originally in the county courts—in 1846—it was in reference to the access for the poor people?—I should keep the county courts myself more strictly to their original purpose and make a more reasonable arrangement for the assizes.

42,791. You would put the clock back?—I certainly would not put it above 100*l.* I should not increase it beyond what it is now. In populous places they could not deal with it.

42,792. One thing with regard to Northumberland. I think there are six or seven towns in the circuit, are there not?—Oh, more than that.

42,793. I have not got my returns here; I expected you to give evidence to-morrow?—Newcastle, Gateshead, Hexham, North Shields, Morpeth, Blyth, Alnwick, Wooler, Rothbury, Belford, Berwick, Bellingham. That is more than six and I may have missed one.

42,794. They are small places?—Alnwick is a county town; Hexham is a largish county town; North Shields is a place with large works and riverside industries. Blyth is a large shipping port, with docks and shipbuilding yards.

42,795. But it is strange you have not got a bankruptcy registry except at Newcastle?—I do not think it is needed, in my experience. There has been no demand for it. Newcastle is perhaps, in a sense, the capital of the district and the Tyneside is where most of the business centres. You do not get much further north than Blyth for industrial matters, and that is about the limit of the colliery area. The south-east section is the industrial part; the other is mostly large farms and moors.

42,796. Then Newcastle; is that readily accessible to most of them?—Yes, to all of them of importance. There are some places, such as Rothbury, which are not very accessible. There are people there who do business in Newcastle, and come in by the early morning train and leave by the evening; and Bellingham the same. Belford is on the main line north, and most trains stop there.

42,797. But it is a hardship to the poor, and perhaps in fact an impossibility, to travel a great distance with their witnesses unless they are absolutely certain of getting their cases heard on the day they are fixed?—It is a hardship, and it must be a hardship until you can settle how much legal work you can get through in a day. We must all put up with it, whether it is in the High Court or the county court.

42,798. If it can be removed by giving the county court jurisdiction——?—I do not know how it can. You cannot now get special days in the county court, and if you do not a longish case may intervene, and you may have to wait a day or two.

42,799. That only requires an Act of Parliament to enable the county court judge to sit longer than he does. Your county court judge sits 128 days in the year?—He sits at Newcastle for a week each month, and it is a very full week, and if you have an exceptional case he is very good in giving special days, but he has then to rearrange work elsewhere. If the county court is to be mainly for small-debt collecting and that class of thing, the work that is put on them now and this proposed increase will interfere with its original function.

42,800. But they have ceased to be mere debt-collecting courts; there is bankruptcy business and workmen's compensation.

(Chairman.) Have not we gone over all this before?

(Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Yes, I think we have.

(Witness.) Might I just say, as you have mentioned workmen's compensation, when you come to deal with discretion in adultery and cruelty, one has seen how discretion works out when applying the Workmen's Compensation Act.

42,801. That would apply equally to every High Court judge that had jurisdiction?—To an extent, undoubtedly. It would be as 18 to 55, or something of that sort.

42,802. Do you think that the solicitors in Northumberland would be willing to conduct poor cases without payment?—That is a question of degree again. I have no doubt whatever, and this I have no hesitation in saying, that if a poor's roll were established we should find competent men who would be willing to do it.

42,803. (Chairman.) I just want to ask you one matter. You drew a distinction between law reports and the newspapers. I suppose you know, and probably have remembered, that the law reports are published many months after, when everything connected with the case is dead except the legal aspect of it?—Yes.

42,804. Then you mentioned a recent case with regard to cruelty. Is it your view that the fact that cruelty is an adjunct to adultery for the woman to prove, if the adultery is proved the tendency is to minimise the necessity for the proof of the cruelty as much as possible?—I think it is perfectly obvious.

42,805. Supposing a case rested only on cruelty, and there was an adequate definition, would not that make a great difference to the position?—I think so. A greater strictness would be required, and there would be a less desire to help the woman probably.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much for coming and giving your evidence, Mr. Marshall.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FIFTY-FOURTH DAY.

Tuesday, 20th December 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The Right Hon. The EARL OF DERBY, G.C.V.O., C.B.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
Sir WILLIAM ANSON, Bart., M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORGE WHITE, M.P.
His Honour JUDGE TINDAL ATKINSON.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).

Dr. CARL NEUHAUS called and examined.

42,806. (Chairman.) You are a Doctor Juris, and a retired judge of the district court at Spandau, Prussia?—Yes, that is the last court I was at.

42,807. You are now practising as an adviser in German Law at 62, London Wall. You studied prior to your judicial work for three years at the Universities at Heidelberg, Berlin, and Göttingen in Germany?—Yes.

42,808. You took your degree as Doctor Juris at Göttingen in 1874, and after having passed the two examinations necessary for the Civil Service of Justice, being prepared by a period of four years, became a permanent judge, and you have for a period of 36 years officiated in the district courts of Gross-Strehlitz, Wittenberge and Spandau?—Yes.

42,809. During that period had you jurisdiction in matrimonial causes?—Yes, I had.

42,810. You are, therefore, fully able to express an opinion as to German law in respect of the questions which will be dealt with by you, and that opinion has been formed from your knowledge and experience?—Yes, I think so.

42,811. If it will be convenient to you I would like to ask you to read from the paper you have been good enough to prepare, and then I will ask you any questions which arise?—" First, as to how marriages are contracted. For the last 40 years there has been—and is still existing—in Germany a law whereby it is compulsory that marriages take place before a civil registrar. This law was first introduced in Prussia, having subsequently been adopted by the whole German Empire, and thus became universally obligatory throughout the Empire and was confirmed by the German Civil Code on the 1st of January 1900. The Code governs only civil marriage, leaving it to the Church to secure compliance with its behests. The civil law, however, claims priority of compliance with its statute and prohibits by penalty any celebration of an ecclesiastical marriage before the clergyman has satisfied himself that the civil marriage has been duly contracted. The registrar is an employee of the local authority acting under the supervision of the Government. The engaged couple have to go to the registrar at a time appointed by him, and the contracting parties have there to state verbally that they desire to become husband and wife. It is merely by virtue of this declaration that the civil marriage is contracted; the signatures are not essential. If there is any legal impediment known to the registrar, he has to refute the celebration of the marriage. The number of civil impediments to marriage has been much reduced in comparison with those imposed by the Church. Persons are not allowed to get married if they are under 21 or 16 years respectively."

42,812. That is 21 for the man and 16 for the woman?—Yes. " If there is guardianship, or adoption, or too near a degree of relationship or affinity between them, or if one of the parties is already married. A civil marriage is valid and binding on the parties, whether the ecclesiastical marriage be sought in addition or not, but the civil law imposes no prohibition against any threats to disadvantages or punishment which the Church may direct against or inflict upon its members."

42,813. Your second heading is "Jurisdiction in Matrimonial Causes"?—Yes. "Divorce petitions are filed in county courts (Landgericht) and are decided by three judges in collegio. County courts in Germany are established for districts of about 250,000 inhabitants (rarely less, but very often more)."

42,814. A county court in England is a court of quite a limited jurisdiction, only up to a small sum of money; the county court in Germany is a court of unlimited jurisdiction?—Yes, there are no limits. It begins at 600 marks, or 30*l.* in money suits, and has no limit as to higher figures.

42,815. The term "county court" would not describe it?—No; it is only a free translation.

42,816. It means a court for the district?—There are about 15 county courts in a province like Brandenburg. It will be seen best from the fact that there are 250,000 inhabitants for the district of a county court.

42,817. The point is it has unlimited jurisdiction?—Yes. "The district has mostly such an area that a party in order to arrive at the court has not to travel a further distance than 50 kilometers (30 miles). Higher in jurisdiction than the county courts are the superior county courts (Oberlandesgerichte)—of these there is only one in each province—to which appeals are made. Every province has a superior county court, and there are 29 in all in the whole German Empire. Besides the county courts which have to deal with divorce cases, a preparatory function is conferred upon the district courts (Amtsgericht), in which single judges preside. According to the German civil law a divorce case can only be dealt with after an official effort to effect reconciliation has failed. A judge (Amtsrichter) is specially appointed to exercise this office. He is fitted for this function since the district courts have not a large district and the judge is amongst and acquainted with the population. A husband or wife must therefore first apply to the district court if he or she wishes to take proceedings to obtain a divorce against the other party. The district court summons both parties to appear and attempts to reconcile them. The judge has the power to refuse to see a proxy (lawyer, counsel). On the other hand, a judge in Prussia or Bavaria is obliged to inform the clergyman to whose parish the parties belong of the imminent attempt of reconciliation, in order that he may act hand in hand with the judge. If the defendant does not appear or an understanding is not come to, the party which has issued the writ receives a notification that the attempt was unsuccessful. These attempts at reconciliation when first introduced were considered to be of great advantage to the public, but experience has proved that reconciliation seldom occurs."

42,818. Is that the experience that you yourself have found?—I had it myself.

42,819. Is that the general opinion?—That is the general opinion, and I had it for about 30 years. Very seldom a reconciliation has taken place before this district court before the Amtsgericht. "But more important still and more successful in practice is the power of the court to summon the parties to appear and attempt a reconciliation at any stage of the proceedings, and this success is attributable to the fact that a time frequently arrives when all the evidence is taken, at which the parties are inclined to forgive one another."

42,820. Can you give any idea to what extent that is successful?—I have not read any statistics about that. I could not give an answer upon that, but I heard about it from the judges of the higher court that it seldom occurs, that when the evidence of both parties has been taken, and they see there is something wrong one against the other, they are prepared and willing for reconciliation. I heard it was seldom and in a few cases, but there are no statistics I could read.

42,821. My impression is that at some stage of this inquiry it was mentioned that there were some statistics showing that there was a considerable number?—I have read the statistics of the German Empire, the last edition, but there have been only the grounds of divorce; there are no statistics on this point.

42,822. Then will you read your next paragraph?—

"Facilities enjoyed by the Poorer Classes in taking Proceedings and obtaining Judgment in Divorce Cases.

"The facilities given by the German law are not only applicable to divorce cases but also to any other claim which may be enforced by law. There is first the advantage of being in reasonable neighbourhood to the courts, in no case is the district of a county court on which the jurisdiction in matrimonial matters is conferred so extended that it cannot be reached by everybody without much expense and loss of time. A much more important concession which should be taken into consideration is the passing of the Poor Law (Armenrecht) (the right of free legal assistance, which according to German process is granted to every plaintiff or defendant under certain conditions. Its effect is that the poor party is not compelled to pay court's and lawyer's fees and obtains the free services of a lawyer on his behalf."

42,823. Is every lawyer obliged to take the cases up, or are there a certain number who put their names down on a list as ready to take them up?—Every lawyer who has a practice in the county court is obliged to take this office. They are taken one after another.

42,824. How long does each take it for? You say each one after the other takes it?—One case after the other is attributed to a different lawyer.

42,825. Who does that?—The President of the Court in fixing the hearing and making the decree by which the Poor Law is given, at the same time puts down the name of the lawyer whose turn it is.

42,826. That may be every lawyer in the district?—Yes.

42,827. He takes them in order one after the other?—Yes. "In order to obtain the Poor Law the party has to produce a certificate of the local police to the court that he is not in a position to pay the fees of the court without affecting the maintenance of himself and that of his family. The court has further to convince itself before granting the Poor Law that the proceeding is not raised mischievously or that there is no chance of success. Having satisfied itself on these points, the court where the proceedings have to take place, declares in an order that the party is permitted to take advantage of the Poor Law, and that he is exempt from the fees and receives the aid of a lawyer. A further facility for the poor party is connected with the manner of calculating the fees prescribed in Germany. The fees increase with the value of the object in question, process (such as divorce cases) for instance in which money is not the issue will be fixed at a certain amount. This estimate may be so low in divorce cases concerning the poor classes that the party, if the Poor Law has not been granted, is not much affected by the amount of the fees."

42,828. Is there any difference between the lawyer and the barrister in Germany, or is he one?—We know only the Rechtsanwaelte. They take over the proceedings from the parties and at the same time are acting before the court. There is no difference between lawyers and counsellors.

42,829. The lawyer, I suppose, has to render his services free when the order is made?—Yes; he is not entitled to any fees, and he has to postpone the claim of expenses too.

42,830. What happens about the expenses, for instance, of bringing witnesses and making copies of the papers?—The fees for the witnesses have to be paid by the court, by the Exchequer, by the royal cash.

42,831. Out of public money?—Yes. In any court we have our cash, and the cash has to pay all expenses for witnesses, and if the party is not poor, they are recovered from the parties; in any other case, if the Poor Law has been granted, they will not be recovered.

42,832. That would apply to other expenses besides witnesses, like copying the papers?—Yes, that is all the same; the court has to pay for it, if the Poor Law has been granted.

42,833. Where does the court money come from? Is that from the local taxation or the national taxation?—The cash is from the national taxation. There is a chief cash, for Prussia in Berlin, and all the cashes are under the supervision of the Minister of Justice, and it is from the common public cash.

42,834. The common fund of the country?—Yes.

42,835. The result is that the poor man, if he succeeds in getting this order, has his case carried through for nothing?—Yes.

42,836. Suppose he is successful and there is a defendant who might be able to pay, is he able to get anything back from that defendant?—Yes, he can get it from the defendant if he is well-to-do or has the means. In this case the Court fees also will be recovered from the defendant. When Judgment has been obtained against any party, they have to pay the fees of both parties and the costs of the court, so that if there is a convicted party in good means he has to pay the costs of the plaintiff, if the judgment is given for him, and the public costs too, the court fees.

42,837. If he had the means would he be obliged to pay those three things—the court fees, the lawyers' fees for services, and the expenses of witnesses, and so forth—everything?—Everything. In this case the lawyer, who is given on the ground of the Poor Law, has to claim his fees, too, and they will be paid by the defendant if the judgment is given against him.

42,838. That system is a complete one for enabling the poorest person to enforce his claim for practically nothing, and, if he succeeds against a person who has money, that person has to pay the expenses?—Quite so.

42,839. Will you continue with your next point, please?—

"The Question of Publication of Detailed Reports of Divorce Cases.

"There is no doubt that the reports in newspapers publishing details of divorce cases do a lot of harm. The people are accustomed to find these reports in their papers, and it is of no use any single newspaper omitting them unless all newspapers stop these publications. Germany is not used to these sensations and very rarely are there publications of divorce cases in every detail which has been brought before the court. The newspaper would, moreover, not be in a position to publish such reports, as the German courts may exclude the public from the hearing of civil and criminal causes if thereby in its opinion harm may be done to public morality or to the commonwealth. The courts usually make use of this power in matrimonial causes, so that the pleadings of the lawyers and the evidence of the witnesses are only heard by the court officials and there is therefore no chance for the papers to publish anything. Only the judgment must be published, and the judge can by doing this avoid everything which would endanger public morality. Complaints that the public is not permitted to hear proceedings of matrimonial causes are not made. My next point is

"The Grounds which justify a Divorce of a Marriage according to German Civil Law.

"First it must be mentioned that in Germany both sexes enjoy the same rights, and the wife is not obliged to suffer anything done by her husband which would, if done by herself, give him a reason for divorce. The following are the main grounds:—

"Adultery, bigamy and fornication contrary to nature (sodomy or bestiality). A single case of either of the above grounds is sufficient to give the other party the right of obtaining a divorce. A further ground for divorce is the attempt by husband or wife to kill the other. This ground is established if the one party does acts leading to the destruction of the other party's life. Threats or brutalities are not sufficient but there must be an actual attempt on the life of one party by the other."

42,840. Suppose the brutality which you refer to is violent blows and conduct which would not lead to the destruction of life, but which would be so violent as to injure and to leave marks, is that not a ground?—That would be a ground under the general clause: that would be a ground just as immorality in the general clause on the relative grounds, but that is not an absolute ground.

42,841. Not on the clause "attempt on life"?—No. "A further ground is malicious desertion if this state exists at least one year. In order to obtain a judgment for divorce on account of insanity it is necessary that illness should have lasted at least three years, and it must have been so serious that it is impossible to live in intellectual community, and that a recovery is not expected. The remaining ground of divorce under German Civil Code is the serious breach of his or her conjugal duties, or dishonourable or immoral conduct. The law directs that a husband or wife may obtain a divorce if the conjugal community is injuriously affected by conduct which is contrary to duty or dishonourable or immoral, and, if owing to this behaviour, the continuation of marriage is impossible. Under this general clause may be placed cruelties, threats, insults and indignities. All vices and bad habits may furnish a sufficient ground that the above-mentioned criterions exist and that a continuation of marriage cannot reasonably be expected. There is no doubt that by this general clause a great discretion has been conferred upon the courts, and judges of long years' experience are selected for the wise application of these provisions of the law. During the last ten years —since 1st of January 1900 —no complaints have been made of an abuse by a judge of his function or discretion in this respect."

42,842. That general clause about the violation of marital duties and dishonourable or immoral conduct, and so on, is discretionary?—Yes, that is relative in the one case or in the other. It depends on the standard of life, and whether they are of good education and of good means or not, and whether the cruelties are heavy or not. That is only relative. There is no absolute ground, but it depends on the gravity of the act.

42,843. It is in the discretion of the judge?—Yes.

42,844. The other grounds are not discretionary?—No, they are absolute grounds for divorce.

42,845. With regard to the selection of judges for this district, what steps are taken about that? You say that the general clause gives a great discretion?—Yes.

42,846. What steps are taken to select special judges for that?—The president judges of any county court have to constitute the single chamber of the court, and that is the only possibility to make a choice of the judges. They will appoint in those divorce chambers judges who have great experience.

42,847. How many judges are there of what you term county courts?—In the single chamber are three judges who have to decide.

42,848. How many are there altogether?—That depends on the number of the inhabitants of the district. The least are eight judges—a president, a director, and six other judges, to form a criminal chamber and a civil chamber.

42,849. How many does the largest consist of?—In Berlin, the biggest, about 100 or more judges in one court.

42,850. It only means that the president in these discretionary cases has the most experienced judges?—Yes; they have periods to make the appointment. There are always reports given, and they have the supervision of the judgment and of the manner of hearing and acting. It is not only the president who makes the appointment, but also the presiduum, which consists of the president himself and all the directors, and the oldest judge. In Berlin there are about 30 in this presiduum who have to make every year the appointment of the judges for the single divisions.

42,851. You said there were about 100 judges in Berlin?—More than that.

42,852. About 30 of those would take these cases?—It may be.

(Chairman.) I think that gives us a sufficient idea. I will leave it to the other Commissioners, if they wish to ask about it.

42,853. (Sir George White.) We understand that every province has three courts of different degrees: first of all, the district court with one judge, a county court with three judges, and a superior county court?—Yes.

42,854. Is it before the county court of three judges that the divorce case must go?—Yes; they have to go at first to the county courts before three judges, and after that, if there is an appeal they go to the superior court, Oberlandesgerichte, and there are five judges sitting: and if there is any mistake about the laws, there is given a revision and a further remedy to the Imperial Court at Leipzig. There is a further hearing before the second court, before the superior Oberlandesgerichte. Then, if there is any ground of revision the parties must go to Leipzig to the Imperial Court.

42,855. That would be on points of law?—Yes; the district court, the Amtsgericht has only the preparatory hearing and the attempt at reconciliation. The principal and the first hearing is before the county court, the Landesgerichte, which consists of three judges.

42,856. Three judges sitting together?—Yes.

42,857. The poorer people, having proved their right to be on the Poor Law, can actually get a case through without any expense whatever?—Yes, without any expenses; they have not to pay any fees or expenses at all.

42,858. In the case of the district court which has to make the preliminary examination, supposing the parties have come before that court and have not proved their case sufficiently for it to go to the county court, would they still be paid their expenses although they failed?—In the district court there is no proof and no evidence. There are only the parties heard. The plaintiff states his grounds and gives his case for a divorce, and the defendant contends, or denies it, and they say whether they are willing for reconciliation or not. That is the hearing before the Amtsgericht, the district court. There is only one short hearing, and if there is no willingness to reconciliation there is an end of it, and they must go to the county court, and there is the proceeding.

42,859. There is simply the personal expense of the party applying? They would have to bear that if they failed to make their case good?—Yes.

42,860. There is no evidence called, except their own testimony?—Only the statement of one party and the other. They are asked if there is any willingness to reconciliation or not.

42,861. You give us the special grounds upon which divorce can be obtained, and then the general grounds. Is divorce very extensive in Germany? Do you know the statistics as compared with England?—No, there are not so many cases. In a year there are 30,000 marriages before the registrars, and there are, I think, between 5 and 10 per cent. of divorces of that number—about 2,000 to 3,000 divorces in the year.

42,862. You mean 30,000 marriages for the whole German Empire?—Yes.

42,863. (Chairman.) What is the whole population?—The population is 60,000,000. I have read there are about 30,000 marriages in a year.

42,864. Is that all?

42,865. (Sir George White.) Surely it cannot be so?—I do not think I make a mistake. I did not put down the figures.

42,866. I do not recollect the number of marriages in England, but I should have imagined it was a very much larger number than that. Are you right as to your percentage of divorces, 5 to 10 per cent.?—Yes. There is no comparison with the first number. They are not existing marriages, but the marriages contracted in one year. In one year it is quite another figure, 2,000 to 3,000.

42,867. You mean 5 to 10 per cent. of the existing married people?—No; the two figures are not to be compared. The marriages contracted in one year, not the marriages existing, and the others are the number of the per cent. of the existing marriages.

42,868. That I understand, but I think you must be wrong about the number.

42,869. (Chairman.) We have the statistics for Germany given in the great census book published in America, and unless you are quite sure about the figures, I think we had better be sure you are quite accurate?—You had better leave that.

42,870. If you have not the figures it is a little dangerous?—Yes, because I did not put them down.

42,871. (Sir George White.) So far as you know, no abuse has occurred in consequence of the wide discretion which the judges have upon the general grounds of divorce. There is no complaint against their discretion?—No, there has not been any complaint.

42,872. There is no lowering of the status of marriage in consequence of their decisions?—No, I do not think so.

42,873. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Could you tell us what is the position of the judges who try divorce cases as compared with the position of judges in England? Would they be High Court judges?—I do not follow.

42,874. Would the judges who deal with divorce cases correspond to the High Court judges in England?—I do not think they are in such a high position. In the first court in which every proceeding is taken they are not of a high position. If we have passed the second examination, a few years after that, we can become judges in the county courts. They are quite young judges, too, in this High Court, and they earn very low salaries, too; their position cannot be compared with the position of English judges at all. We have such a big number and small salaries only; it is quite another standard and quite another position.

42,875. With regard to the poor, the State bears what expense has to be borne?—Yes.

42,876. Does that come to a large sum per annum?—No, there are only the expenses of the witness who count almost. The fees are very low in these cases if the Poor Law has been granted.

42,877. With regard to the lawyer, he receives no fee from the petitioner: does he receive a fee from the State?—No, that is only in criminal cases if there is a lawyer appointed. In criminal cases, when a lawyer is necessary, the State pays the fees of counsel.

42,878. With regard to the grounds of divorce, is insanity commonly brought forward?—Not very often. It is not very easy to prove this ground. The insanity must have taken place during the matrimony, it must begin during the matrimony and must last for three years, and there must be no hope that the insane party will recover.

42,879. Upon what evidence is that claim of incurability based?—By doctors. At first the acts of insanity have to be proved before the court, and then there is the expert evidence of the doctors.

42,880. The actual judgment rests with the court to decide whether he is curable or not?—Yes: it has only the aid of the experts and the evidence of the witnesses.

42,881. Is that evidence often conflicting, to your knowledge?—Yes, there are many conflicts, and it is not very easy for the court to find its way in the conflict.

42,882. Do you happen to know of any instance where a divorce has been granted and the person against whom the divorce has been granted has recovered?—No, I do not think so.

42,883. From the point of view of the insane, is there any feeling in Germany that it is hard upon the insane population?—Yes, there is a common feeling against this ground of insanity. It is not approved very much to take this ground of divorce.

42,884. The disapproval is based on the interest of the insane?—In the interest of the insane. It seems to be not a matter of equity to take this ground.

42,885. There is no limit of age. The insane person may be over 50?—There is no limit.

42,886. Do you think that this ground is made a cause of abuse?—I do not think so, but I can only say there is no great feeling for it.

42,887. (Sir William Anson.) I understand that the function of the Amtsgericht is merely to try to reconcile the parties, and on failure to send the case on for trial to the county court?—No, the Amtsgericht has not to send the case on to the county court: the Amtsrichter only has to give a certificate that before him there has been no success, that the attempt at reconciliation has not been successful. Then his business is done: it is only to give this certificate, and this certificate must be brought with a statement of claim to the county court.

42,888. So that a party could not go to the county court unless they had previously been to the Amtsrichter?—Yes, they have to go there.

42,889. As regards the three judges who sit in collegio, is any effort made to secure that the same three judges should always try divorce cases because they have acquired special experience?—I do not think so: they may be together for several years, for more than one year. It is in the interest of the judges to vary the functions.

42,890. Are the judges chosen from a professional class, from the persons who practice, the barristers?—No, there is another way with us. After having passed the two examinations in Germany we can make a choice whether we will become lawyers or judges; lawyers or Rechtsanwaelte we can be at once after the second examination, but to become judges we have to have several years' preparation as assistant judge: they are not on the permanent staff. The judges are not selected from the bar.

42,891. As regards an appeal, does an appeal lie on questions of fact as well as of law?—Yes, but the revision is only upon law. The Imperial Court at Leipzig have only to deal with revision of the law and not of the facts.

42,892. (Mr. Burt.) There is just one point on which I would like to be clear. I understand from your evidence that there is no difference as regards the sexes as to the grounds of divorce; that is, the unfaithful husband is placed on the same footing as the unfaithful wife?—Yes, there is full equality between the two sexes. The same grounds that give the right to the husband give it to the wife, one case or more. One case is sufficient for the wife as well as the husband. There is an equal condition for the two sexes.

42,893. (Mrs. Tennant.) Has that always been the law; has there always been equality between the sexes under the German law?—It has always been so. Also before the new Civil Code was valid it was always the same. It was also the case with the Code Napoleon that there should be equality. There was another legal condition. In our German laws it was the same for the wife and husband always.

42,894. Is there a feeling in Germany in favour of that equality?—Quite in favour. There is no idea to make a difference between the two sexes.

42,895. There is no expression of a contrary feeling?—No, not at all.

42,896. Are there any statistics which show the number of cases brought by the wife against the husband on the ground of unfaithfulness?—No, I do not think so.

42,897. I think I understand from you that a year's malicious desertion is sufficient ground for a divorce?—Yes.

42,898. Is so short a period considered to work well?—If there is no hope that the husband or wife will come back to the other party, it seems to be sufficient in our opinion.

42,899. I gather there is in Germany a body of opinion against insanity being a ground of divorce. Is there any similar body of opinion in respect to desertion?—No. There is a feeling more in the courts than in the public. There is no favour for this ground of insanity. There is always an opinion that is not quite fair to take this ground. If one party has fallen into illness it is not considered fair to take this ground for divorce. It is not taken easily and judgment is seldom given against the insane party unless there is a very strong case.

42,900. Is there a similar opinion that a year is a dangerously short period?—I have never heard of it.

42,901. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You told us that the German Civil Code started in 1900?—Yes.

42,902. And that the divorce law in that Code obtained in Prussia previously, it was established in Prussia before that date?—No, there was in Prussia das allgemeine Landrecht, and other parts of the Roman Law in different parts of Prussia. They were not the same grounds. The Prussian Landrecht had, for instance, more grounds for divorce than the German Civil Code now has.

42,903. How long was that going on in Prussia?—From 1786 till the end of the 19th century. It was valid for about 114 years. In Hanover and other Provinces we had Roman Law, the Corpus Juris till the Civil Code was introduced.

42,904. Was what you have called the relative ground of divorce, the last general heading, in existence in Prussia or any part of Germany before the German Code?—No, it is a new regulation to have this general clause. There was in some legislation misconduct, and it was different in different parts of Germany. It was new legislation.

42,905. Starting in 1900?—Yes.

42,906. Is it much used?—Very much used, and the different courts have different opinions. One goes further or not so far as another.

42,907. The discretion of one tribunal is different from the discretion of the other?—Yes.

42,908. Does that work well?—It does work very well.

42,909. Although there is a variation in the way the judges use their powers?—Depending on the standards of the different classes, and the degrees of cruelty and immorality, and misdemeanour, and so on.

42,910. Would it be right to say that the majority of divorce decrees in Germany are obtained under that power?—Yes.

42,911. How many judges are there in Germany dealing with divorce? I gather there is a very large number?—Yes, it must be. There is in each county court at least one chamber of three judges. In Berlin there may be about 18 or 21 judges in the one county court of Berlin.

42,912. I did not want to trouble you to go into detail with regard to different districts. I thought you might be able to tell me about how many judges there are altogether in the Empire dealing with divorce, county court judges and high court judges?—Between 300 and 400.

42,913. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) There would be about 200 of these county courts dealing with these matters?—It may be nearly 200.

42,914. If you put three judges in each court it would bring it up to nearly 600 judges dealing with divorce?—Yes. In the smaller county courts they have to deal with divorce cases, as well as with other things.

42,915. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) My question was not what judges dealt with it exclusively. I want to get how many judges there are who have divorce jurisdiction?—That is quite another thing.

42,916. Can you answer that?—That must be a higher number.

42,917. Can you give any idea of the number who have divorce jurisdiction although they may have other jurisdiction?—3,000 is not too high.

42,918. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) In Germany, supposing the only ground is adultery, are most of the cases undefended?—There are a great many undefended cases.

42,919. Of course, when you get to the relative grounds they are defended?—Yes.

42,920. In the simple ground of adultery are they generally undefended proceedings?—Not generally, but there are more undefended cases with the ground of adultery.

42,921. (Mr. Brierley.) What is the rule in Germany as to the court to which a petitioner has to go for divorce?—He has to go to the court where the other party is domiciled. Between man and wife it is always the domicile of the husband.

42,922. Is that domicile in the sense of permanent residence?—Yes.

42,923. He cannot choose by change of residence?—No, it depends on his residence.

42,924. As to the relative grounds, there may be a very great difference in the standard of dishonourable conduct of the different judges. There is no practice in Germany of seeking a particular court?—No, you cannot do that; it is not possible.

42,925. (Chairman.) In the Landgericht, which is the court that takes the divorce cases, which you call the county court, the three judges sitting in collegio?—Yes.

42,926. Do the three judges sit in all cases, whether it is divorce or not?—Yes, in all cases the same number.

42,927. No jury?—No jury in civil cases—only in criminal cases.

42,928. With regard to their standing, what would be—if you do not mind telling us—the salary of each of those three judges, roughly?—It is between 250*l.* and 400*l.* per annum, beginning with 150*l.*, the Amtsrichter and the Landrichter. The judge of the district court and the judge of the county court are of the same standing. It begins with 150*l.* per annum, and the highest salary of the members of the county court and the district court is the same, 360*l.* with recompense for residence, so that it may be 400*l.* Only the president and the presiding judges and the directors have higher salaries, about 500*l.* to 600*l.*

42,929. You may become a member of the Landgericht at some time after the second examination?—Yes.

42,930. How long is the average time?—That depends on the faculties and how you pass the examination. It is always marked whether one judge has had a good examination and a good degree, and those who have better degrees will be appointed earlier as Landrichter.

42,931. Can you give an idea of what time a fairly competent young man would expect to elapse between his examination and becoming a member of the Landgericht?—The average age may be 28 years to pass the second examination, and the average time to become a member of the Landgericht, if he becomes a judge at once without practising in the district court, is three to five years. If he prefers to be an Amstrichter he will be at first a member of the district court, and then he can become a member of the Landgericht five to six years later on. The judges who pass the best examination will be preferred in the higher courts.

42,932. You passed your second examination when 28?—I was 26 when I passed: it was a little early.

42,933. How low down can you go in number of years before you pass your second examination?—It depends on the year when you go to the university. We leave the gymnasium, the high school, about 18 to 19, and then we have to have three years of university studies and the first examination, and four years of preparation service without salary, and then the second examination. The first examination takes three months, and the second examination about six months.

42,934. Would it be right to say that at 26 to 28 you may pass your second examination?—We had better say 28 to 30.

42,935. In three or four years or so afterwards you may be appointed?—It must be four years of preparation.

42,936. After the examination?—After the examination. I had to wait—they were bad times—four years before I became a judge on the permanent staff, and I have only been in the district court and only as assistant judge. I have taken part in several county courts during those four years when I was assistant judge.

42,937. You may become a Landgericht judge between the ages of 32 and 35?—Yes.

42,938. There is one other general matter I want to ask you about. What do you say as to the general working of the law of divorce in Germany? Does it meet with general satisfaction or not?—Yes, it gives great satisfaction generally.

42,939. I was not sure with regard to one matter connected with insanity, whether the feeling that you spoke of was a feeling confined to the judges who tried the cases or to the general population?—More in the courts than in the population.

42,940. The judges feel the difficulty of it, you mean?—The judges are very loth to give judgment on the ground of insanity.

42,941. How is it regarded by the general population as far as you are able to form any idea?—I recollect several cases in which there was no good feeling against this ground.

42,942. I am not sure what that means. Do you mean there was a feeling that it was not right?—It was not right to have this ground of divorce, to take proceedings for divorce on this ground.

42,943. You have known several cases?—Yes.

42,944. Speaking generally?—Yes, the feeling was general, and it was still a greater feeling in the court.

42,945. We were told that that question was very much debated in the German Parliament at the time of the passing of the Bill, and it was carried ultimately by a majority. I think, speaking from recollection, the figures were something like 160 to 130?—It was not with a great majority that this ground was granted.

42,946. Did you make any study of the numbers at that time?—No. I was only at that time in the preparation of the whole law, and I could not go into those details.

42,947. (Sir George White.) Bearing upon the salaries of these judges, is it not right to assume the fees and earnings of the legal profession generally are very much below the corresponding fees in this country, so far as you know?—Yes, they are low indeed, but the standard of life of the judges is not a high one. You will find in Germany that they are nevertheless content, and the idea of being judges is very high, and the judges generally are satisfied with the salaries. They have been altered and become higher in the last few years, but not much. Most of the judges are living in small towns, in very small places, in villages, I daresay, in places of 2,000 or 3,000 inhabitants, and they have not to spend so much money, so that they are content. The people think very highly of the judges and so they are satisfied.

42,948. They take the position for its own sake rather than for the salary?—Yes. If they want to earn a lot of money they can become lawyers.

42,949. We should not be justified in judging of their status or ability by the salary?—No.

42,950. (Sir William Anson.) Is the judge of the district court of the same status as the judges of the county court?—Yes, quite the same status.

42,951. A man does not begin in the district court and move up to the county court?—No, they do not move up: they remain in the same status, in the same class of salary.

42,952. (Chairman.) Who in Germany does the small debt work, 20*l.* cases, and things of that kind? If you have a suit for 10*l.* or 20*l.*, who does that?—The Amtsgericht.

42,953. That is the county court?—The district court. The district courts have jurisdiction up to 30*l.*

(Chairman.) I ought to thank you very much indeed for your valuable evidence. May I also mention the excellent way in which you speak English.

M. HENRI MESNIL called and examined.

42,954. (Chairman.) What is your legal qualification?—I am a French avocat and a doctor of law. I now practice in England. Before I practised in England I practised for 11 years as avocat in the Court of Appeal of Paris.

42,955. And, again, before that what did you do?—I began my professional career as avocat in the Court of Appeal of Paris and practised there for 11 years.

42,956. And then came to England?—Yes.

42,957. How long have you been in England?—Since 1897.

42,958. In France the profession of avocat and the judicial profession are quite separate?—Yes.

42,959. The training for one is not the training for the other?—Except this, before you can be appointed as a judge you must have been an avocat for three years.

42,960. You have been good enough to prepare a short memorandum upon the subject of divorce with regard to France. May I suggest that you should read it to us, and then we can ask you about it?—Yes. "The history of divorce is intimately connected with the history of the influence of the Roman Catholic Church. Divorce was introduced into our law during the Revolution, at a time when Catholic influence had not to be reckoned with in the sphere of politics, by the law of the 20th of September 1792, and this law was much used during the revolutionary period. Although the Concordat had been signed three years before the Civil Code came into force (in 1804), the Church was not strong enough at that time to prevent the institution of divorce from finding its place in the work of Bonaparte's commissioners. But the Restoration came, and one of the first laws passed under the then all-powerful inspiration of the clergy, was the Act of the 8th of May 1816, which abolished divorce. It was only after the Third Republic had been in existence for nearly 14 years and had begun to get the better of clerical opposition, that, on the 27th of July 1884, divorce resumed its place in the Civil Code. The law of 1884 did not reinstate the institution with all its features of 1804; a notable part of the Code Napoléon in this matter has remained repealed up to now, that is, Chapter III. of Title VI., which relates to divorce by mutual consent. The Legislature of 1884 would not go so far as the law of Bonaparte in that direction. It is, however, interesting to note that in Belgium divorce, as provided for by the Code Napoléon, has remained in force down to the present day; in spite of the long predominance of the Catholic party, dissolution of marriage by mutual consent is still possible in that country. I might say that, although possible, it is a very rare thing. I think only one case of divorce by mutual consent will be found amongst 400 cases in Belgium."

42,961. Is there a period during which they must maintain that desire to separate?—Yes. Divorce by mutual consent, according to the Code Napoléon, as it was in force for 12 years, could not be pronounced until more than a year had elapsed since the application was made, and the parties had to appear before the President four times, and to renew their application and say that they still wanted divorce.

42,962. Is there something similar to that in Belgium?—The Code Napoléon as it stood at the time is still in force in Belgium now.

"In France, arts. 229, 230, 231 and 232 of the Civil Code set forth the grounds for a petition for divorce.

"229. A husband may petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery.—Le mari pourra demander le divorce pour cause d'adultère de sa femme.

"230. A wife may petition for divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery.—La femme pourra demander le divorce pour cause d'adultère de son mari (Loi 27 juillet 1884).

"231. Husband and wife may respectively petition for divorce on the ground of physical violence or grave ill-treatment or insult.—Les époux pourront réciproquement demander le divorce pour excès, sévices ou injures graves, de l'un d'eux envers l'autre.

"232. The infliction on one of the spouses of a punishment called 'peine afflictive et infamante' constitutes for the other spouse a ground for divorce.—La condamnation de l'un des époux à une peine afflictive et infamante sera pour l'autre époux une cause de divorce (Loi 27 juillet 1884).

"It is to be observed that adultery by the husband is a ground for divorce as well as adultery by the wife. In that respect, husband and wife are treated in the same way. This is one of the innovations of the law of 1884. During the period for which divorce was in force after the codification of 1804, that is to say, till 1816, a wife could not petition for divorce on the ground of the adultery of her husband except when his mistress had been kept in the house where husband and wife lived. It was thought in 1884 that the moral equality (should we say the equal immorality) of the sexes should be recognised. But the alteration of the old text of the Code has not met with universal approval, although generally accepted. The majority approve of that innovation. It has been maintained that, however similar from the moral point of view, the husband's adultery might rightly be considered as a less grave breach of conjugal duty because it cannot have the same physical consequences.

"In France, moreover, adultery is a criminal offence, and in spite of the new principle of the equality of the sexes within the domain of civil law, a distinction still remains in criminal law. The adultery of the wife renders her liable to imprisonment whilst the adultery of the husband is merely punishable by a fine and that only when he has kept his mistress in the conjugal dwelling-house (dans la maison conjugale). It must be confessed that the courts are generally very forbearing regarding that kind of offence; imprisonment is rarely inflicted and 25 francs is usually the amount of the fine which the offender of either sex is ordered to pay. Many think it would be better to strike the offence from our penal code altogether.

"By far the most frequent grounds for divorce on which the petitions are framed are those provided for in Art. 231, excès or sévices graves (violence, cruelty) and injures graves (grave insult) is the most frequent of all.

"The excès or sévices must be serious to support a petition for divorce.

"Serious also must be the insult (injure) to afford a good ground for the dissolution of a marriage.

"It is impossible to enumerate the cases which may come within the last heading. The courts have construed the article as giving them a discretionary power to decide what constitutes an insult (injure), and whether it is an insult serious enough to justify divorce. The following are instances in which divorce may be granted for 'injures graves':—

"(a) Desertion of the matrimonial domicile in circumstances which imply an insult to the petitioner; for instance, refusal by the wife to re-enter the house after a request to do so.

"(b) Refusal to consummate the marriage or to continue the relations of husband and wife (abstention du devoir conjugal).

"(c) Misconduct which, although not amounting to adultery, may compromise the dignity of the matrimonial tie.

"(d) On the part of the husband, refusal of maintenance or protection; or, on the part of the wife, refusal of obedience.

"(e) Abuse by word of mouth (propos blessants).

"(f) In certain circumstances, refusal to celebrate a religious marriage when the other spouse had good reason to expect that such religious marriage would take place after the civil solemnisation of the union.

"(g) Habitual drunkenness. The court in this case takes into consideration the social standing of husband and wife.

"In all these cases, the court has power to grant or to refuse divorce according to the degree of gravity of the act complained of.

"The courts also exercise the same discretion in the case of certain convictions for offences which are tried by correctional courts and do not entail a punishment of the kind specified in Art. 232.

"As to convictions for offences visited by punishments mentioned in Art. 232 (peines afflictives et infamantes), there is no place for the exercise of any discretionary power by the court. Divorce must be granted as of right as soon as evidence of the conviction is given. The 'peines afflictives et infamantes' are mentioned in Art. 7 of the Penal Code. (Art. 7: (Loi 28 avril 1832) Les peines afflictives et infamantes sont; (1) la mort; (2) les travaux forcés à perpétuité; (3) la déportation; (4) les travaux forcés à temps; (5) la détention; (6) la réclusion.) They always exceed five years, as they apply to crimes of the most odious character, such as murder, forgery, perjury in certain cases, burglary, arson, &c.

"It is to be noticed that mental alienation, insanity, contrary to what obtains in Switzerland and in Germany, is not in itself a ground for divorce.

"It may be pointed out that it is no defence to a petition for divorce to allege facts which, if proved against the petitioner, would be sufficient grounds for divorce; e.g., in a petition for divorce on the ground of adultery it is no answer to the suit to allege that the petitioner has himself committed adultery. In such a case, the respondent may file a cross-petition on the ground of the adultery of the petitioner, and the court may render a decree pronouncing divorce in favour of both parties. As the effect of a divorce is to debar the guilty party from claiming from the other spouse the benefit of any gifts to which that party might be entitled under the marriage settlement or under a deed subsequent to the marriage, the result of a decree pronounced in favour of both parties is that both spouses being guilty, neither can claim such benefit.

"But to the foregoing principle as to the cross-petition, there is an exception; if both parties have been convicted of an offence visited by peine afflictive et infamante, neither of them can make the conviction a ground of divorce against the other.

"It may also be remarked that provocation or connivance is a sufficient defence to a petition for divorce on the ground of adultery.

"Before a divorce decree can produce its effects, it must first be submitted to the formality of transcription. This is an entry made by the Registrar (Officier de l'Etat Civil) in the register of marriages of the judgment rendered by the Court. If no transcription is made within two months after the judgment has become final, the judgment loses its legal effect. This provision of the law affords a last chance of reconciliation to the parties, who can nullify the decree by neglecting to enter it on the register. When the transcription has been made, a short marginal note thereof is made in the margin of the marriage certificate of the divorced spouses.

"This system of marginal notes tends to prevent bigamous marriages for the following reason; Article 70 of the Civil Code, as modified by the law of August 17th, 1897, provides that the intending spouses must before the marriage produce to the Registrar a copy of their birth certificates, which copy must not be more than three months old at the date of their declaration. When a marriage has been celebrated, a marginal note of its celebration is made in the registry of births, and no copy of the birth entry can be delivered without that marginal note. The result is that the Registrar of Marriages is necessarily informed before the celebration of each marriage of any marriage which may have taken place in France more than three months previously between either the intended husband or wife and another person, and he does not proceed to the celebration until evidence is produced of the dissolution of such previous union. This evidence is given by a copy of the transcription of the divorce decree or by the certificate of death of the deceased spouse or by the certificate of the previous marriage containing a marginal note of the divorce decree.

"II. As to Judicial Separation.

"Divorce is not the only remedy offered by the law to terminate or suspend the relations of husband and wife. Judicial separation, which allows the spouses to live apart, is also open to them.

"I say judicial separation, not mutual separation. A separation by mutual consent has no legal validity in France, separation can only be the result of a judgment.

"The grounds for judicial separation are the same as the grounds for divorce (Art. 300). (Loi 27 juillet 1884): Dans le cas où il y a lieu à demande en divorce, il sera libre aux époux de former une demande en séparation de corps.) Its effect differs mainly in this, that after separation re-marriage is impossible.

According to Art. 311, par. I. (Loi 6 fevrier 1893): Le jugement qui prononce la séparation de corps ou un jugement postérieur peut interdire à la femme de porter le nom le son mari, ou l'autoriser à ne pas le porter. Dans le cas où le mari aurait joint à son nom le nom de sa femme, celle-ci pourra également demander qu'il soit interdit au mari de le porter), the judgment of separation may forbid the wife to continue to use the name of her husband or may authorise her not to use it (whilst a divorced woman must resume her maiden name, Art. 299). Art. 299 is (Loi 27 juillet 1884): L'époux contre lequel le divorce aura été prononcé perdra tous les advantages que l'autre époux lui avaits faits, soit par contrat de marriage, soit depuis le mariage. (Loi du 6 fevrier 1893) Par l'effet du divorce, chacun des époux reprend l'usage de son nom.

"When separation has lasted for three years, an application may be made to convert it into a divorce. The text of the Civil Code passed in 1804 reserved the right to apply for conversion to the defendant in the action for separation, except when the separation had been obtained against the wife on the ground of adultery. The plaintiff, in all cases, was supposed to have made his choice of remedy for ever. The law of 1884 does not draw these distinctions; whatever may have been the ground for separation, either party is entitled to apply for the conversion after three years.

"Art. 310, as drafted in 1804, is still in force in Belgium.

"According to a recent Act (the 6th June 1908), when an application for conversion is made, the court is bound to give judgment in favour of the applicant. 'Le jugement sera de droit converti en jugement de 'divorce sur la demande formée par l'un des époux.'

"III. The Costs of Divorce.

"In order to estimate the amount of the expenses incurred in a petition for divorce, it is necessary to bear in mind that, in France, besides the costs which may be taxed by the Court (party and party costs), and which the losing party is, as a rule, ordered to refund to the winning party, every litigant has to pay to his counsel (avocat), and even to his solicitor (avoué), a remuneration called honoraires which is not determined by the law but is due according to custom. The amount of these 'honoraires' depends on the reputation of the 'avocat' or the 'avoué.' As regards the avocat, no part of his remuneration, which entirely consists of honoraires, is liable to taxation by the judge; each party has to pay his own counsel, and can in no case be ordered to pay for the fees of the counsel of the other side.

"It follows that it is difficult to ascertain beforehand with accuracy what will be the costs of a litigation. An avocat may be satisfied with a fee of 20*l.* in a case for which another barrister might receive 100*l.* or more. In a petition for divorce the honoraires of the avocat and the avoué are rarely less than 15*l.*, I might perhaps say 20*l.*

"In a petition for divorce, leaving apart this very important question of honoraires, the other costs (party and party costs), which may be taxed, may be estimated according to the incidents of the case in the following way:—

"1. Undefended Petition (Divorce par défaut).—If the documentary evidence is sufficient for the Court to grant divorce de plano, that is to say, without any necessity of oral evidence (sans enquête), the party and party costs amount to 12*l.* to 15*l.*

"2. Undefended Petition, but judgment given after the hearing of witnesses 'enquête.'—The witnesses are not heard in court, but by a judge commissioned by the court, who has the deposition taken down by the clerk of the court. Such depositions are subsequently read in court. 16*l.* to 20*l.*

"3. Defended Case without Cross Petition.—If there is no enquête the costs may be from 25*l.* to 30*l.* for the petitioner, and 12*l.* to 15*l.* for the respondent.

"4. Defended Case and Cross Petition.—Witnesses heard in support of each petition, enquête et contre-enquête, about 40*l.* for each party.

"It is clear, however, that all these figures are liable to great variations, depending principally on the number of witnesses heard.

"With the considerable addition of the honoraires of the avoué and the avocat, these legal expenses would prevent the poorer classes from taking advantage of the law of divorce if the institution of 'assistance judiciaire' did not afford them a means of obtaining justice without first incurring these liabilities.

"IV. Assistance Judiciaire.

"The law now in force on the assistance judiciaire was passed in 1851 (22nd of January), and was amended in 1901 (10–12th of July), and in 1907 (4th of December).

"Assistance judiciaire may be obtained for all kinds of proceedings, but it is largely used in matrimonial cases. In the department of the Seine, in 1909, out of 19,414 applications for assistance judiciaire, 9,807 related to petitions for divorce, 386 to judicial separation.

"The population of the department over which the Court of the Seine has jurisdiction is (including Paris, which is its chef-lieu) 3,848,618 inhabitants.

"A person to whom the benefit of the assistance judiciaire has been granted is only provisionally released by law from the obligation to pay for the legal expenses involved in the proceedings for which such benefit was obtained if having lost his cause he is ordered by the Court to pay such costs. Theoretically he remains bound to pay, and if at a future time he comes into better circumstances the payment of the bill of costs may be enforced against him.

"There is a bureau d'assistance judiciaire attached to every court of first instance and also to every court of appeal. There is a court of first instance in each arrondissement and one in the department of the Seine (in all 375 Courts). There are 27 courts of appeal.

"Each of these bureaux is composed of five members or seven members, namely, five for the board of first instance, and seven for the board attached to the court of appeal.

"Amongst the members, there are, in any case:—

"1. A representative of the Treasury—directeur de l'enregistrement et des domaines. The duty of this official is to safeguard the interests of the State, which would be prejudiced if the assistance were granted too easily, since assistance judiciaire entails an exemption (at least provisionally) from the obligation of paying for stamp duty, court fees, and other taxes which otherwise would be due in reference to the legal documents drawn in the proceedings.

"2. A representative of the 'préfet' of the department. This gives a second vote to the representatives of the State. Besides, through the préfet information may easily be obtained as to the means of the applicants.

"On the board of first instance, the three other members are retired judges or representatives of the other branches of the profession selected, when the local bar comprises less than 15 members, by the court of first instance (tribunal d'arrondissement). When the local bar comprises at least 15 members, one of these three members of the board must be appointed by the council of discipline of the bar, and another by the chambre des avoués; the third member is appointed by the court.

"On the board of the court of appeal, the five members (other than the representatives of the Treasury and of the prefet) are selected in the following way: two are appointed by the Court, two by the council of discipline of the bar, and one by the Chambre des avoués à la Cour (council of the solicitors practising before the Court).

"I do not think it necessary to speak of the other bureaux (attached to the Court of Cassation, the Conseil d'Etat, the tribunal des conflits or the bureau superieur sitting at the Ministry of Justice) because they are connected with the special organisation of the French courts and are not of much interest in the domain of comparative law.

"A person who wishes to obtain the assistance judiciaire must first make an application to the procureur de la République of the district (arrondissement) of his domicile either directly or through the mayor of his town of village. The procureur de la République sends on the application to the bureau d'assistance of the district. The bureau gives notice to the applicant and to his opponent to appear. The applicant must give evidence as to his inability to pay the expenses of the proceedings which he wishes to take, and his opponent has the right to give evidence in contradiction. Though the bureau has no power to adjudicate on the merits of the case, a statement of the facts on which the contention of the applicant is founded must be made in order to enable the board to eliminate hopeless or ridiculous applications. If the board is satisfied that the assistance should not be granted, it must state the reasons for its decision. If, on the contrary, the board decides to grant assistance, it is not bound to give its reasons. The decision of the board is then communicated, with a statement of the facts of the case, to the Court having jurisdiction in the matter.

"The decision of the board of first instance cannot be appealed against by the parties themselves, but the procureur de la République may refer the decision to the bureau attached to the court of appeal, which has power to reverse it.

"Besides this power of entertaining appeals from the decisions of the bureau of first instance, the bureau attached to the court of appeal has power to hear applications for assistance of persons who wish to appeal to the court of appeal from decisions given by the tribunal of first instance.

"There is no need for a fresh application for assistance in the case of a person who has obtained it in proceedings before the tribunal of first instance, if such person is respondent to an appeal made by his opponent.

"The president of the Court which is to entertain the case, having received the notice of the decision of the bureau by which assistance has been granted, requires the bâtonnier (head of the bar) to appoint an avocat, the president of the chambre des avoués to appoint an avoué, and the syndic of the huissiers to appoint a huissier (process server), and these three gentlemen are bound to give their services.

"At the close of the proceedings a bill of costs is drawn up, taxed by the judge, and handed to the receveur de l'enregistrement. This bill indicates the sums which, according to the ordinary scale, are usually due for stamp duties and court fees, and the fees of the avoué and the huissier.

"If the assisté has won his case, the payment of these sums is demanded from the other side by the officials of the administration of the enregistrement. If, on the contrary, the assisté fails in his action and is ordered to pay the costs, which he is assumed not to be able to do, the official of the enrigistrement does not demand payment unless it comes to his knowledge that the position of the assisté has improved in such a way as to permit him to discharge the liability. The administration of the enregistrement, like the officials of Somerset House, have many ways of being informed of the changes for the better in the fortune of the assistés. (For instance, as the déclarations de successions are made to them (affidavit for Inland Revenue), they are the first to know that a person has come into an estate by inheritance.) As between the assisté and his opponent, the assistance judiciaire does not release the assisté from the obligation to repay the party and party costs which the Court may have ordered the assisté to pay; but it must be confessed that the opponent will rarely obtain such costs, since the assistance is granted on the assumption that the assisté cannot afford to pay the expenses of the litigation.

"The number of applications for assistance judiciaire brought before the bureau attached to the tribunal of the Seine in respect of proceedings for divorce was 9,599 in 1907, 9,687 in 1908, and 9,807 in 1909. Assistance was granted in 1907 in 3,952 cases and refused in 2,903; in 2,744 the applications were dropped for various reasons; in some instances the parties were reconciled. It should be pointed out in this connection that when the parties appear together the bureaux have power to persuade them to come to an amicable settlement, and, in the case of a petition for divorce, they very frequently use this power successfully. In 1908, out of 9,687 applications, assistance was granted in 4,204 cases and refused in 3,282, and 2,201 applications were dropped. In 1909, out of 9,807 applications, assistance was granted in 4,390 cases and refused in 3,387 cases, and 2,030 applications were dropped.

ASSISTANCE JUDICIAIRE.

LOI DU 22 JANVIER 1851, MODIFIÉE ET COMPLETÉE PAR LES LOIS DU 10–12 JUILLET 1901 ET 4 DECEMBRE 1907.

TITRE I.—DE L'ASSISTANCE JUDICIAIRE EN MATIÈRE CIVILE.

Chapitre I.—Des formes dans lesquelles l'assistance judiciaire est accordée.

Art. 1er.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901.) L'assistance judiciaire peut être accordée, en tout état de cause, à toutes personnes, ainsi qu'à tous établissements publics ou d'utilité publique, et aux associations privées ayant pour objet une oeuvre d'assistance et jouissant de la personnalité civile, lorsque, à raison de l'insuffisance de leurs ressources, ces personnes, établissements et associations se trouvent dans l'impossibilité d'exercer leurs droits en justice, soit en demandant, soit en défendant.

Elle est applicable: 1° à tous les litiges portés devant les tribunaux civils, les juges des référés, la chambre du conseil, les tribunaux de commerce, les juges de paix, les cours d'appel, la cour de cassation, les conseils de préfecture, le conseil d'Etat, le tribunal des conflits, et aux parties civiles devant les juridictions d'instruction et de répression; 2° en dehors de tout litige, aux actes de juridiction gracieuse et aux actes conservatoires.

Art. 2.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901.) L'assistance judiciaire s'étend de plein droit aux actes et procédures d'exécution à opérer en vertu des décisions en vue desquelles elle a été accordée; elle peut en outre être accordée pour tous actes et procédures d'exécution à opérer en vertu de décisions obtenues sans le bénéfice de cette assistance ou de tous actes, même conventionnels, si les ressources de la partie qui poursuit l'execution sont insuffisantes; le tout sauf ce qui sera dit dans l'art. 4 ci-après.

Art. 3.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901.) L'admission à l'assistance judiciaire est prononcée:

2° Pour les instances qui doivent être portées devant une cour d'appel, par un bureau établi au siège de la cour et composé: 1° du directeur de l'administration de l'enregistrement et des domaines au d'un agent de cette administration délegué par lui; 2° d'un délégué du préfet; 3° et de cinq autres membres choisis de la manière suivante: deux par la cour, en assemblée générale, parmi les citoyens des qualités énoncées sous le n° 3 du paragraphe précédent; deux par le conseil de discipline de l'ordre des avocats; et un par la chambre de discipline des avoués à la cour.

3° Pour les pourvois devant la Cour de Cassation, le Conseil d'Etat et le tribunal des conflits, par un bureau établi à Paris et composé de sept membres parmi lesquels deux délégués du ministre des finances; trois autres membres sont choisis, savoir: pour le bureau près la cour de cassation, par la cour en assemblée générale, parmi les anciens membres de la cour, les avocats et anciens avocats au conseil d'Etat et à la cour de cassation, les professeurs et les anciens professeurs de droit; et pour le bureau près le conseil d'Etat et le tribunal des conflits, par le conseil d'Etat en assemblée générale, parmi les anciens conseillers d'Etat, les anciens maîtres des requêtes, les anciens préfets, les avocats et les anciens avocats au conseil d'Etat et à la cour de cassation.

Près de ces deux bureaux, les deux derniers membres sont nommés par le conseil de discipline de l'ordre des avocats au couseil d'Etat et à la cour de cassation.

Art. 4.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Dans le cas où l'assistance judiciaire s'étend de plein droit aux actes et procédures d'exécution, conformément à la première disposition de l'art. 2, le bureau qui l'a précédemment accordée doit cependant, sur la demande de l'assisté, déterminer la nature des actes et procédures d'exécution auxquels elle s'appliquera.

Dans le cas prévu par la deuxième disposition dudit art. 2, l'assistance judiciaire est prononcée par le bureau établi près le tribunal civil de première instance du domicile de la partie qui la sollicite, lequel détermine également la nature des actes et procédures d'exécution pour lesquels l'assistance est donnée.

Pour les instances que les actes et procédures d'exécution ainsi déterminés peuvent dans les deux cas faire naître, soit entre l'assisté et la partie poursuivie, soit entre l'assisté et un tiers, le bénéfice de la précédente décision du bureau subsiste en ce qui concerne la constatation de l'insuffisance des ressources, mais l'assistance sera prononcée au fond par le bureau compétent selon les distinctions établies en l'art. 3 qui précède.

Art. 5.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Lorsque le nombre des affaires l'exige, tout bureau peut, en vertu d'une décision du ministre de la justice, prise sur l'avis de la juridiction près de laquelle ce bureau est établi, être divisé en plusieurs sections.

Dans ce cas, les règles proscrites par l'art. 3 relativement au nombre des membres du bureau et à leur nomination, s'appliquent à chaque section.

Art. 6.—Chaque bureau d'assistance judiciaire ou chaque section nomme son président.

Les fonctions de secrétaire sont remplies par le greffier de la cour ou du tribunal près duquel le bureau est établi, ou par un de ses commis assermentés; et pour le bureau établi près le conseil d'Etat et le tribunal des conflits, par le secrétaire général près le conseil d'Etat ou par un secrétaire de section délégué par lui.

Le bureau ne peut délibérer qu'autant que la moitié plus un de ses membres est présente, non compris le secrétaire qui n'a pas de voix délibérative. Les décisions sont prises à la majorité: en cas de partage, la voix du président est prépondérante.

Toutefois dans les cas d'extrême urgence l'admission provisoire pourra être prononcée par le bureau, quel que soit le nombre des membres présents, le président ou à son défaut le membre le plus ancien ayant voix prépondérante, et même par un seul membre.

Dans ces mêmes cas, par exception: 1° le magistrat du ministère public auquel doit être adressée la demande d'assistance judiciaire pourra d'office, s'il y a lieu, convoquer le bureau; 2° ce bureau, même s'il n'a, dans l'espèce, qualité que pour recueillir des renseignements dans les termes de l'art. 8, aura cependent, si les circonstances l'exigent, le droit de prononcer l'admission provisoire.

Lorsque l'admission n'aura été, dans les conditions qui précèdent, que provisoire, le bureau compétent statuera à bref délai sur le maintien ou le refus de l'assistance demandée.

Art. 7.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Les membres du bureau, autres que les délégués de l'administration, sont soumis au renouvellement au commencement de chaque année judiciaire et dans le mois qui suit la rentrée; les membres sortants peuvent réélus.

Art. 8.—(Loi du 10–12 juilliet 1901). Toute personne qui réclame l'assistance judiciaire addresse sa demande, écrite sur papier libre, ou verbale, au procureur de la République du tribunal de son domicile.

Elle peut également addresser cette demande, écrite sur papier libre ou verbale, au maire de son domicile, qui la transmet immédiatement en ce cas, au procureur de la République ci-dessus indiqué, avec les pièces justificatives.

Ce magistrat en fait la remise au bureau établi près ce tribunal, lequel bureau doit statuer dans le plus bref délai possible. Si ce bureau n'est pas en même temps celui établi près la juridiction compétente pour statuer sur le litige, il se borne à recuellir des renseiguements, tant sur l'insuffisance des ressources que sur le fonds de l'affaire. Il peut entendre les parties. Si elles ne sont pas accordées, il transmet, par l'intermédiaire du procureur de la République, la demande, le résultat de ses informations et les pièces au bureau établi près de la juridiction compétente.

Art. 9.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Si la juridiction devant laquelle l'assistance judiciaire a été demise se déclare incompétente, et que, par suite de cette décision, l'affaire soit portée devant une autre juridiction de même nature et de même ordre, le bénéfice de l'assistance subsiste devant cette dernière juridiction.

Celui qui a été admis à l'assistance judiciaire devant une première juridiction continue à en jouir sur l'appel interjeté contre lui, dans le cas même ou il se rendrait incidemment appelant. Il continue pareillement à en jouir sur le pourvoi formé contre lui en cassation, devant le conseil d'Etat ou le tribunal des conflits.

Lorsque c'est l'assisté qui émet un appel principale ou qui forme un pourvoi, il ne peut, sur cet appel ou sur ce pourvoi, jouir de l'assistance judiciaire qu'autant qu'il y est admis par une décision nouvelle. Pour y parvenir, il doit adresser sa demande accompagnée de la copie signifiée, ou d'une expédition délivrée avec le bénéfice de l'assistance judiciaire, de la décision contre laquelle il entend former appel ou pourvoi, savoir;

S'il s'agit d'un appel à porter devant le tribunal civil, au procureur de la République près ce tribunal;

S'il s'agit d'un appel à porter devant la cour d'appel au procureur général près cette cour;

S'il s'agit de pourvois, savoir: en cassation, au procureur général près la cour de cassation; devant le conseil d'Etat, au secrétaire général du conseil; devant le tribunal des conflits, au secrétaire du tribunal.

Le magistrat auquel la demande est adressée en fait la remise au bureau competent.

Art. 10.—Quiconque demande à être admis à l'assistance judiciaire doit fournir:

1° un extrait du rôle de ses contributions ou un certificate du percepteur de son domicile constatant qu'il n'est pas imposé;

2° une déclaration attestant qu'il est, à cause de l'insuffisance de ses ressources, dans l'impossibilité d'exercer ses droits en justice et contenant l'énumeration détaillée de ses moyens d'existence, quels qu'ils soient:

Le réclamant affirme la sincérité de sa déclaration devant le maire de la commune de son domicile; le maire lui en donne acte au bas de la déclaration.

Art. 11.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Le bureau prend toutes les informations nécessaires pour s'éclairer sur l'insuffisance des ressources du demandeur, si l'instruction déjà faite par le bureau du domicile du demandeur, dans le cas prévu par l'art. 8, ne lui fournit pas, à cet égard, des documents suffisants.

Il donne avis à la partie adverse qu'elle peut se présenter devant lui, soit pour contester l'insuffisance des ressources du demandeur, soit pour fournir des explications sur le fond.

Si elle comparaît, le bureau emploie ses bons offices pour opérer un arrangement aimable.

Art. 12.—(Loi du 4 décembre 1907). Les décisions du bureau contiennent l'exposé des faits et moyens et la déclaration que l'assistance est accordée ou refusée, sans l'expression de motifs dans le premier cas; mais si le bénéfice de l'assistance est refusé, le bureau doit faire connaître les causes du refus.

Les décisions du bureau ne sont susceptibles d'aucun recours de la part des parties. Mais le procureur de la République, après avoir pris communication des décisions du bureau établi près son tribunal et des pièces à l'appui, peut, sans retard de l'instruction ou du jugement, déférer ces décisions au bureau établi près la cour d'appel du ressort pour y être réformées s'il y a lieu.

Auprès de la chancellerie siège un bureau supérieur composé: 1° d'un délégué du ministre des finances; 2° d'un délégué du ministre de l'intérieur; 3° du directeur des affaires civiles au ministère de justice; 4° d'un ancien membre de la cour de cassation choisi par la cour en assemblée générale: 5° d'un ancien conseiller d'Etat ou d'un ancien maître des requêtes choisi par le conseil d'Etat en assemblée générale; 6° de deux avocats au conseil d'Etat et à la cour de cassation nommés par le conseil de discipline de le'ordre.

Peuvent être déférées au bureau supérieur, savoir: par le ministre de la justice, les décisions du bureau d'assistance près le conseil d'Etat et le tribunal des conflits; par le procureur général près la cour de cassation, celles du bureau établi près les cours d'appel auxquelles ils sont attachés, celles des bureaux près les cours d'appel.

Le recours pourra s'exercer contre toute décision, quelle qu'elle soit, que l'assistance ait été refusée ou accordée, excepté s'il s'agit d'un bureau près d'une cour d'appel, si ce bureau a statué comme juridiction d'appel sur une décision d'un bureau près un tribunal de première instance.

Le procureur général près la cour de cassation, le secrétaire général du conseil d'Etat, le secrétaire du tribunal des conflits et le procureur général près la cour d'appel peuvent aussi se faire envoyer les décisions des bureaux d'asistance qui ont été rendues dans une affaire sur laquelle le bureau d'assistance établi près l'une ou l'autre de ces juridictions est appelé à statuer, si ce deruier bureau en fait la demande.

Le bureau supérieur a qualité pour statuer définitivement à la requête du procureur général près la cour de cassation sur l'admission au bénéfice de l'assistance judiciaire, lorsque deux ou plusieurs bureaux d'appel, saisis de demandes relatives au même litige, se seront déclarés incompétents.

Il en sera de même si, par suite de réeusations, d'abstentions ou de toute autre cause, il était impossible de constituer un bureau d'appel, le bureau près la eour de cassation, ou près le conseil d'Etat et le tribunal des conflits.

Hors les cas prévus par les paragraphes précédents, les décisions du bureau ne peuvent être communiquées qu'au procureur de la République, à la personne qui a demandé l'assistanee et à ses conseils, le tout sans déplaeement.

Elles ne peuvent être produites ni diseutées en justice si ce n'est devant la poliee correctionnelle dans le eas prévu par l'art. 26 de la présente loi.

Chapitre II.—Des effets de l'assistance judiciaire.

Art. 13. (Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Dans les trois jours de l'admission à l'assistanee judiciaire le président du bureau envoie, par l'intermédiaire du magistrat du ministère public, au président de la juridiction compétente ou au juge compétent, un extrait de la déeision portant seulement que l'assistance est accordée ; il y joint les pièces de l'affaire.

Si la eause est portée devant une cour ou un tribunal civil, le président invite le bâtonnier de l'ordre des avocats le président de la chambre des avoués et le syndic des huissiers, à désigner l'avoeat, l'avoué et l'huissier qui prêteront leur ministère à l'assisté.

S'il n'existe pas de bâtonnier ou s'il n'y a pas de chambre de discipline des avoués, la désignation est faite par le président de tribunal.

Si la cause est portée devant un conseil de préfecture, un tribunal de commerce ou devant un juge de paix, le président du eonseil, le président du tribunal ou le juge de paix se borne à inviter le syndic des huissier à désigner un huissier.

Si la cause est portée devant le eour de cassation, le conseil d'Etat ou le tribunal des conflits, le président de la cour de cassation, du conseil d'Etat ou du tribunal des conflits, selon le cas, invite le président du conseil de l'ordre des avocats près le conseil d'Etat à commettre un membre de l'ordre qui prêtera son ministère à l'assisté dans les affaires où ce ministère est indispensable, et le syndic des huissiers, s'il y a lieu, à désigner un huissier.

S'il s'agit d'actes et procédures d'exécution, les pièces sont transmises au président du tribunal civil du lieu ou l'exécution doit se poursuivre, lequel invite le syndic des huissiers et, s'il y a lieu, le président de la chambre des avoués, à désigner l'huissier et l'avoué qui prêteront leur ministère à l'assisté.

Ces désignations doivent être faites dans le plus bref délai.

Dans le délai de trois jours déterminé au paragraphe I^{er} qui pieèède, le secrétaire du bureau envoie un extrait de la décision au receveur de l'enregistrement.

Art. 14.—L'assisté est dispensé provisoirement du paiement des sommes dues au Trésor pour droits de timbre, d'enregistrement et de greffe, ainsi que toute consignation d'amende.

Il est aussi dispensé provisoirement du paiement des sommes dues aux greffiers, aux officiers ministériels et aux avocats pour droits, émoluments et honoraires.

Les actes de la procédures faite à la requête de l'assisté sont visés pour timbre et enregistrés en débet.

Le visa pour timbre est donné sur l'original au moment de son enregistrement.

Les actes de titres produits par l'assisté, pour justifier de ses droits et qualités, sont pareillement visés pour timbre et enregistrés en débet.

Si ees actes et titres sont du nombre de ceux dont les lois ordonnent l'enregistrement dans un délai déterminé, les droits d'enregistrement de ces actes et titres sont assimilés à ceux des actes de la procédure.

Le visa pour timbre et l'enregistrement en débet doivent mentionner la date de la décision qui admet au bénéfice de l'assistance judiciaire ; ils n'ont d'effet, quant aux actes et titres produits par l'assisté, que pour le procès dans lequel la production a lieu.

Les frais de transport des juges, des officiers ministériels et des experts, les honoraires de ces derniers, les taxes des témoins dont l'audition a été autorisée par le tribunal ou le juge, et en général tous les frais dus à des tiers non officiers ministériels, sont avancés par le Trésor, conformément à l'art. 118 du déeret du 18 juin 1811. Le paragraphe 6 du présent article s'applique au recouvrement de ces avances.

Art 15.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Le ministère public est entendu dans toutes les affaires dans lesquelles l'une des parties a été admise au bénéfice de l'assistance judiciaire.

Art. 16.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Les notaires, greffiers et tous autres dépositaires publics ne sont tenus à la délivrance gratuite des actes et expéditions réclamés par l'assisté que sur une ordonnance du juge de paix ou du président.

Art. 17.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). En cas de condamnation aux dépens prononcée contre l'adversaire de l'assisté, la taxe comprend tous les droits, frais de touts nature, honoraires et émoluments auxquels l'assisté aurait été tenu s'il n'y avait pas eu assistance judieiaire.

Art. 18.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Dans le cas prévu par l'article précédent, la condamnation est prononcée et l'exécutoire est délivré au nom de l'administration de l'enregistrement et des domaines, qui en poursuit le recouvrement comme en matière d'enregistrement, sauf la droit pour l'assisté de concourir aux actes de poursuite, conjointement avec l'administration, lorsque cela est utile pour exécuter les décisions rendues et en conserver les effets.

Les frais, faits sous le bénéfice de l'assistance judieiaire, des procédures d'exécution et des instances relatives à cette exécution entre l'assisté et la partie poursuivie qui auraient été discontinuées ou suspendues pendant plus d'une année, sont réputés dus par la partie poursuivie, sauf justifications ou décisions contraires. L'exécutoire est délivré comformément au paragraphe I^{er} qui précède.

Il est délivré un exécutoire séparé au nom de ladite administration pour les droits qui, ne devant pas être compris dans l'exécutoire délivré contre la partie adverse, restent dus par l'assisté au Trésor, conformément au 6eme paragraphe de l'art. 14.

L'administration de l'enregistrement et des domaines fait immédiatement aux divers ayants-droit la distribution des sommes recouvrées.

La eréance du Trésor, pour les avances qu'il a faites, ainsi que pour tous droits de greffe, d'enregistrement et de timbre, a la préférence sur celles des autres ayants droit.

Art. 19.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). En cas de condamnation aux dépens prononcée contre l'assisté, il est procédé, conformément aux règles tracées par l'article préeédent, au recouvrement des sommes dues au Trésor, en vertu des paragraphes 6 et 9 de l'art. 14.

Art. 20.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Les greffiers seront tenus, dans le mois du jugement contenant liquidation des dépens ou de la taxe des frais par le juge, de transmettre au receveur de l'enregistrement l'extrait du jugement ou l'exécutoire, sous peine de dix francs (10 frs.) d'amende pour chaque extrait de jugement ou chaque exécutoire non transmis dans ledit délai.

Chapitre III.—Du retrait de l'assistance judiciare.

Art. 21.—(Loi du 10–12 juillet 1901). Le bénéfice de l'asistance judiciare peut être retiré en tout état de cause, même après la fin des instances et procédures pour lesquelles elle a été accordée :

1° s'il survient à l'assisté des ressources reconnues suffisantes :

2° s'il a surpris la décision du bureau par une décision frauduleuse.

Art. 22.—Le retrait de l'assistance judiciaire peut être demandé, soit par le ministère publie, soit par la partie adverse.

Il peut aussi être prononcé d'office par le bureau.

Dans tous les cas, il est motivé.

Art. 23.—L'assistanee judiciaire ne peut être retirée qu'après que l'assisté a été entendu ou mis en demeure de s'expliquer.

Art. 24.—Le retrait de l'assistance judiciaire a pour effet de rendre immédiatement exigibles les droits, honoraires, émoluments et avances de toute nature, dont l'assisté avait été dispensé.

Dans tous les cas où l'assistance judiciaire est retirée, le secrétaire du bureau est tenu d'en informer immédiatement le receveur de l'enregistrement, qui procédera au recouvrement et à la répartition, suivant les règles tracées en l'art. 18 ci-dessus.

Art. 25.—L'action tendant au recouvrement de l'exécutoire délivré à la régie de l'enregistrement et des domaines, soit contre l'assisté, soit contre la partie adverse, se prescrit par dix ans.

La prescription de l'action de l'adversaire de l'assisté contre celui-ci, pour les dépens auxquels il a été condamné envers lui, reste soumise au droit commun.

Art. 26.—Si le retrait de l'assistance a pour cause une déclaration frauduleuse de l'assisté, relativement à son indigence, celui-ci peut, sur l'avis du bureau, être traduit devant le tribunal de police correctionnelle et condamné, indépendamment du paiement des droits et frais de toute nature, dont il avait été dispensé, à une amende égale au montant total de ses droits et frais, sans que cette amende puisse être au-dessous de 100 francs, et à un emprisonnement de huit jours au moins et de six mois au plus.

L'art. 463 c. pén. est applicable.

Art. 27.—Les dispositions de la lois du 7 août 1850 sont applicables:

1° à toutes les causes qui sont de la compétence des conseils de prud'hommes, et dont les juges de paix sont saisis dans les lieux ou ces conseils ne sont pas établis.

2° à toutes les contestations énoncées dans les numéros 3 et 4 de l'art. 5 de la loi du 25 mai 1838.

Titre II.—De l'assistance judiciaire en matière criminelle et correctionnelle.

Art. 28.—Il sera pourvu à la défense des accusés devant les cours d'assises ,conformément aux dispositions de l'art. 294 c. inst. crim.

Art. 29.—Les présidents des tribunaux correctionnels désigneront un défenseur d'office aux prévenus poursuivis à la requête du ministère public, ou détenus préventivement, lorsqu'ils en feront la demande, et que leur indigence sera constatée, soit par les pièces désignées dans l'art. 10 soit par tous autres documents.

Art. 30.—Les présidents des cours d'assizes et les présidents des tribunaux correctionnels pourront, même avant le jour fixé pour l'audience, ordonner l'assignation des témoins qui leur seront indiqués par l'accusé ou le prévenu indigent, dans le cas où la déclaration de ces témoins serait jugée utile pour la découverte de la vérité.

Pourront également être ordonnées d'offices les productions et vérifications de pièces.

Les mesures ainsi prescrites seront exécutées à la requête du ministère public,

Art. 31.—La présente loi pourra, par des règlements d'administration publique, être appliquée aux colonies et à l'Algérie.

The following Tables show the different cases in which assistance has been given during the years 1907, 1908 and 1909:—

(See Tables, pages 185, 186.)

42,963. Will you state shortly the effect of the Assistance Judiciaire?—The effect is that the persons to whom "assistance" is granted have not to pay anything while they remain poor. The advance is made by the State of all expenses relating to taxes which otherwise would be received from a litigant. It is made from the Treasury. The avocat and the avoué work for nothing. It is only when the poor litigant comes into better circumstances that he may be obliged to pay what he has been ordered to pay by the court. As to the other party, the assistance judiciaire has no effect upon him. He may claim his costs if the "assisté" was ordered to pay them, but this is more theoretical than practical. The assistance judiciaire being granted on the principle that the poor litigant cannot afford to pay, the other party is very rarely fortunate enough to get his costs.

42,964. If the poor litigant succeeds against a person who has some money, has that other person to pay for the costs which the poor litigant has had from the State, and so forth?—Yes, the other person who loses the case may be compelled to pay the costs of the poor litigant, including the fees of the avocat, the avoué, and the taxes due to the State.

42,965 I ask that because you said earlier that each party paid his own avocat and avoué, and they could not recover that from the other side?—What can be recovered is what could be recovered in any other case. If I have just mentioned the avocat, I must correct myself.

42,966. May I take it, if we read through what you have put in, it states fully the working of the assistance judiciaire?—That gives a resumé of the institution of assistance judiciarie.

42,967. And the way it works?—Yes.

42,968. Will you return to your proof?—Yes. "The number of divorces in France has increased very rapidly. In 1886, 2,950 decrees were pronounced: in 1888, 4,708; in 1902, 8,431; in 1904, 9,860; in 1906, 10,573. Out of 1,000 marriages, an average of 28 are dissolved by divorce. This average is taken on the whole of France; the figures much vary from one department to another. The proportion is 1 for 1,000 in the Hautes-Alpes and the Lozère; 2·5 in the Côtes du Nord: 78 (in 1899) at Paris; 63 in the Rhône. This increase may, I think, be ascribed to two principal causes in the domain of the law: (1) the grounds for divorce are not limited as narrowly as they should be; since the construction put upon the words 'injures graves' in article 231 has led the courts to consider as a ground for divorce practically every grave breach of duty of one spouse towards the other: 'on doit résumer le système actuel du droit français 'sur ce point de la façon suivante; le divorce est 'possible toutes les fois que l'un des époux manque 'gravement à ses devoirs envers l'autre. La gravité 'de la faute est en principe appréciée par les juges, 'dans certains cas, la loi enlève ce pouvoir en ordon-'nant que le divorce soit prononcé après vérification 'matérielle du fait indiqué par elle (Planiol, traité 'élémentaire de droit civil, tome 1, p. 384)." (2) The courts have a regrettable tendency to grant divorce too easily. At the tribunal of the Seine more than 200 divorces have been decreed in a single day (see Planiol, loc. cit.). This scandalous rapidity is certainly incompatible with the due consideration of the case. It is in the working classes that divorce becomes more and more frequent. (See communication of Maître Nourrisson to the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques, August, 1910). M. Esmein, member of the Institute of France, and professor at the Faculty of Law of the University of Paris, whilst acknowledging that the frequency of divorce is 'un mal profond, un 'élément dissolvant du bon ordre social,' gives the following explanation of the existing state of things: 'Lorsque Mâitre Nourrisson a constaté la progression 'des divorces, leur nombre croissant, spécialement dans 'les ménages ouvriers, ce fait ne m'a point étonné. 'Le divorce, en 1884, a été rétabli dans notre droit en 'grande partie, principalement peut-être, en vue des 'classes ouvrières. Quand il s'agit des classes riches 'ou aisées, si la vie est devenue trop pénible et in-'supportable pour les époux, le divorce est un remède à 'des maux d'ordre moral; il fait cesser des souffrances 'morales, mais il n'est point une nécessité imposée par 'les besoins matériels. Alors, en effet, après une simple 'séparation de corps, la vie matérielle, les ressources 'nécessaires, restent assurées à chacun des époux et 'aux enfants qui peuvent être nés du mariage. Il en 'est autrement quand il s'agit d'un ménage d'ouvriers 'désuni. C'est une remarque pénétrante, une vue 'véritablement profonde que M. Léon Renault a 'produite dans la discussion de la loi de 1884. Là 'la séparation de corps est un remède tout à fait 'insuffisant, inapplicable le plus souvent. Un ouvrier 'séparé, en effet, à moins de vivre uniquement au 'cabaret, ne peut se passer d'une femme qui prépare 'sa nourriture et tienne son humble ménage. Une 'ouvrière mariée et séparée de son mari, ne peut, 'surtout si elle a des enfants avec elle, gagner par

' son seul salaire de quoi fournir à sa nourriture et ' à celle de ses enfants; il faut qu'à son faible salaire ' s'ajoute le salaire plus fort d'un homme. Si donc on ' ne veut pas, dans ces circonstances, condamner en ' quelque sorte à l'union libre l'ouvrier et l'ouvrière, si ' l'on veut leur ouvrir aussi et leur maintenir possible ' l'état du mariage, il faut leur ouvrir aussi la porte du ' divorce. C'est un solution imposée par les conditions ' de leur vie matérielle. Dans les ménages riches et ' aisés la vie matérielle est assurée après la séparation ' de corps, comme avant. S'il ne se fût agi que d'eux, ' on aurait pû maintenir sans grande injustice l'in- ' dissolubilité du lien conjugal en raison de l'intérêt ' supérieur de la famille et des enfants. L'indissolu- ' bilité se défend par des raisons très élevées et très ' fortes. Dans la discussion de la loi de 1884, elle a ' été défendue, non pas seulement au nom des principes ' religieux, mais aussi, par des esprits désintéressés, en ' dehors de tout credo religieux, pour sa valeur sociale ' et morale. Mais, pour les ouvriers, la simple sépara- ' tion est une solution inacceptable."—(Compte-rendu de l'Académie des sciences morales et politiques, August, 1910, pages 259–260.)

42,969. The summary of that is this, that divorce is not really so necessary, physically speaking, as it were, for the rich as for the poor?—That is what he says.

42,970. And that for the poor by reason of the necessities of life, in the case of the man, the man requiring the woman to look after his home, and in the case of the woman, the woman having the necessity for somebody to support her, separation is no good, but divorce is. That is the argument?—Yes, divorce is better.

42,971. Is that from M. Esmein, a great writer on law?—Yes.

42,972. What is his official position?—He is Professor at the Faculty of Law and a member of the French Institute.

42,973. His book is often quoted here. Will you read what you have to say about the publication of reports?—Yes. I have little to say about the publication of reports of divorce cases. By article 239 of the Civil Code, as modified in 1886, the publication of the report of the proceedings in divorce cases in the press is prohibited under penalty of a fine of from 100 to 2,000 francs. Though the penalty is not very heavy, and notwithstanding the eagerness that certain French papers have sometimes shown to publish prohibited matters, this provision has rarely, if ever, been infringed. As a matter of fact, I have not been able to find any record of a decision relating to that article.

42,974. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I think you said that the most common ground of divorce now is that of grave insult to the spouses?—That is the general ground.

42,975. That is the most frequent ground of divorce?—By far the most frequent.

42,976. That was brought in in 1884?—No, that existed in the Code Napoléon.

42,977. That went on from 1804 to 1816?—That is a ground for divorce, but it was a ground for separation from the time of the Code Napoléon to 1884.

42,978. As a ground of divorce I suppose it ceased in 1816?—Yes, from 1816 there was no longer any divorce in France.

42,979. That is why I say that ground must have ceased in 1816. It was revived in 1884 and has gone on ever since?—Yes.

42,980. You have brought to our attention a very remarkable increase in the number of divorces from 1884 onwards?—Yes.

42,981. So great that it seems to have increased from 2,000 odd to 10,000 in 20 years?—Yes.

42,982. Are you aware of the figures since 1906?—I think the figures have remained about the same, perhaps they have slightly increased, but there are no official statistics published.

42,983. They are not less since 1906?—No.

42,984. But rather more?—Probably more, I could not tell you. I have not seen the statistics, I do not think they have been published.

42,985. I gather that you attribute that increase to the grounds of divorce that were brought in in 1884 by the Civil Code?—I attribute the great number of divorces to the vagueness of that ground, injure grave, which, according to the construction given by the court, may apply to any breach of conjugal duty.

42,986. It gives a very large discretion to the judge who happens to try the particular case?—Yes, and probably too large, That is the general opinion.

42,987. That great increase in the number of divorce cases is causing a good deal of anxiety amongst the authorities in France?—It begins to cause anxiety.

42,988. How many judges are there, roughly, in France who have divorce jurisdiction?—Every tribunal d'arrondissement, that is to say, every court sitting in a district has a full jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction includes divorce jurisdiction. There are 375 courts of that kind and three judges in each of those courts.

42,989. Are there only three judges to each of those 375 courts?—At least three judges.

42,990. In some, more?—In some more, but it is necessary that there should be three judges to make it valid.

42,991. That is the minimum?—Yes.

42,992. Does that help one to tell the number of judges in France who have this divorce jurisdiction?—Yes, you may multiply by three.

42,993. That would be giving a minimum of rather more than 1,000?—More than 1,000, certainly.

42,994. Would it be as much as 2,000, do you think?—I could not tell you exactly, because at the Tribunal in Paris, for instance, there are many sections and two or three sections sit as a court of divorce.

42,995. I am safe in concluding that there are more than 1,000 judges in France who exercise this jurisdiction?—There are more than 1,000 judges, but only 375 courts, 42,996. I follow that. That means that this very wide discretion can be exercised by all that very large number of judges?—Yes.

42,997. I suppose, as in every other part of the world, the discretion is exercised in a different way by different individuals?—Certainly.

42,998. Does it appear to you that is a drawback to the administration of justice?—No.

42,999. You think not?—No, it is not complained of because the same discretion is used in other kinds of cases.

43,000. Is it not open to the objection that parties living in one arrondissement can get a divorce, whereas, if they were living in another, for the same grounds they could not get a divorce?—Such a thing will very rarely happen. Although the courts exercise discretion, if the evidence shows that there is what may generally be called an injure grave, a divorce will be obtained everywhere. The discretion is used as to the appreciation of the evidence more than as to the appreciation of the ground itself.

43,001. It does not strike you that it is open to a difference of opinion as to what is a sufficiently grave insult?—Yes, it may lead to that.

43,002. To justify divorce?—It may also be said what is a grave insult in a particular case, owing to the education of the spouses, may not be a grave insult in another case, where the people are not so well educated, for instance.

43,003. That is the sort of discretion which I should have thought would be exercised quite differently by different individuals?—Yes, probably.

43,004. So that to go back to my suggestion, whether spouses get divorce or not must depend on the particular district they are in?—It will depend on the judge of course.

43,005. That in itself surely is a defect?—It is a defect, but it is a general defect of any system of justice.

43,006. Where you have a very large number of judges exercising a discretionary jurisdiction?—Yes, or when two different judges have to give a decision even if they belong to the same court.

43,007. The margin of difference is much greater if you have 1,000 judges with that discretion than if you have two?—Of course that is a question of arithmetic.

43,008. With regard to the status of the judge who exercises this jurisdiction, were you present when the last witness was examined?—Yes.

43,009. Would what he said of the German system be true also of France, that the judicial profession is a separate profession from the profession of a barrister?—As a rule it is a separate profession.

43,010. I know that a judge has to qualify by being a barrister first, but quite early in life he leaves the bar and takes to the judicial profession?—Yes, that is the general rule. Sometimes there are exceptions. Barristers of high standing may be appointed to the Court of Appeal, but that is the exception.

43,011. Take one of the ordinary judges who deals with divorce in an arrondissement. Would he be generally a youngish man?—The court will consist of three judges, one of whom, the President, will be a man of about 45.

43,012. And the others younger?—Yes, the others may certainly be younger.

43,013. (Mrs. Tennant.) Can you say if the minority which disapproves of the equality between the sexes is increasing or diminishing in France?—I think the tendency is to approve more and more of the new status of the law.

43,014. (Sir William Anson.) Are these cases decided by one judge sitting alone or by three sitting together?—By three sitting together.

43,015. As a matter of fact, do you find that there is a great variety of discretion exercised in the interpretation of injure grave?—Not a very great variety on the appreciation of the ground, but according to the circumstances, as I have just said, insult may be held to have been committed in one case which would not be considered an insult in another case.

43,316. Where 200 divorces were granted in one day that hardly leaves much time for the exercise of any discretion?—I must say this, these cases were certainly undefended cases, and the court probably relied, and to my mind relied too much, on the preliminary examination of the case which was previously made by the Bureau Assistance Judiciaire. Those, no doubt, were cases of assistance judiciaire, and the Bureau Assistance Judiciaire has a right to examine the facts of the case, and to reject or admit the parties to the assistance judiciaire according to the seriousness of their contention.

43,017. Do you now find that public opinion among the working classes points to the desirability of divorce whenever a couple disagree?—I do not quite follow your question.

43,018. Is public opinion in favour of divorce whenever a married couple disagree and are not happy together?—It is difficult to gather what public opinion may say in such a case as that. The question has been studied by different institutions or institutes and it has generally been thought that divorce was granted too easily.

43,019. Do you think that can be the case if that number of divorces is granted in one day without giving any shock to public opinion?—It has been thought shocking since it has been noticed and published in many papers.

43,020. (Sir Frederick Treves.) What is the standing of the courts that deal with divorce cases as compared with the standing of courts in England? Do they correspond to the High Court?—Legally they correspond to the High Court, because these courts have full jurisdiction in all matters, but as a matter of fact, except as regards the Court of Paris, the Tribunal de la Seine, the standing of the judges could not be compared with the standing of the judges in the High Court here.

43,021. As far as the rich and the poor are concerned they have equal facilities in obtaining a divorce?—The facilities are even greater for the poor, since they have not to pay anything, thanks to the assistance judiciaire.

43,022. Is the sum paid by the State for this class of litigation a very large sum?—I do not think it is very large, because it only applies to the expenses of the witnesses and to some stamp fees. I should not think for each case of that kind it is more than 2*l.*

43,023. Do you think that the history of divorce in France would lead one to suppose that increased facilities for divorce have led to an increased number of divorce cases? By increasing the grounds for divorce have you increased the number of divorce cases?—I should think so.

43,024. That would be a reasonable inference?—Yes.

43,025. Is there any feeling that insanity should be a ground for divorce?—There has been some desire to make insanity a ground for divorce. I have found expression of that desire made in a report of a committee of the Société des études législatives, but even that association has not come to the conclusion that insanity should be made a ground of divorce. It would alter the principle of the Divorce Law immensely, because according to our law there can be no divorce where there is no guilty party, and if you make insanity a ground for divorce where is the guilty party in that case of disease?

43,026. Speaking of the equality of the sexes and adultery in the two sexes you say, "It has been maintained that, however similar from the moral point of view, the husband's adultery might rightly be considered as a less grave breach of conjugal duty because it cannot have the same physical consequence." What is meant by that last expression?—I mean as to strange children being brought into the family.

43,027. That is the point?—Yes.

43,028. Would you say that the unfaithful wife is more likely to contract disease than the unfaithful husband? That is another point?—I am not speaking of disease.

43,029. You are speaking of consequences. Apparently there is only one consequence?—I only speak of that particular consequence as to children.

43,030. I suppose with regard to what may be called physical consequences, one must consider the possibility of disease being acquired?—I should not express any opinion on that question.

43,031. Would you let us draw the inference that a woman is more likely to contract disease?—It is a medical question, and I do not wish to express any opinion on it. I should say with regard to adultery being made a ground of divorce, when it is committed by the husband, that the question should not be put on the ground of the equality of the sexes. It would be better, perhaps, to ask if the adultery of the husband, however different or less grave than that of the wife, is a sufficient breach of conjugal duty. If you put it in that way I should say yes. I may, perhaps, add this, that it is a good thing, if it is made a ground for divorce, if the effect would be only to deprive the wife of a bad pretext for retaliating.

43,032. (Sir George White.) You say adultery is a criminal offence in France. Whose business is it to put the law in motion in a case of that kind? Is it simply the business of the aggrieved parties, or do the police consider it their business to put the law in motion if they know of it?—No, the police cannot put the law in motion.

43,033. It is the business of the aggrieved parties only?—Yes, even when it is a question of bringing the case before a criminal court the police have no right to put the law in motion. A criminal action can only be put in motion in that particular case by the complaint of the party.

43,034. In your figures you have given an extraordinarily marked difference as to the number of divorce cases in the various arrondissements, varying from 1 to 60. Is there any reason why in certain parts of France the number of divorce cases rises to the number of 62 per thousand?—The reason is that divorce is more frequent in large towns for instance, comparatively, divorces are more frequent in Paris than they are in the country.

43,035. It is the comparison between the rural district and a large city?—Yes, in the figures I have given it may be noticed that the departments where divorce is more frequent are departments in which there are large towns.

43,036. In the case where you quote 200 divorces in a single day, is that before one court?—I hope there were two courts sitting. Generally there are two courts sitting at the same time, at the Tribunal de la Seine. The statistics I have seen say 200 divorces in a day. I suppose two courts helped to that result.

43,037. As regards the publication of reports, newspapers are prohibited by fine from reporting the cases. Is no report of the case allowed at all?—Yes, but the law prevents the publication of the arguments and the evidence of the witnesses. The law does not prevent the publication of the judgment itself.

43,038. That is what is generally done, I suppose?—Yes.

43,039. You detail a number of grounds upon which divorce can be granted. Is one of these alone sufficient, such as, for instance refusal of obedience on the part of the wife?—I should think in a case like that the refusal of obedience must be accompanied by probably very bad words.

43,040. There may be more grounds than one. It does not follow that these are all separate grounds upon which divorce can be given?—Not necessarily.

43,041. I think you said, in answer to Sir Lewis Dibdin, that the increase in the number of divorces might be attributable to the alteration of the law in 1884?—Divorce was not possible before 1884.

43,042. Under any circumstances?—Between 1816 and 1884.

43,043. Is the increased number which is spread over some 12 years attributable to the exercise of a wider discretion on the part of the judges?—Partly to that and also partly to the fact that the idea of divorce had to be accepted step by step after it had first been re-organised.

43,044. Do the advocates who represent the poor get any pay from the State, or does the State simply pay the expenses of the witnesses?—They do not get any fee at all.

43,045. (Sir William Anson.) Is there any appeal either on law or on fact from the decision of the court of the arrondissement?—There is an appeal on law and on fact to the Court of Appeal, and there is an appeal on law from the Court of Appeal to the Court of Cassation.

43,046. (Chairman.) You have put in a set of tables for 1907, 1908, and 1909, showing the nature of the cases in which assistance was asked for, and the tables show in how many cases there were demands for assistance, how many were remitted, how many were rejected, and what happened to the cases afterwards?—Yes.

43,047. I notice that by far the greater number of cases in which assistance was given were divorce cases. The figures for divorce in 1907, 1908, and 1909 respectively are over 9,000 applications, and the largest figure for any other case I find is over 2,000 for accidents during work?—That is quite natural because poor people have very rarely to litigate with regard to their pecuniary interests.

43,048. It is chiefly divorce?—Yes.

43,049. To make quite sure that we are agreed about this there are in the list of causes of divorce which you have given five different causes?—Yes.

43,050. Adultery is one?—Yes.

43,051. That alone is a ground of divorce?—Yes.

43,052. Violation so as to endanger life?—Yes.

43,053. That by itself is a ground of divorce?—Yes.

43,054. Cruelty, sévice, that is physical cruelty, I take it?—Yes, sévice et excès may be translated by cruelty. It is difficult to distinguish between sévice and excès.

43,055. That is a ground of divorce?—Yes.

43,056. Leaving the injure grave, the condemnation to a punishment "peine afflictive et infamante," is also a ground?—Yes.

43,057. Are those grounds upon which there is any real difficulty as to a divorce in France?—About adultery and about convictions on the ground you have just mentioned, as soon as evidence is given of the existence of adultery or existence of a judgment convicting the person, divorce must be pronounced. In any other case the courts exercise their discretion.

43,058. Is it quite a discretion in the case, for instance, of excès?—Yes.

43,059. Is it not rather a discretion to find the fact, but if excès is found it is a right?—It is then the same as injure grave.

43,060. You must find the fact?—You find the fact and say that these facts are excès, and then you grant the divorce. It is the same for injure grave.

43,061. Is it the injure grave according to you that has created such a large increase in the number of divorces?—It is because the courts have held that there was injure in many cases which were very difficult to classify. For instance, they say that there is an injure grave when the wife who has been requested by the husband to return to the conjugal house, says, "I will not go back to you." If it is expressed categorically, for instance, by a letter written to the husband, or even to his avoué, it may be taken as an injure grave. It is very easy to guess that many collusions may take place in such a case as that.

43,062. The main difficulty in France seems to arise from there being no strict definition of injure grave, or excès, or sévice?—Yes.

43,063. If that were defined strictly so that there was no discretion, it might get rid of many difficulties?—There would not be so much difficulty at any rate.

43,064. It is the court of arrondissement?—The tribunal d'arrondissement.

43,065. That is composed of three judges?—Yes.

43,066. Can you tell me what salary the judges receive?—It depends upon the population of the town. Tribunals are divided into different classes according to the population.

43,067. What is the range of salary?—Their salaries may range from 120*l.* perhaps to 800*l.* (See Supplement below.)

(Chairman.) I am very much indebted to you, and I am sure that the Commissioners are, for your very valuable evidence which has put us in full possession of the state of things in France.

Mr. EDMUND SIDNEY POLLOCK HAYNES called and examined.

43,068. (Chairman.) You are a member of the firm of Hunter and Haynes, solicitors, of Lincoln's Inn?—Yes.

43,069. You are also a member of the Divorce Reform Union?—Yes, and I belonged to another society before that.

43,070. We have already had evidence from representative officers of the society, and, therefore, I do not propose to ask you any questions about the general matters with which it is concerned; but you have, yourself, I believe, made a careful study of one or two points which you propose to present for our information?—Yes.

43,071. I gather you have looked into many authorities and books, and corresponded with a number of people with a view to getting the information?—I have.

43,072. Perhaps you would read your proof as far as it is necessary?—I do not wish to keep the Commissioners longer than I can help, if they will tell me what I ought to skip.

43,073. It is prepared in a form which will be sufficiently clear?—I have made a number of inquiries as to what procedure exists for annulling marriages in countries where marriages cannot be dissolved.

43,074. That is the point. You see the position of things in countries where there is no divorce law?—Yes. Such facilities exist both in the Ecclesiastical Courts of the Catholic Church and under the Civil Law. In searching for this information I have not wished in any way to attack the Church of Rome. On the contrary, I much admire the ideal of marriage being indissoluble as an ideal, although I have never been able to understand the interpretation put upon Christ's words by the Church, especially in view of the conflicting opinions held by the Early Fathers and by all other Christian bodies. Nor do I wish to suggest that the Church has ever intentionally encouraged laxity in regard to the marriage tie, although there is no doubt that the uncertain conditions of marriage in medieval times and the complicated provisions of the Canon Law made marriage in the Middle Ages quite as uncertain as it is now in some of the American States. I principally wish to emphasise two points:—(1) That the facts of life make the ideal of indissolubility impossible to maintain in every case, and (2), that the Neo-Catholic party in the Church of England have not raised a finger towards solving the principal problem which must be solved by any Church or State which assumes the control of matrimony.

43,075. What exactly does that indicate?—I mean that in the Medieval Church they annulled marriages, and the State has given facilities for dissolution, but that the Neo-Catholic party in the Church of England proposes no solution at all that I am aware of. I mean they do not propose to take to themselves power to annul marriages for any reason whatever, whereas, on the other hand, Lord Halifax and his supporters wish to prevent the State giving facilities for divorce.

43,076. I wanted to be clear what you meant?—"The Catholic Church deals with marriage from the earliest moment, and has set up a system known as 'Sponsalia,' which is not compulsory, but which is strongly recommended to Catholics about to marry. It takes the form of an agreement to marry, which can be dissolved for good reasons before the marriage takes place. I submit that such agreements must have a wholesome effect in making parties about to marry very careful in considering what they are about, and that the custom might very well be adopted by any Church or State. It also involves the priest making a number of inquiries which would tend to disclose any want of consent or any relationship within the wide prohibited degrees of the Canon Law. Want of consent is very rarely heard of, in so far as this doctrine of the Canon Law has become part of the English law, and I am inclined to think that the Church gives the doctrine a wider application than the English Courts."

43,077. I think the next paragraph is not worth putting in?—"It must be remembered that dispensations are easily obtained by parties married against the provisions of the Canon Law, either before marriage or on the discovery of the marriage being void, but the Church does not force persons who have married in good faith and subsequently discover that they are unmarried, to invalidate the marriage if they do not wish it, although the Church does legitimate the children of such intercourse even where only one parent had acted in good faith. In another way, too, the Church strengthens the marriage tie by very strongly insisting on the duty of married persons to have children, and the ratio of divorce is everywhere indisputably higher among childless couples than among others. A childless couple, with no particular interests or occupations, frequently seem to become tired of each other after about ten years of married life, and feel the attraction of younger persons than themselves. On the other hand, I think that the influence of Catholicism on sexual morality is exaggerated by those who dwell only upon the state of things in Ireland. In Latin countries in the South of Europe the standard of sexual morality cannot be considered high, and there is reason to suppose that Irish girls who get into trouble are spirited off to Glasgow, Liverpool, and sometimes New York, so that there is no record of such illegitimate births in Ireland itself."

43,078. On what is that founded?—I have not been able to get authority for the Irish girls being taken off to Glasgow and Liverpool, but I am told the authorities in Glasgow will support that. I have not been in communication with them myself, but the Union has, and another friend of mine has too.* "The general conclusion I draw is that the rules as to nullity are more strictly enforced nowadays, but must afford chances for unhappy married couples to get free of their union. It is quite as difficult to say in what proportion of cases marriages are annulled by worthy persons for worthy motives, as it would be in the English Divorce Court. I should think, however, that it would be very difficult for a married couple to get rid of the marriage tie in a case where they had been happily married for the first five or ten years of married life, and there certainly seems more reason for abolishing the union of persons who have never been very happy together than of persons who have been happily associated for 10 or 20 years. There is a further point to be remembered, which is, that Roman Catholics, like many of the English poor, regard concubinage with less disapproval than any rupture of the marriage tie. Concubinage is technically a mortal sin, but I gather that most Roman Catholics (especially in Latin countries) would judge it more tenderly than a civil divorce. This is a quite different attitude to the rather ostrich-like position of many Anglicans who shut their eyes to the facts of life and human nature, while the hardship on the children of irregular unions is mitigated because they can always be legitimated by subsequent marriage unless they are the offspring of an unfaithful wife. (According to strict Canon law, adultery necessitates the participation of a married woman, and the intercourse of a married man with a single woman is not adultery.) Where the ecclesiastical court pronounces a nullity decree the successful party can always obtain a civil divorce or nullity decree according to the Civil law, and this regulates rights of property and succession. In every country where the Civil law does not permit divorce a vinculo facilities exist under the Civil law for obtaining a civil decree of nullity for similar reasons to those sanctioned by the Canon law, and in some cases beyond the Canon law. My information on this point is mainly derived from the report to the Foreign Office on Foreign Marriage Laws in 1894, and it may not be correct in every detail, but it is on the whole correct, and in some cases it is supplemented by the opinions of foreign lawyers to whom I have written. Taking Europe first, I begin with Italy, where, to my knowledge, the lawyers have been agitating for a divorce law since 1904. I am told two Bills have been rejected by the Upper House in the last six years."

43,079. To what extent were they supported?—They were passed by the Lower House, and all the lawyers I imagine are naturally very anxious to have a divorce law. They know cases of hardship.

43,080. Two Bills passed the Lower House?—And were rejected by the Upper House.

43,081. Were they Bills for giving divorce on certain grounds such as we have been considering?—I am afraid I only came across the information the other day, so that I do not know the details of them. They were Bills probably, I should think, on the lines of the Code Napoléon. I was recommended by an Italian friend to consult Signor Cesare Carocci in Florence, and in reply to my inquiries he wrote as follows.

* See supplemental letters (marked A) annexed hereto at conclusion of witness's evidence.

43,082. What is he?—He is an advocate in Florence.

43,083. Of position?—Yes.

43,084. He gives you the account about Italy?—Yes. "In Italy, where no divorce exists, and matri-" mony ends only with the life of husband or wife, the " civil law admits the nullity of marriage in some " cases specially mentioned in paragraphs 104 and " following ones of the Civil Code. One must bear " in mind that in Italy ecclesiastical laws and regula-" tions concerning matrimony and cases of nullity of " marriage have no value in Italian civil law. It is " only the Civil Code which rules and regulates all cases " in which nullity of marriage may be admitted. " According to the Italian Civil Code, nullity of " marriage may be granted in the following cases " only:—1—(a) When the man has contracted marriage " before the 18th year of age and the woman before " the 15th year of age, without having been grauted " special licence by the King; (b) When one of the " parties is already married; (c) When the parties are " connected in a direct liue between legitimate " or natural ascendants or descendants and kindred " of the same line; or in a collateral line between " legitimate or natural sisters and brothers, and when " without having been granted a King's licence the " marriage has been contracted between relations of " the same degree between uncle and niece, aunt and " nephew; (d) When the husband and wife are con-" nected as follows:—the adopting parent and adopted " child, and his or her descendants, between the " adopted children of the same person, between the " adopted child and the subsequent children of the " adopted parent; between the adopted child and " the widow or widower of the adopting person; " between the adopting parent and the widow or " widower of the adopted child; (e) When one of the " parties has been convicted in a penal action for " wilful murder, committed, failed or attempted, or as " an accomplice thereof, against the person already " married to the other party."

43,085. That is a conviction after marriage, as I follow it?—Yes.

43,086. Do you say the Code which he sets out there permits a nullity for that?—Yes.

43,087. That is practically really divorce?—It is really divorce.

43,088. The other case, want of consent or being married already, are true grounds of nullity, but this ground looks as if it were, on the face of it, really divorce?—You mean that there is a distinction between nullity and divorce? Nullity assumes no marriage from the beginning, and divorce assumes dissolution of a bond already existing.

43,089. Yes?—In this case it is an odd twisting of the nullity doctrine.

43,090. If it is an offence committed since the marriage against the person already married, of a penal character like murder, attempted murder, and so on, that is an offence which cannot be properly spoken of as a nullity ground, but a divorce ground?—"It abandons " the ecclesiastical doctrine in saying there never was " any marriage at all."

43,091. You are quoting there from Carocci?—Yes.

43,092. That is quoted from the Code. We can see that for ourselves?—Yes.

43,093. Is your next paragraph still the letter?—Yes. "When the marriage was performed before an " unauthorised (noncompetent) or incompetent official " of the Stato Civile, or without the presence of the " necessary witnesses. After the lapse of one year " from the date of the marriage no application for " nullity due to the incompetence of the registrar can " be admitted. (3) When the contracting parties or " either of them have not obtained a free consent " (from parents or guardians). (4) When a mistake " occurred in the identity of the person. But no " application for nullity of marriage is admitted for " mistaken or not freely given consent as by No. 3 " and 4, if there has been continual cohabitation for " one month from the date on which the party regained " his or her full freedom or found out the mistake. " (5) When the party is manifestly permanently " impotent previous to the marriage. (6) When the " marriage has been contracted without the consent " of the ascendant relations or of the family council, " or of the council of guardians, in all cases where the " law requires such consent. (7) When at the time " of marriage one of the contracting parties had " already been found by the law non compos mentis, " or if the mental disease as to which judgment was " afterwards given is proved to have existed at the " time of the marriage. Having thus shown the law " relating to the dissolution of marriage according to " the laws of Italy, I must necessarily come to a " conclusion entirely opposite to the opinion of " Mr. Haynes."

43,094. What is that?—I had studied the Code before, and it seemed to me it was very odd that the ecclesiastical suit of nullity should have any analogy with annulling a marriage for a crime after marriage, and I had also reason to suspect there was collusion in the Italian Courts, and that it was very easy to throw dust in the eyes of the judges. I suggested divorce was not in practice difficult in Italy, because it would be easy to get a collusive nullity suit on one of the lines in the Code.

43,095. At any rate, he is answering suggestions you had made?—In his second letter he withdraws that.

43,096. Then he goes on?—"Nullity of marriage " cannot in any manner whatsoever take the place of " divorce, which is an essentially different institution, " by which perfectly valid marriages can be dissolved. " In Italy, too, a large number of scientists and lawyers " have for a long time asked for a law of divorce, " which proves that 'nullity of marriage' is not suffi-" cient to give the beneficial effects of divorce. I " cannot share Mr. Haynes' opinion that causes of " nullity are more subject to abuse and frivolous " reasons than ordinary separation suits for adultery or " desertion, because in Italy, at least in the matter of " annulment, jurisprudence has always been and is of " even excessive severity. A question has been raised " in Italy whether Italian subjects, duly married, who " for the purpose of enjoying the benefits of divorce " laws have become foreign subjects or citizens, and " as such have been divorced abroad, may obtain in " Italy the recognition of such a foreign divorce, " Until lately the law was very uncertain. I may even " say that in Italy the principle prevailed that no " execution could be granted to foreign judgments, " because it was held that such judgments contained " dispositions contrary to the internal public law of " Italy. Lately, however, since the Hague Convention " dated 12th June 1902, which was given legal effect " in Italy by the law of September 7th, 1905, by which " the contracting States have bound themselves to " recognise divorce judgments, provided that all the " clauses of the Convention are duly observed, the " Italian law has decided to limit the inquiry to the " point whether the articles of the Convention of the " Hague conflicted with Article 941 of the Civil Code, " and in the event of there being no conflict to grant " the execution of foreign divorce judgments. As a " slight and insufficient corrective in lieu of divorce in " Italy we have separation, which, without the disso-" lution of the marriage tie, separates the parties when " discord has come between them and they can no " longer live together. This is also very strictly re-" gulated by the Civil Code, which, besides the case " of separation by mutual consent, grants separa-" tion decrees only on some specified reasons, such as " adultery or wilful desertion, excesses, cruelty and " grievous offences, sentence for criminal conviction " and want of permanent abode. A suit by the wife " for adultery by the husband is not admitted, unless " the husband keeps the mistress in the house or " notoriously elsewhere, or there are such circum-" stances as to constitute a serious offence to the " wife." That finishes his first letter. I wrote again pressing my inquiries on the question of collusion, especially as I had heard there was a good deal of corruption in the Italian Courts, and he replied as follows:—" Replying to Mr. Haynes' queries, I may " add that it has happened that the parties have " attempted to avail themselves collusively of some " cases of nullity to have their marriage annulled; in " some cases, misleading the good faith of the judges, " they have succeeded even in obtaining a decree of " nullity." Then he quotes the Hague Convention and Article 941 of the Civil Code. Article 941 says:— " Execution of foreign judgments is granted by the " Court of Appeal, in the jurisdiction of which such " judgments are to be executed after a judicial hearing " in which the Court examines: (1) If the judgment " was issued by a competent judicial authority; (2) if " it has been pronounced after the parties have been " duly cited; (3) if the parties have been legally re- " presented or have denied the authority of the " Court."

43,097. Where does the letter finish?—That is an appendix.

43,098. Are you still reading from his letter?—No. I do not remember whether his letter included that, but I got the article and put it out in full so as to have no mistake.

43,099. Will you kindly show, when you have your print before you, where the letter ends?—I think he set out this Article 941.

43,100. Perhaps you will verify that in the proof. The next is your own point?—Yes. " An Anglo-Italian friend of mine informs me that the wealthier Italians adopt Swiss or Hungarian nationality to obtain divorce and then return to Italy after the lapse of some years and the foreign judgment is admitted. He adds: 'I think on the whole they manage very ' well without divorce. They (i.e., husband and wife) ' each go their own way immediately after marriage ' and the husbands are quite happy, especially if the ' wife turns an honest penny anyhow and anywhere.' He thinks that there is not much collusion on questions of kinship (though this opinion is disputed by others), but that there is a certain amount of collusion in regard to pretended impotence, and this opinion is confirmed by another Anglo-Italian friend living in Capri. My general conclusion in regard to Italy is that when people want marriages annulled or dissolved and are rich enough they get what they want, but that they do not often want it and that a great deal of adultery goes on all round in spite of its being a criminal offence.

" In regard to Austria: I was recommended by the English Consul to take the opinion of Dr. Maximilian Krenn, who wrote to me as follows:—

" Vienna, March 23, 1910.

" SIR,—REPLYING to yours of the 9th inst., I cannot give an answer offhand, as the Austrian Marriage Law is complicated. I shall be very glad to assist you, but you must either put a special case or give me detailed questions to answer. Till some decades ago we had in Austria the Canon Law binding on all Catholics."

I have in my pocket a pamphlet by the Austrian Marriage Law Reform Union, if the Commissioners would like to see it.

43,101. I do not think we want that?—" A State " Law subsequently took its place, which repealed a " number of provisions of the Canon Law, but con- " firmed others. In general one can say that the " marriage laws here are different according to the " religion of the parties. The classification is Catholic, " Protestant, Jewish and 'Confessionslos.' A marriage " between Catholics is indissoluble except by death, " although a question as to the vadidity of the marriage " may be raised under some circumstances. This is " quite different from the question whether a valid " marriage can be dissolved. There is so-called " 'separation from bed and board' between Catholics; " the marriage then continues to exist, though the " parties are separated." They may join together again at any time without a new marriage.

43,102. I do not know that this is of value, because we have already had put in the law in Austria from the Blue Books. I do not think this helps us. I do not know whether it deals separately with nullity. We have only the divorce law?—I quote a hard case the Marriage Law Union sent me.

43,103. (Mr. Brierley.) Does this letter deal with the question of nullity?—Yes.

43,104. (Chairman.) Will you read the paragraph beginning " Whether a marriage can be declared invalid"?—Yes. " Whether a marriage can be declared " invalid depends on the special case. The grounds " are such as the incapacity of one of the parties to " enter into a valid marriage contract (madness, idiocy, " infancy without permission of parents or guardians), " or again because consent has not been really given " (terror, mistake, or when the husband finds his wife " already with child by another man). There are other " impediments such as permanent impotence at the " time of the marriage, or previous marriage to a third " party, Catholic Orders, difference of religion (Chris- " tians cannot marry non-Christians), relationship, " adultery, murder of former husband, non-performance " of necessary formalities (banns or notice or solemn " declaration of consent)." Then it goes on to separation.

43,105. He says Christians cannot marry non-Christians?—Yes.

43,106. That would be a ground of nullity?—Yes, and anybody who does not belong to a Christian body is called " Confessionslos." Then the letter continues: " —The separation from bed and board can be " effected by common consent of the spouse or be ob- " tained by one against the will of the other; the pro- " cedure before the court differs accordingly. The " reasons for which a separation can be given are " adultery, desertion, or irregular life, endangering the " property of the petitioner or the morals of the family, " attacks on life or health, bodily or aggravated moral " cruelty, permanent contagious affections. The court " decides according to the evidence whether such a " reason for separation exists and can grant it for the " fault of one or both parties. For completeness I " may add that Catholic marriages can be declared " dissolved when one spouse is declared by the court " to be dead or disappeared. The above gives a general " account of the chief points regarding the invalidity, " divorce and separation of the Catholic marriage." Then I have a long story which does not apply to English conditions.

43,107. Do not let us have anything of that kind?—It shows the evils that result from applying the law on the religious classification.

43,108. If it is only an illustration of that kind I do not think we care about it. Will you go on to page 11. I would like to know what the statistics are?—These have all been supplied to me by the Divorce Law Reform Union, and they have been in communication with the authorities.

43,109. In Austria?—Yes. The statistics show that there are about half a million separated Catholics in Austria, and that the illegitimacy figures are far higher than in any other European country.

43,110. I would like to know exactly whether we can see what that comes from?—Yes, I can get the authorities, certainly.*

43,111. It is a remarkable statement and I should like to see what it is founded on. If you will send the book of statistics for us to examine, I should be glad. We want to be careful not to get general statements without seeing the authority for them?—" Such figures " never include adulterine bastardy and they depend to " some extent on the prevalence of artificial restraints " of conception, but they undoubtedly point to a " general looseness and licence which would naturally " result from the operation of such laws. Fairly " reasonable facilities for divorce exist for Protestants, " Jews, and persons of no denomination, but the popu- " lation is mainly Catholic. It is clear that Hungarian " nationality is freely adopted for the purposes of " divorce, for from 1898 to 1906, 7,470 Roman Catholic " husbands and 7,642 Roman Catholic wives obtained

* See supplemental letters (marked B) annexed hereto at conclusion of witness's evidence.

" divorces in preference to separations in Hungary (as " opposed to Greek Catholics and members of the " Greek Church)." I was careful to find out that a " Catholic " was not a member of the Greek Church.

43,112. There are several differences, there are Protestants. Greeks, and Jews. What does this show ?—That the people who are called Roman Catholics are Roman Catholics and not Greek Catholics.

43,113. In Hungary there is no limitation for Catholics ?—No ; that is why they go to Hungary.

43,114. I want to know where those figures come from ?—I am satisfied they are reliable, but I will put before the Commissioners my authority. I knew it was important, and I satisfied myself that it was reliable authority before I came here.

43,115. Still, I think it is a very remarkable statement, and we ought to see exactly what statistics it is based on ?—" There is no official explanation how " these Roman Catholics reconcile their divorces with " membership of their Church, but the fact re- " mains that they do obtain the divorces. The Ehe- " rechtsreformverein, that is the Marriage Law Union " Association, write that they merely cut themselves " away from the Church." I have a good deal of information from the Marriage Law Reform Union in Vienna. Mr. Krenn subsequently wrote and said there was no collusion, and that a special official is employed by the Courts, as in the Ecclesiastical Courts of the Catholic Church, to uphold the validity of any marriage that is impeached, a sort of King's Proctor. The expense of these suits appears to be prohibitive for ordinary citizens. The Austrian Law also applies to Croatia.

43,116. We will leave out Portugal, because we have had put in the new law of Portugal ?—Has it become law, or only a Bill ?

43,117. We have had it supplied by the Home Secretary ?—It is law now ?

43,118. I think so ?—Taking Spain only, the Church here controls marriage in the ecclesiastical courts. The grounds of nullity are a vow of chastity, consanguinity, conviction of adultery, responsibility for murder of former spouse, relation of adoptive parent and child, mistake and coercion. With regard to Ireland, you have had evidence. I have been told—I cannot quote official authority—that Canadians resort to the United States of America for divorce, and, of course, Irish people can change their domicile.

43,119. I do not think you need trouble about the United States of America, because we have had full evidence about that, but I do not think we have had any particulars about South American States ?—Was there any evidence given about South Carolina ?

45,120. Yes ?—In Brazil (it is the Law in 1894 in most cases) there is no " divorce but the grounds for " nullity are conviction of adultery, responsibility for " murder of previous spouse, want of consent, relation " of guardian and ward, marriage with another person " within period of less than 20 months after nullity " decree. To these are added within two years of " marriage being celebrated.—(1) Ignorance of the " other spouse having committed a crime. (2) Physical " defect or incurable contagious disease. (3) Ignorance " of the other spouse's ' condition.' "—I suppose that means with regard to money or property or social rank. I have not been able to make out what that means—" European legislation might profitably imitate a " statutory provision that the parents of a spouse may " demand a medical certificate of health and vaccina- " tion as a condition of consent." In Chile there is no divorce, but the grounds for nullity are want of consent, insanity, and are generally similar to those in Argentina. In Argentina there is no divorce, but marriages are annulled for consanguinity between ascendants and descendants without limitation, affinity in the direct line in all degrees, insanity (when fraud is practised), responsibility for death of former spouse, want of consent, or mistake or fraud. The children of all annulled marriages are legitimate. Then, after sending in my first notes, I got some further information as regards Argentina. I am informed that divorce is not much in demand. The men are usually unfaithful to their wives, though a high standard exists for the women. Divorce, however, can be obtained at Monte Video, and those who wish for it frequently go to Monte Video and remain there. Then there is a long letter.

43,121. Is it sufficiently material to put in that long letter ?—I do not think it is.

43,122. When you say the men are usually unfaithful, is not that rather too sweeping a statement ? Where do you get it ?—I have more than one friend in Argentina, and I am told that the wife can only get a separation, and that as she can only get a separation, she necessarily connives at her husband's conduct, and therefore a loose standard exists for the men although a high standard exists for the women.

43,123. That is very much more modified. It might justify the statement that not infrequently the law results in the man being immoral and the woman moral, but when you say " usually," it is rather sweeping ?—I admit the language is strong, but it seemed to me where the man had such powers it usually led to this laxity. There is the question of what goes on in Monte Video. I thought that was important, because it shows that the law is very loose. A very liberal divorce law has been introduced in Monte Video in 1908. This is the Uruguayan Republic, and the town has a population of 300,000. Divorce by consent is allowed, and residence is a sufficient test of jurisdiction. I wanted to emphasize the fact that there was a Divorce Bill in Argentina which was defeated three years ago by a small majority of five or six votes in the House of Deputies. That is the Lower House. " It will be observed that the law of Argentina gives " liberal facilities for easy divorce in Monte Video if " only the parties remarry outside Argentina. This is " analogous to the provision of the Scottish law which " prohibits the remarriage of the respondent and co- " respondent, but the prohibition does not extend to " marriages contracted outside Scotland." The Roman Catholic attitude seems less rigid than in England. This Argentine lawyer told me, that although he was a Roman Catholic, he considered that the priests of his religion should not interfere with the civil institutions of the nation. " In regard to the Roman " Catholic Church, historians are unanimous in con- " demning the uncertainty of marriage during the " middle ages, and it appears that fictitious genealogies " were resorted to where even the complications of the " Canon Law were insufficient. In spite of the uncom- " promising declarations of the Council of Trent in " 1563, we find Pope Benedict XIV., in 1741, sternly " condemning the laxity of the ecclesiastical courts." I have put in the actual Latin words. He says that women are known to marry four husbands with this nullity process. " After speaking of the facility with " which decrees were obtained, he writes in his " ' Constitutio ' : ' Nobis . . . indicata sunt exempla " ' nonnullorum virorum, qui post primam et secundam " ' et tertiam, quam duxerant, uxorem ob nimian judi- " ' cum præcipitantiam in nullitate matrimoniorum " ' declaranda, adhuc illis primis uxoribus superstitibus, " ' ad quartas contrahendas nuptias devenerant,' and " he says that even women are known to marry four " husbands in the same way. He also complains of " obvious collusion, especially in undefended cases, and " proceeds to lay down certain safeguards which prevail " to-day. An official is deputed to defend the marriage " and no doubt many precautions are taken to prevent " collusion. The ecclesiastical cases to-day are heard " in each diocese and the decisions are sent to Rome " for confirmation. It is impossible to obtain infor- " mation as to the number of decrees that are given, " but the poor at any rate have no apparent grievance, " as a specially low rate of fees is allowed for them." I think a witness has already given evidence about it and he may have given some figures.

43,124. Not as to cost. As to the number of cases, they are very low. I do not think he did ?—" It would " not be surprising if the number of Ecclesiastical " cases were few (1) because of the looser ideals of " sexual morality that prevail in Latin countries ; (2) " because civil divorce can always be used by any " Catholic who postpones his religious feelings to " his domestic happiness, or who chooses to leave " the Church altogether. In this connection the " considerable leakage from the Church of Rome " during the last 50 years is well illustrated in " Mr. Joseph McCabe's book on the subject. The " Pauline privilege of dissolving a marriage between " a baptised person and non-baptised person ap- " pears to be confined to heathen lands, though it " appears in the civil law of Austria and Hungary." That is the marriage between Christians and non-Christians which we had before. "The difficulty " of obtaining information is enhanced by the fact " that grave changes appear to be contemplated, such " as diminishing the impediments of consanginity " and affinity, the impediment of spiritual affinity " arising from baptism or confirmation, and of legal " affinity arising from adoption. The Church is, in " fact, rumoured to be clearing up a number of points, " and it would, therefore, perhaps, be unfair to deal " with the present ecclesiastical law as a permanent " state of things. However meagre my information is, " I think it serves to show (1) that countries where " there is no divorce, are not morally superior, but " rather inferior, to countries where there is divorce; " (2) that in most countries where there is no divorce, " the law is evaded by the adoption of foreign nation- " ality or collusive nullity suits; (3) that the absence " of reasonable divorce creates a lax state of public " opinion in regard to adultery and irregular unions."

43,125. You have drawn those conclusions on what you say is legal information?—Necessarily; otherwise one would have to take a tour round the world, and live in each country.

43,126. You think the investigation you have made is sufficient to justify those conclusions in your own mind?—Yes.

43,127. (Mr. Brierley.) You say, with regard to Spain and Brazil, that conviction of adultery is a ground of nullity. What does that mean? Adultery must be committed after marriage?—I think that is separation I was dealing with.

43,128. You have given the grounds of nullity in both Spain and in Brazil; conviction of adultery is one of the grounds?—That must be some mistake.

43,129. I do not see the distinction between nullity and divorce?—I think probably how it crept in is this ——

43,130. I am afraid you have it in the Austrian gentleman's letter also. He gives the grounds on page 9 of your proof upon which marriage can be declared invalid, and amongst various grounds he mentions adultery. "There are other impediments, such as per- " manent impotence at the time of the marriage, or " previous marriage to a third party, Catholic Orders, " difference of religion (Christians cannot marry non- " Christians), relationship, adultery"?—I think it was where the party had been guilty of adultery before the marriage.

43,131. You mean where he had been married before?—Yes.

43,132. Adultery in his previous marriage?—Where adultery is a criminal offence there might have been a criminal conviction, and a person so convicted might have married again.

43,133. That may be the explanation.

43,134. (Chairman.) What do you take these Brazillian, Hungarian, and Spanish laws from?—From the Foreign Office Return of 1894, except where it has been supplemented by letters from foreign lawyers.

43,135. Was there anything you wished to add?—I cannot remember anything more at the moment.

43,136. I can only thank you for paying so much attention to these matters. Will you send a verification of your figures in some form or other? You can either send it, or add it on to your evidence when you receive the printed proof?—Yes, I will do so.

DEAR MR. GORELL BARNES,

I ENCLOSE all the correspondence which has reached me in regard to the figures which I gave at the Commission. I may be able to get some further information, and if so I will send it along. I shall be glad to have the documents back when you have done with them, since, strictly speaking, they belong to the Divorce Law Reform Union. I am writing to the Registrar-General at Dublin.

Yours sincerely,
E. S. P. HAYNES.

The Hon. H. Gorell Barnes,
The Divorce Law Reform Commission,
Winchester House,
21, St. James' Square, S.W.

DEAR SIR, 31st January 1910.

As I am at the present time preparing evidence for the Royal Commission on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, I am desirous in consequence thereof of obtaining certain information in regard to illegitimacy, and I should esteem it a very great favour indeed if you could furnish me with any information to elucidate the following rather remarkable fact.

In England and Wales the illegitimacy birth-rate is approximately 40 per 1,000 total births, whilst in Ireland it is but 2·5 per 1,000 births.

It has been suggested to me that in Ireland the power of the priests, the confessional, and the temperament of the people exercise a salutary effect in this direction, but it seems to me it is hardly possible these factors should account for the wide difference in the figures above mentioned.

It has been further stated to me as an explanation that girls in a state of pregnancy are transported from Ireland to English, Scotch, and Welsh ports, to be there delivered of their illegitimate children.

I have been in communication with the inspector and clerk of Glasgow, who informs me that he knows for a fact from the cases that become chargeable to his parish that women go from Ireland to that city to be confined, and in view of this I shall be greatly obliged if you can give me any information substantiating that the same thing occurs in regard to Liverpool.

Trusting you will excuse my troubling you without other introduction than the subject affords, and thanking you in anticipation,

I am, Sir,
Yours obediently,

Hon. Secretary.

Edmund R. Pickmere, Esq., M.A., J.P.,
Town Clerk, Liverpool.

J. L. Wheatley, Town Clerk, Cardiff.
Edmund J. Taylor, Town Clerk, Bristol.
John Thomas, Town Clerk, Swansea.

St. Peter's Hospital, Bristol,
DEAR SIR, 16th February 1910.

WITH reference to your letter of the 31st ultimo to the town clerk, which he has informed you was sent on to me, I beg to say that we have only known of one case of a girl admitted practically direct from Ireland to the lying-in wards within the last five years, and this would scarcely be a case in point, as she came to us to evade apprehension on another charge, so that our position is not as stated by the inspector of Glasgow to be the case there.

Yours truly,
The Hon. Secretary, J. J. SIMPSON.

The Council House, Bristol,
DEAR SIR, 2nd February 1910.

YOUR letter of the 31st ultimo, with its enclosure, was duly received, but I think you intended to send it to the Clerk to the Guardians, to whom I have forwarded it.

Yours truly,
R. T. Gates, Esq., EDMUND J. TAYLOR,
Hon. Secretary, Town Clerk.
The Divorce Law Reform Union,

Dear Sir, February 8th, 1910.

I am extremely obliged to you for your letter of the 4th instant, and for the information contained therein.

Believe me,
Yours faithfully,

Hon. Secretary.

Dr. E. Walford, M.O.,
Medical Officer of Health,
City Hall, Cardiff,

City Hall, Cardiff,
Dear Sir, 4th February 1910.

The Town Clerk has handed me your letter of the 31st ultimo, asking me to help you in the matter to which you refer. Unfortunately I have not in my possession any definite information as to the number of Irishwomen confined in Cardiff, but I have reason to believe that there is some foundation for the suggestion that they come from Ireland to be confined. I am inclined to think, however, that the question of religion has some connection with the low illegitimate birth-rate in Ireland. I believe that if you were to make application to the Clerk of the Cardiff Union, Mr. A. J. Harris, Queen's Chambers, Cardiff, he would be able to give you the information you require. In the event of his not being able to do so, Mr. Pritchard, Warrant Officer, Cardiff Union Workhouse, would probably be able to give you definite information upon the subject.

I am,
Yours faithfully,
Edward Walford.

Divorce Law Reform.

Dear Sir,

I have seen our Chief Constable respecting your letter of the 31st ultimo, and he informs me that he is unable to give any information substantiating that the same occurs in regard to this borough as what you state prevails at Glasgow.

In fact he says there is no justification for any such a conclusion so far as Swansea is concerned.

Yours faithfully,
Jno. Amery,
Town Clerk.

Illegitimate Births.

Dear Sir,

I am favoured with yours of 5th instant on this matter. The points to which you refer are most important, but I fear I can give you little or no information of a reliable character, which could be founded upon in your inquiry. I know for a fact that women come over here from Ireland to be confined, but beyond the few cases chargeable to this parish I am not aware of any figures relating to Scotland as a whole. I should fancy that Liverpool and other ports will have the same grievance, where the women not only become chargeable to poor law authorities, but are confined in maternity hospitals and other private homes. In my evidence before the Poor Law Commission I mentioned the subject and gave a few figures, but they were not, of course, of sufficient importance in themselves to suggest any remedy. If you think I can assist you further in the inquiry I shall be very pleased.

Yours truly,
Jas. R. Motion,
Inspector and Clerk.

W. Y. Ramsay Fairfax, Esq.,

Dear Mr. Gorell Barnes, 26th January 1911.

Following on my letter, I beg to inform you that Mr. Motion writes to me as follows to-day:—"My evidence on the point is referred to in the Scottish Report of the Poor Law Commission, page 141, first paragraph. My evidence thereon is there quoted as Question 58,087 in the separate volume of evidence for Scotland, to which I presume you will have access." Fifteen applications were made during the year ending 15th May 1906 by women who had "purposely come from Ireland."

Yours sincerely,
E. S. P. Haynes.

29th December 1910.

Dear Mr. Gorell Barnes,

I enclose a letter which I have received from Mr. William Thompson. You will observe that he can give me no figures. I do not suppose that anyone knows the figures, but only of isolated cases. If I had been prepared for the question that was asked I should have replied that I had evidence but no statistics.

Yours sincerely,
E. S. P. Haynes.

The Hon. H. Gorell Barnes,
Winchester House,
21, St. James' Square, S.W.

Dear Mr. Haynes, 28th December 1910.

In reply to your letter of the 24th instant, received here to-day, I regret to say that there is no information in this department as to the number of unmarried women who leave Ireland and go to Glasgow or other places for their confinement.

The only statistics of illegitimacy which are here are those published in my Annual Reports—see page xi. in last year's report—the figures of which, of course, relate exclusively to Ireland.

Yours very truly,
William J. Thompson.

Dear Mr. Gorell Barnes, 3rd January 1911.

I enclose a letter which I have received from my friend, Joseph McCabe, whose honesty is beyond doubt.

You will see how difficult it is to get information of the kind required; yet the facts are probably correct.

Yours sincerely,
E. S. P. Haynes.

Cricklewood, N.W.,
Dear Haynes, 2nd January 1911.

I find it difficult to get precise evidence on the question of Irish girls carrying their tears to Glasgow. The friend, in Glasgow, who told me it was stated in some municipal document could carry me no further; when I pressed him, though, he and others say the fact is well known there. On the other hand, I have since heard that Glasgow is not the only place. An American friend (ex-priest and head of a college) told me that

New York has the same experience. This man is travelling somewhere, and I can do nothing till he turns up again in London. Then one of those anti-papal secretaries (Mr. Le Lievre, Protestant Press Bureau, 132, Wanstead Park Road, Ilford) sent me word that Mgr. Nugent—the idol of the Liverpool Catholics—admitted it for Liverpool. If you could get the exact reference to the latter it would be a strong point, and, I am afraid, all that can be got.

I will try at the Museum some time to see if anything is to be found, but it is hardly likely there. The difficulty is that municipal authorities are not supposed to notice any such point, and the Catholics may make it hot for any man who does. I shall not be in Glasgow again for two months, but will go into it then if any good.

Yours,
J. MCCABE.

Excuse delay. Had heavy work to get off my "Empresses" for end of year.

9, New Square,
Lincoln's Inn, W.C.,
DEAR MR. GORELL BARNES, 30th January 1911.

I ENCLOSE extracts from a book which has just reached me in further confirmation of my evidence.

Yours sincerely,
E. S. P. HAYNES.

The Hon. H. Gorell Barnes,
Winchester House,
St. James' Square, S.W.

Extracts from "The Protestant's Treasury," published by Arthur H. Stockwell (pp. 67–69).

"Are Irish women more virtuous than their sisters in other lands?—No! Monsignor Nugent—'save us from our friends!'—in an appeal headed 'Fallen, Friendless, Homeless,' printed in the 'Catholic Times' of 16th and 23rd July 1897, admitted that 'the strong public opinion in Ireland is constantly driving girls who are on the eve of becoming mothers into Liverpool.'

"The Prosecutor-Fiscal said that within the last year no fewer than a score of women had come from Ireland to Glasgow and given birth to illegitimate children.

"America, too, is the dumping-ground of Hibernian female outcasts.

"According to 'Reynolds's Newspaper' of 22nd June 1902, a New York physician, Dr. W. H. Sanger, published 'The History of Prostitution.' He interrogated 2,000 New York outcast women. Question put: Were your parents Protestants, Catholics, or non-professors? 960 were Protestants, 977 Roman Catholics, and 63 non-professors. To the query: Were you trained in any religion? If so, was it Protestant or Catholic? 972 of the prostitutes said that they were Protestants, 977 Roman Catholics, and 51 were 'godlessly' trained. Of the Catholic outcasts no fewer than 706 were born in Ireland!"

(B) These are the supplemental letters referred to in the footnote to Questions 43,109–11:—

The Divorce Law Reform Union,
20, Copthall Avenue,
London, E.C.,
DEAR HAYNES, 23rd December 1910.

THE particulars, authorities, statistics, &c. which you require relating to Austria, Hungary, &c. are as follows:—

At page lx., 71st Annual Report of the Registrar-General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in England and Wales (1908), pub. 1909, the table of international vital statistics therein set forth shows that in Austria the proportion of illegitimate births per 1,000 unmarried and widowed women, aged 15 to 45 years, was for the approximate periods 1880–82, 43·4 per 1,000; 1890–92, 42·7 per 1,000; and 1900-02, 40·1 per 1,000; or at each period more than 12 per 1,000 higher than any other of the 15 European countries whose illegitimacy statistics are enumerated.

At page 412, Part I., Special Report on Marriage and Divorce, 1867–1906, issued by the U.S.A. Department of Commerce and Labour Bureau, 1909, shows the religious confessions of husbands and wives in the 24,324 divorces, separations, and annulments which took place in Hungary proper from 1898 to 1906 to be as follows:—

	Husbands.	Wives.
Roman Catholics - -	7,470	7,642
Greek Catholics - -	972	909
Oriental Greek - - -	2,755	2,996
Augusburg Protestants -	2,785	2,467
Evangelical Reformed -	7,639	7,595
Unitarian - - - -	415	384
Hebrew - - - -	2,252	2,291
Other confessions - -	3	3
Unknown - - - -	33	37

In considering the foregoing figures it is necessary to bear in mind that only 15 of the cases were separations, although no doubt separation was especially included in the New Hungarian Code to legislate for the Catholics, who would seem to prefer divorces.

The statistics above quoted were obtained by the U.S.A. Census Bureau from statistics compiled and published in the "Annuaire Statistique Hongrois," by the Central Statistical Office of the Kingdom of Hungary.

With regard to illegitimacy in Ireland, I enclose herewith copy of letter I sent to various town clerks of western seaports, with their replies. I received, however, no reply at all from Liverpool. I also send you letter from inspector and clerk of Glasgow.

Kindly return me the correspondence enclosed at your leisure.

My best wishes to you for Xmas and the New Year.

Yours very sincerely,
RICHARD T. GATES.

DEAR MR. GORELL BARNES,

I ENCLOSE a letter from Mr. Gates, which seems to me to cover what I wanted to show in regard to the 50,000 separated Catholics. You will see the references are to a special census in the United States.

Yours sincerely,
E. S. P. HAYNES.

DEAR HAYNES, January 12th, 1910.

I FIND it will be unnecessary for me to write to Austria for the statistics relating to Roman Catholics separated from each other after marriage, as I have the figures here in the office, and they are as follows:

The total number of separations in Austria without mutual consent for the 20 years 1887 to 1906 numbered 6,260.

Of the above number the religious confession was Roman Catholic in 5,826 cases.

Reference for the above, page 399, Part I., Special Report U.S.A. Census Office, Marriage and Divorce in Foreign Countries, published 1909.

The total number of separations in Austria by mutual consent for the 20 years 1887 to 1906 numbered 16,379.

Of the above number the religious confession was Roman Catholic in 14,583 cases.

Reference, page 400 same report as above mentioned.

From the foregoing it therefore appears that the Austrian courts in the 20 years enumerated granted 22,639 separations, the religious confession of the parties in 20,409 cases being Roman Catholic.

I trust this is the information you require.

Yours sincerely,
RICHARD T. GATES.

Dear Mr. Gorell Barnes,

I enclose copy correspondence between the Divorce Law Reform Union and the corresponding society in Vienna, together with two other documents which I think might be appended to my evidence. I only found them last night.

Yours sincerely,
E. S. P. Haynes.

Dear Haynes,

As I happen to be here late to-night, I have received your letter of this afternoon, for which many thanks.

I have already replied to the Austrian Union, and enclose herewith copy of the letter I sent on Saturday, and which may be useful for you to have by you, inasmuch as there are interesting figures contained therein.

The questions I have put to the Austrians I hope cover the ground you desired.

With regard to Old Catholics, in Hungary, the statistics I have do not set them out, the following being the religious confession of husbands and wives in the 24,324 divorces, separations, and annulments which took place from 1898 to 1906:—

	Husbands.	Wives.
Roman Catholics - -	7,470	7,642
Greek Catholic - - -	972	909
Oriental Greek - - -	2,755	2,996
Augsburg Protestant - -	2,785	2,467
Evangelical Reformed -	7,639	7,595
Unitarian - - - -	415	384
Hebrew - - - -	2,252	2,291
Other confession - -	3	3
Unknown - - - -	33	37

Out of the foregoing figures it should be borne in mind there were only 15 separations, although, no doubt, separation was especially included in the new Hungarian code to legislate for the Catholics, who would seem to prefer divorces.

Yours very sincerely,
Richard T. Gates.

Dear Sir,

April 2nd, 1910.

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 20th, together with various pamphlets and literature issued by your Society, for which I am much obliged.

I am forwarding you under separate cover some literature published by my Union, as also a copy of an essay entitled "The Question of English Divorce," and from these publications you will see that the object of my Union has been to press the authorities for the appointment of a Royal Commission to investigate the English law of divorce, with a view to its reform.

As you are doubtless aware such a Commission has been recently appointed by the King, and during the last month or so has heard much evidence on the subject, the net result of which, to date, has been to vindicate in great measure the agitation carried on by my Union. This Commission has adjourned its sittings till the end of May, when it will again hear evidence, after which it will doubtless issue an interim report. In the meantime it is not possible to judge as to what its recommendations will be, although it will doubtless recommend several alterations in the present law, the principal and most urgent of which is to grant facilities to poor persons whereby they may be able to obtain a divorce, this at the present time being denied to them owing to the prohibitive cost of suing, and the fact that all cases are tried in but one court here in London.

My Union has no similar publication to your organ "Die Fessel," our agitation having been carried on by constantly circularising our legislators and other public men, and by the aid of the Press, who have almost universally supported us and granted us facilities for voicing the inequalities and injustice, &c. of our Divorce Law.

I shall be much obliged if you can enlighten in regard to the following points.

I find from statistics which I have available that in Hungary proper from 1898 to 1906 there were granted 24,324 divorces, separations, and annulments, of which 24,072 were absolute divorces, only 15 separations, and the rest annulments, and this in face of the fact that three-fifths of the population of Hungary proper are Roman Catholics, and that out of the 24,072 absolute divorces granted the religious confession was Roman Catholic in the case of 7,470 husbands and 7,642 wives. Does this mean that these Roman Catholics absolutely ignore the priests and the doctrine of the Roman Catholic religion that marriage is indissoluble, or are the priests parties to these divorces? Further, can you inform me whether nullity suits are obtained by agreement, without good reason being shown.

In Croatia and Slavonia I understand marriage and divorce are still upon a confessional basis, and that the Roman Catholics, who constitute 71·2 per cent. of the population, are by the law of their Church excluded from divorce. From statistics which I have, however, I see that 389 divorces and annulments were granted in the nine years 1897 to 1905, and I should be much obliged if you could inform me how many of those divorces and annulments were obtained by Papal dispensation, and the grounds upon which these dispensations are or were granted.

As Roman Catholics are prohibited from obtaining divorce in Austria I should also be obliged if you could give me any information as to whether persons of that religion obtain nullity suits by agreement without good cause, or by Papal dispensation, or whether you have occasion to believe that Roman Catholics proceed to Hungary and there obtain divorces. From statistics I see that the population of Austria in 1900 was 26,150,708, of which number 23,796,814 were of the Roman Catholic faith, while during the nine years 1897 to 1906 there were granted in Austria only 316 annulments. Does this mean that the Roman Catholics invariably make happy marriages, and that there is no desire among them to sever the matrimonial bond, or is it that to obtain a Papal dispensation of a decree of nullity is a cumbrous and costly procedure, in consequence of which those who would obtain relief are thereby debarred from so doing. Further, if you are sufficiently wealthy, is it fairly easy to obtain a Papal dispensation, and can you cite me any case or cases of which you have knowledge where but recently such Papal dispensation has been obtained, and the grounds therefor.

With many apologies for asking you so many questions, and assuring you that if there is any information in regard to divorce law in England which I can supply you with, I shall be very happy to do so.

Yours, &c.
(Signed) Richard T. Gates.

Letter from Austrian Society to Divorce Law Reform Union.

(Translation of Letter, dated the 18th April 1910.)

We have your letter and your pamphlets and have read the account of your exertions with much interest. The chief difference lies in the enemy. While you fight the opposition of insular conservatism, our enemy is the Catholic Church and the clerical party, which is predominant at present in Austria.

Our agitation takes quite a different form to yours, and that is a political form.

In answer to your questions:

The reason that so many marriages are dissolved in Hungary is that civil marriages are obligatory according to Hungarian law, and those Catholics who suffer shipwreck in their marriage simply do not trouble about Catholic dogmas. There can be no question of indulgence from the priests. On the contrary, the clergy are agitating for the abolition of compulsory civil marriage and the restoration of religious marriage. Nullity decrees in Hungary, as well as in Austria, should only be obtained under very strict conditions. In Croatia, which belongs to Hungary, the Hungarian marriage law does not apply, since in this country, since the Concordat of 1855, the same law applies to Austria as to Croatia. Hence the small number of divorces.

There are very few nullity suits in Austria, because they are of enormous expense for ordinary men. Persons of some means who adopt Hungarian nationality and contract a new marriage can be prosecuted while in Austria. As to the great majority we have half a million human beings condemned to live either in concubinage or celibacy.

We send by this post a specimen of our newspapers, which will show the character of our judicature, and the unhappiness caused by our marriage laws.

We shall always be glad to keep up an exchange of views.

The Right Hon. Sir DAVID BRYNMOR JONES, K.C., M.P., called and examined.

43,137. (Chairman.) You are one of His Majesty's counsel; you have also been an M.P. since 1892, and Recorder of Merthyr Tydfil?—Yes.

43,138. You were at one time a county court judge, from 1885 to 1892, and have been for several sessions a member of the Select Committee on Divorce Bills?—Yes.

43,139. You were the chairman of the Metropolitan Police Commission, and are joint secretary with Sir J. Herbert Roberts, M.P., of a group of members who usually act together in regard to matters affecting Wales and Monmouthshire, and who are commonly referred to as the Welsh Liberal Parliamentary Party?—Yes.

43,140. Did that group comprise in the last Parliament 32 out of the 34 members for the constituencies of Wales and Monmouthshire?—Yes.

43,141. You do not appear here in an individual capacity?—Not as to the first part of my evidence.

43,142. Do you represent the group of members I have referred to?—I represent the group in the sense that appears in what I have sent in. I am the secretary of the group, and the meeting which is referred to was duly convened; notice had been duly given that this question of divorce, or rather of extending the facilities for obtaining divorce, would be raised at the meeting.

43,143. That meeting was held on the 26th July last?—Yes.

43,144. The question of the administration of the jurisdiction in divorce and matrimonial causes under the Act of 1857 as affecting Wales was considered, and it was also considered whether there should be a tendering of evidence before this Commission?—Yes.

43,145. There were present:—"Sir Alfred Thomas (in the chair), Mr. Herbert Lewis, Mr. Lloyd Morgan K.C. (now Judge Lloyd Morgan), Mr. Ellis Griffiths K.C., Mr. Walter Roch, Mr. J. W. Summers, Sir J. Herbert Roberts, and yourself"?—Yes.

43,146. Notification of the meeting had been sent to the rest of the members of the group, and those who are mentioned attended. Is that right?—That is so. I ought to say that we do not regard any individual member as bound in regard to his parliamentary action by any resolution that may be passed. They are purely friendly discussions between men who usually act together in the House of Commons. When notice has been given and a discussion has taken place, the result fairly represents what is the general opinion of the members for that part of the country.

43,147. Then a discussion took place, and as a result a resolution was passed. Will you kindly read the terms of it?—Resolved—"That it is expedient to amend "the law in regard to the administration of divorce "and matrimonial cases by giving jurisdiction to "county courts to deal with such causes or making "other suitable provision for the bringing and trial of "such causes at convenient places in Wales and "Monmouthshire, and thereby diminishing the costs "and expenses incidental to such causes and removing "the hardship inflicted on the poorer classes of person "in that part of the country under the existing "centralised system of administering the law in regard "to such causes."

43,148. There is an alternative to the county courts, namely, "other suitable provisions." I daresay you would agree that if the High Court could deal with the cases, you would welcome that as well as the county courts dealing with them?—That matter was discussed at this meeting, and I am not authorised to say what the individual opinion of any member of Parliament on that question was, but if your Lordship asks me what I think ——

43,149. Yes?—I confess that I do not think that any amendment of the existing practice of the High Court would so well meet the case as the extension of the county court jurisdiction under proper safeguards. I refer to that a little later on. "I was requested and authorised to attend before this Commission to lay before you the resolution, and to state briefly the grounds on which these members recommend this practical reform." The other suitable provision thought of was some amendment of the law and practice relating to the High Court which might enable petitioners to issue their process in the district registries of the High Court, and to have the causes, whether defended or undefended, tried at the assize towns. That was the other practical provision suggested.

43,150. Would you mind just reading the next few sentences in your paper?—"I therefore desire to say that we look upon this question of the localisation of the administration of the law in divorce and matri-causes in the Principality as one urgently needing the attention of Government. Under the present centralised system the people do not, in our opinion, possess reasonable facilities for obtaining the relief to which they are entitled under the Act of 1857. We have no reason to believe that the percentage of persons living in Wales who desire to obtain relief under that Act is larger than that of persons similarly desirous of relief living in other areas of the United Kingdom of equal population, but the mere number of possible petitioners is, we submit, immaterial. We urge that so far as is practicable persons residing in all parts of the Kingdom shall have equal facilities for judicial redress of grievances and enforcement of rights. Further, we are of opinion that for judicial purposes Wales should be regarded as a self-contained area on racial, linguistic and historical grounds, though in the practical application of this principle we do not desire to advance proposals of an extravagant character involving any undue financial burden on the Treasury. I may mention here that the history of the Principality as to the administration of justice is special. I will not advert to the very early arrangements, as you would probably think them quite irrelevant. The existing arrangements only date from the last century. Before the 27th Henry VIII., c. 26, the shire system had been only partially applied in the Dominion or Principality of Wales. By that Act the present twelve counties and Monmouthshire were constituted or reconstituted—there had been some old counties before that—and by the 34th and 35th Henry VIII., cap. 26—commonly called The Act of Union—the county of Monmouth was added to England for judicial purposes and new courts of unlimited jurisdiction called 'The King's Great Sessions in Wales' were created and Chanceries established at Chester (for Flintshire), Carnarvon, Denbigh, Brecon, and Carmarthen. These courts continued to exist until 1830, when they were abolished and the jurisdiction of the English Superior Courts extended to Wales by the II. Geo. IV. & I Will. IV. c. 70. The immediate result was to inflict great hardships on Welsh suitors. To recover a debt of 5*l.* a man living, e.g., at Aberystwyth had to get process issued in London about 240 miles away, and might have to wait five or six months before the suit if contested could be tried, and the estate of an Anglesey farmer no more than 200*l.* or 300*l.* in gross value might have to be administered at Lincolns Inn. This state of things was partially remedied by the County Courts Act, 1846; and by the gradual extension of county court jurisdiction (especially the conferring of equitable jurisdiction on all county courts in regard to estates not exceeding 500*l.* in value, and of Admiralty jurisdiction up to 300*l.* on some of those courts), grievances special to Wales in regard to all ordinary actions have been removed. We are (broadly speaking) satisfied with the administration of justice in the Welsh County Courts, especially since it has become the rule only to appoint judges with an adequate knowledge of the Welsh language for the courts in districts where the population is largely Welsh-speaking. We believe that no good reason exists for not extending divorce and matrimonial jurisdiction to these courts, or for putting Welsh petitioners to the inconvenience and added expense involved in having to bring and to try their actions in London. The expense even of divorce proceedings which are undefended prevents persons residing in these distant counties from obtaining relief to which they are by law entitled. In making these observations I have been thinking rather of persons of the middle class (such as tradesmen, commercial travellers, clerks, shops assistants and the like), than of those who are usually referred to as the 'working classes,' under which are included those who are paid for manual labour by weekly or fortnightly wages (such as artisans in various trades, mines, and agricultural labourers). But experience of the working of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women's) Act, 1895, in Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire, which are large and important industrial area and comprise probably more than half of the population of Wales and Monmouthshire, makes one raise the question whether greater facility for obtaining divorce is not desirable in the interests of persons belonging to these classes. There can, in my opinion, be no doubt that the powers of this Act are necessary for the protection of the married women to whom it is intended to apply. I have no reason to think that the petty sessional courts in Wales exercise their powers either indiscreetly or inefficiently, and in nearly all cases the operation of the Act is of some material benefit to the applicant. But experience shows that in a good many cases ill effects (such as concubinage, prostitution, birth of illegitimate children) follow, and this raises the question whether in some of the cases dealt with (necessarily from the poverty of the applicant) under this Act the true remedy ought not to be divorce instead of a separation order. It is not suggested that the petty sessions should have divorce jurisdiction, but I suggest that it is worthy of consideration, whether in cases in which the justices think there is ground for divorce they might not have the power to remit the case to a court having full divorce and matrimonial jurisdiction. I desire to say that in making that suggestion I am doing so on my own responsibility. Except in regard to that, I believe that all my foregoing observations would be concurred in by my colleagues who joined in the resolution on July 26th. It will be noticed that the resolution contains the words 'or other suitable provision, &c.' They were inserted to indicate that if the proposed extension of divorce jurisdiction to county courts should be deemed undesirable or difficult for any reason, we think some other way of meeting Welsh requirements in the matter ought to be adopted—e.g., the conferring on the judges of assize of jurisdiction to deal with divorce and matrimonial cases at the assizes."

43,151. That ends practically what you put before us as the result of the meeting?—Yes.

43,152. Is there anything you individually wish to add?—I am very much in the hands of the Commission about that. I understand that the Commission has received some historical evidence from Sir Frederick Pollock, amongst others.

43,153. If there is any point you think worthy of attention I should like to have it, and I am sure the Commission would?—Following on Sir Frederick Pollock's contributions to the history of the institution of marriage, I should like to say that in the western part of the country there is a special kind of history, if you think it sufficiently material.

43,154. I think probably it would be very interesting?—I have made some notes on the point. In dealing with suggestions for legislation about an institution like marriage, it seems to me that the history of the legal rules and customs affecting it should be taken into consideration, and I understand the Commission has taken some historical evidence. This is very necessary as to marriage, because I notice that the exponents of the views of some religious organisations use language which seems to imply that the opinions which they urge as authoritative as to the indissolubility of marriage have been entertained and realised in practice in Christian States for a very much longer time than is in fact the case. I do not claim to be an expert in regard to the laws and usages of the Teutonic races, but I made some years ago a study of the ancient laws and customs in use in Wales, or a large part of it, down to the time of the Edwardian Conquest of North Wales. It should be observed that Christianity had a footing in that part of the country before the island ceased to be administered as a Roman province, and in regard to the 5th and 6th centuries there is ample evidence that a Christian Church, sometimes called the Celtic Church or the British Church, flourished. This Church, after a long struggle, became merged in or indistinguishable from the Latin Church, or the English branch of the Roman Church. The laws to which I wish to call your attention were in operation for a very long time side by side with a very complete church organisation. The Welsh laws were collected first by Howel Dda in the 10th century, and are known as the "Cyfreithiau Howel Dda," but the manuscripts handed down to us are later than his time and contain emendations and additions, but in regard to the marriage law there seems to have been little change. Looking at these laws, it is noticeable that no religious ceremony is prescribed as essential to the validity of marriage; there is nothing about the sanction of the church or requiring the presence of the priest at any ceremony. Marriage under this law was a verbal contract between the kindred or father of the bride and the bride herself of the one part and the bridegroom of the other part, entered into in the presence of witnesses. In general when the bride was young and in tutelage of her kin it was a formal delivery of the woman by her kindred, together with her gwaddol and agweddi.

43,155. What are those?—Those are technical terms. The gwaddol appears to have been equivalent to the dowry used in the sense of the French dot, that is to say, it was the wife's or the wife's people's share of the goods and chattels with which the new family started.

43,156. What was the "agweddi"?—The agweddi appears to have been the pecuniary gift or present from the kindred or father of the bride to the bridegroom. The present from the bridegroom to the bride was called a cowyll, and that was equivalent to the "morgengabe" of the German or Teutonic law, and regularly mutual suretyships or warranties were exchanged between the parties. As to divorce, I will just read a passage in a work in which I embody the result of my studies, and which is more important than anything I might say, because it received the endorsement of of Sir John Rhys, the Principal of Jesus College, who is a great authority.

43,157. What is the name of the book?—"The Welsh People," published in 1900. I am reading the passage about divorce at page 212. "Practically either "husband or wife might separate whenever one or "both chose. There seems to have been no legal "method of bringing the parties again together; but "the time and circumstances of the separation entailed "different consequences in regard to the division of "the household goods. Separation of husband and "wife might take place by agreement or by the act of "one party without lawful cause." That is a statement of fact, of course. "In regard to separation by agree-"ment, the period of seven years less three days was "crucial. If the separation was voluntary on both sides "and took place before the wife had attained 'three "'nights of the seventh year,' the wife was only "entitled to take away from the house her agweddi "(seemingly including her gwaddol, her argyvreu "(paraphernalia), and her cowyll). If they cohabited "till after there were three nights wanting of the "seventh current year, and afterwards separated by "agreement, everything belonging to them was divided "into two portions. The laws set out minutely the "things that were to go to the wife and to the husband "respectively, and as to the things which the law did "not specifically allot, the wife had the right to divide "them, and the husband chose which portion he would "take. Of the children two shares went to the father "and one to the mother—the eldest and the youngest "to the former and the middlemost to the mother. "The debts were payable in equal shares, and the "household goods that were to go to the wife and "husband respectively are enumerated with particu-"larity. If a wife left her husband before the seventh "year without good cause, she lost all her property "except her cowyll"—that was the gift of her husband —"and her right to any fine due from the husband for "having committed adultery. The good causes for "which she might repudiate her husband without any "loss of property were, his being affected with leprosy, "his having fetid breath, or his impotence. On the "other hand, if a wife were 'guilty of an odious deed "along with another man, whether by kiss, aut coitu "aut palpando,' the husband could repudiate her, and "she forfeited all her property rights. Many other "rules as to the relations of the sexes are given which "we cannot stop to explain. The separation of husband "and wife under these rules does not seem at once to "have operated as a complete divorce, and it seems "that it was only on the subsequent marriage to "another person of one of the parties that the "relationship was finally determined."

43,158. At any rate that recognised in some form or another, no matter how worked out, that there was a divorce between them?—Certainly, and that side by side with a system under which the Church rites are fully recognised. The laws draw a distinction between the clergy and the laity, according great privileges and immunity to the clergy. It draws a distinction between Church land and other land, and in regard to Church land it gives the usual immunities which are commonly found in codes applying to other parts.

43,159. At what date do you make out that Common Law, if I may call it such, existed?—I should say it existed in North Wales in fairly full operation in regard to all private law up to 1282, when Edward I. conquered North Wales. At that time the rest of Wales, apart from what was called Gwynedd or North Wales, had passed into the hands of the Normans or English Barons. The name that is commonly given to the Lordships existing in the western part of the Island is the name of Lordship Marcher. Those lords marchers had much larger rights than the lords of an ordinary English manor or honour. They had complete jurisdiction as to life and limb in regard to criminal matters, and such civil jurisdiction as existed. In practice, as far as I can gather the condition of things in these Norman marcher lordships, the old Common Law was allowed to apply as between the humbler tenants. No process was issued in those days from the King's Courts at Westminster or elsewhere in Wales except where the Church was concerned, and where there were disputes between the lords marchers themselves. In regard to North Wales, the independence of the Welsh princes remained a much longer time than in other parts, and there I fancy—that is our inference from the documents we can come across—that the Common Law applied till the time of Edward. Then by the Statute of Rhuddlan the English law applied, except so far as the old law was allowed to continue by the terms of the Statute.

43,160. At any rate, in North Wales this law of divorce prevailed till the time of Edward I.?—I think so, but it is a matter of historical inference.

43,161. It did not continue for so long a period in other parts of Wales?—No. I think the Church was more powerful where the Norman rule had become fixed and was carried out effectively. There is not the least doubt that the clergy and the Welsh princes were often in conflict about these things. Our last prince, Prince Llewelyn, when he married Eleanor of Montfort, was married in the Cathedral Church at Worcester, and not according to the Welsh custom, but probably he had to submit to that. I need hardly point out, in a state of society in which the different classes were very marked, that the existence of such a Common Law as I have been describing is quite likely among the tenants themselves.

43,162. Will you please continue with your paper?—I do not propose to give evidence at any great length, but if the Commission would like me to do so, I will express my opinion upon one or two of the points to which you have been giving attention. I should like to add some remarks in reference to some suggested amendments of the law of a practical character.

Marriage is an institution so fundamental in the structure of civil society and touches the life of the individual at so many points, that when questions are raised as to any alterations of the positive laws of the State on which it depends, one is soon led into a very wide field of controversy. Since people approach the solution of the problems which may be raised with very different presuppositions, or postulates, discussion often becomes impossible or fruitless, and one is soon forced to say, contra negantem principia non est disputandum. It is necessary, therefore, to say that I make my remarks from the standpoint of the practical legislator, and ask myself the question whether any particular amendment of the law is at this time, having regard to the condition of the people, just and expedient in the interests of the community, or whether it is likely or not likely to increase the prosperity and happiness of the people of England and Wales as a whole. I postulate more particularly two things: (1) that it is desirable that any amendments of the law should be applicable to all persons without distinction of class or financial position: (2) that the dogmas or ethical rules of any particular religious body ought not to have any over-ruling or conclusive authority. There is another set of considerations which, when I approach the matter from this standpoint, ought, in my judgment, to be taken into account in deciding what, if any, amendments should be made in the law of divorce. I refer to the changes made by Statutes and the course of judicial decisions in the legal relationship of husband and wife. The doctrine of the merger of the wife's personality in that of the husband has in practice disappeared. The Married Woman's Property Acts of 1870, 1874 and 1882 have profoundly altered the status of the married woman. Since the Clitheroe case was decided it may be taken as settled law that a husband has no right to chastise his wife, and that he has no such dominion over her as to entitle him to imprison her in his house or force her to remain with him.

43,163. That is the case commonly referred to as Jacksons?—Yes. In fact, in Mr. Justice Montague Lush's words, I may say that married women have been emancipated and set free from the restraints imposed upon them by the Common Law and placed in a position which they were long ago entitled to occupy—a position of independence and equality with their husbands. I ought to say, as county court judge, especially in view of the Welsh laws, I was interested on one occasion in having to take quite a long time in settling a dispute between a husband and wife who had voluntarily agreed to separate, and the question was to whom different articles of furniture and so on in the house belonged. Jurisdiction is given to the county court under recent Acts to settle that kind of question, so that quite apart from the special jurisdiction of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, county courts may at any moment be deciding very difficult and delicate questions in the case of a voluntary separation between husband and wife which will have the practical effect of divorce, except that the parties are not free to marry again. I think that the law ought to be so amended as to place the sexes upon an equality as regards the grounds upon which divorce may be decreed. This opinion is not advanced by me as a deduction from any abstract theory of the legal equality of the sexes. My view is that having regard to the accentuation of the contractual aspect of marriage by recent legislation to which I have referred, there is no valid reason why the ordinary principles of the law of contract should not be applied equally as between man and wife. No one can deny that the conjugal fidelity of both parties is of the essence of the contract. It is a principle of law that if one party to an executory contract commits a breach of the contract or fails to fulfil his side of the agreement in some particular that is essential, the other party may rescind it. That principle is applied in the husband's favour in the case of the wife's adultery, and I see no justification for not applying it to the case of the husband. It is not, be it observed, the question whether the marriage is to be made void ipso facto if the husband is guilty of adultery; the question is, shall the wife have the right to a divorce on proof of her husband's adultery; whether she ought or ought not to exercise the right is a matter for her discretion, and the propriety or wisdom of her exercise of the right must depend on the particular circumstances of the case. Arguments tending to show that adultery is less blameworthy in the case of a husband than a wife seem to me irrelevant. The argument from biological evidence is also beside the mark. Sir James Crichton-Browne said, "Not only were the consequences of "conjugal infidelity different in the two sexes, but "the two sexes were not and could not be on an "equality in their sexual relations," and quoted Professor Geddes as having said, What was decided among the prehistoric protozoa cannot be annulled by Act of Parliament. I do not admit that vertebrate mammals are bound by the decision of any assembly of prehistoric protozoa. He is also quoted as having said, "The male animal is subjected to the stronger temptation." This distinction does not seem to be sufficient ground for creating an inequality of rights as between two freely contracting persons. If adultery were a criminal offence and the question were one of punishment, this distinction, if well-founded, might have to be taken into account in considering the sentence in any particular case. With regard to suggestions for extending the grounds or causes for which a decree for divorce may be granted, I think legislation should proceed with caution. While I recognise that the laws relating to marriage, like those relating to all the other institutions which go to form a civil society, ought to be modified from time to time in order to attain the ends for which the State exists and is maintained, great care should be taken in regard to serious alterations of the laws affecting the family relationships and its incidents. I regard changes in what I may call private law as more important in their effect on the happiness of the lives of individual citizens than changes in constitutional or public law. Approaching the matter from this standpoint, I am of opinion that it would be well to extend the grounds of divorce to cases in which one of the parties has been found or certified to be of unsound mind, and in which the insanity appears to be incurable or permanent, and cases in which one of the parties has been sentenced to penal servitude for life or a long period of years. As to the ground of insanity, it should be noted that a person of unsound mind loses his legal status and is placed in a special judicial category. This distinguishes his case from that of a person afflicted with bodily ailments. As to conviction and long sentence cases, it should be borne in mind that at Common Law a woman whose husband was convicted of felony recovered her freedom or personality, for the felon became civiliter mortuus. In both these cases it is not a question of the marriage being ipso facto void. It is purely a question of the right of the innocent suffering party, and in regard to them I should give a right to petition for divorce, but should vest in the court a judicial discretion as to the granting of the relief asked for. I have no other practical amendments.

43,164. I do not know whether you have thought about it, but you have not dealt with two points as regards grounds for divorce which have been very much put before us: at least one has been put before us very largely, the one adopted in Scotland of malicious desertion lasting for four years. Have you considered that at all?—I did consider it, but I am rather affected in expressing this opinion by my own experience, that is to say, by cases that have come under my own notice, both in regard to incurable insanity and in regard to conviction followed by a long sentence. Cases have come under my notice in which I think it would be of immense benefit if the innocent party could have obtained a divorce. I do not know, either in my professional capacity or in my private observation, of any case in which desertion alone ought to form a ground for petitioning for divorce, but I do know this, that many of those who are interested in government,—I refer more particularly to the part of the country I am acquainted with, Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire—do think that the operation of the Act of 1895 is giving rise to the question whether, when the separation order has been in force, say, three or four years, the wife might not have the right to come and ask for a divorce. While I am not prepared to say that simple desertion without more on the part of either party ought to be a ground for divorce, I think if a wife has obtained a separation order under the Act of 1895 and the matter is not arranged with her husband, that after three or four years she might well have the right to ask the tribunal to relieve her from the marriage relationship.

43,165. The other subject which has been put before us is cases of great brutality where it is no longer safe for a woman to live with her husband?—For myself, I should hesitate to give the right to petition for a divorce simply on the ground of one crime of brutal assault, or anything of that kind. In some cases the parties come together afterwards.

43,166. I was not thinking so much of one brutal assault, but where the tribunal, if the case arose, was satisfied that the treatment had been such and lasting for so long that there was no reasonable probability of safe living?—I do not think in that case I should give an absolute right to the wife to ask for a divorce, but I should certainly vote for amendment of the law which would give her the right to ask for it, provided the court should have a discretion whether it is wise to exercise it in the particular case.

43,167. Does that finish the suggestions you have to offer?—That is all I think it is material to say. I am carefully guarding myself from simply airing speculative opinions. I have endeavoured to give opinions founded on my own experience in reference to the qualifications I have the honour to lay before you.

43,168. You speak from personal experience with regard to the lunacy and criminal cases?—Yes, one or two: I should not like to mention names.

43,169. Upon the others you speak rather more theoretically?—With regard to long sentences.

43,170. No, I include that?—Yes, I think I have cases here I could point to.

43,171. The other cases have not come so much before you?—No. I practised at Quarter Sessions for nearly 10 years as a junior barrister, and I have been occasionally in the criminal courts since on the part of the Crown, and I am a recorder. In fact, only at my last sessions there was a case, or rather two cases, that came before me in which I felt that my colleague, the stipendiary magistrate for Merthyr Tydfil, ought to have the right of giving a divorce.

43,172. What class of case was that?—It was the class of case in which a mother and her daughter were brought up before me as a recorder as incorrigible rogues. In that class of case Quarter Sessions only have the power to sentence. The justices of petty sessions, after a large number of convictions for small police offences chiefly, when people have come under statute first into the class of rogue and vagabond, and after that into the class of incorrigible rogue, have the power to send the case to Quarter Sessions to be dealt with, so that a more exemplary sentence may be given and more emphasis given to the conduct of the defendant. I was very much struck with a case that came before me under those sections for sentences as incorrigible rogues of a mother and a daughter. The mother was about 42, I think, and the daughter was a comparatively young girl just about 21. Three or four years ago, I cannot recollect the exact date of the separation order, a separation order had been made by justices, and the mother had taken to evil courses, and there was a tremendously long list of convictions against the mother and against the daughter, convictions for drunkenness, improper solicitation under the prostitute byelaws, conviction for general disorderly conduct—quite a long string: and then followed the more serious cases under the rogue and vagabond clauses, and finally under the incurable rogue clause. I examined both prisoners most carefully, and I really could not help feeling very considerable sympathy for the woman, but still more sympathy for the daughter, because she had been dragged into these evil ways simply and solely because of the surroundings of her life. The mother was the wife of a working man, I believe he was working 20 or 30 miles away. He appears not to have kept up any payments, and it is difficult to say what a woman of her age was to do.

43,173. On what ground had she got the separation at the beginning?—Without refreshing my memory I could not give you the exact details, but it was one of that class of cases in which the husband was drunken and violent.

43,174. Do you mean you are led to the view, in a case like that, that all this happens because a woman does not get a divorce?—No, but when the separation order was made, this man, who is a collier, went away to some other part, probably there was desertion as well, and he was away working in some distant pit. But when that took place, the woman, who was 38, had to ask herself: "What could I do"? In a place like Merthyr Tydfil it is not easy for a woman to get work. If the woman could have obtained a divorce, and she had met some other man in some respectable work, who was willing to marry her, she might have married. As it is, there she was about Merthyr practically from the time the order was made, as far as I could make out from what the police told me, one of a considerable number of women who live about the streets. They may get a week's work every now and then.

43,175. (Sir George White.) Does that not rather lead you to the idea that cases of wilful desertion of that kind should also be included in causes for divorce? According to the evidence you give us, this woman was driven into immoral and other bad courses because her husband was separated from her and paid nothing for her maintenance and so on?—Yes.

43,176. You feel that had she been able to form a fresh marriage she might have been saved?—I think it is quite possible that in that case she might have been able to marry again. I should like, in answer to your question, to say that I am endeavouring to frame a rule for all classes of persons. The number of the working classes who are in such circumstances as were disclosed in the case to which I have referred is comparatively small, I am thankful to say. If you were to say that the wife of a working man should obtain a divorce simply because of desertion, say for three, four or five years, simply on that ground, you are getting very near to dissolution of marriage by consent, because as a matter of fact the better class of workmen in Glamorganshire often have to go abroad and leave the wife and young children. We have known of cases of going to Russia, where some new industry is developing, and they may be away three or four years.

43,177. (Chairman.) That would not be malicious desertion?—No. It is always open to the wife to write and say, "Come back," and the husband writes and says: "I cannot; I am getting 4*l.* a week, and I "will send you half my wages."

43,178. (Sir George White.) Would you not give a discretionary power to the judge to determine what is malicious desertion where there is no possible likelihood of the parties coming together again?—I rather think, in answer to my Lord, I said in cases to which the Married Women's Act of 1895, the Separation Order Act, applied, after a time if the parties had not come together, I think divorce might be given. In the case you are putting I should say if the wife obtained from the justices a separation order and the parties never came together for some years, I should not be disinclined to allow a discretionary power to the tribunal to give a divorce. I rather meant to cover that by what I said to the Chairman.

(Chairman.) I think you did.

43,179. (Sir George White.) Do Welshmen have to come now to the London High Court for divorce?—Certainly. I asked the district registrar at Swansea, where there is a district registry of the High Court, as it is called, if he had been asked to seal a writ for divorce. He said: "No such application has been "made, but though I should probably seal the writ, "as a matter of fact, the interlocutory proceedings "would, according to my view of the rules, have to "take place in London."

43,180. (Chairman.) It could not be commenced by sealing a writ?—I am not an expert in the matter, and

I must not do an injustice to him. He did not say such a writ could be issued. His evidence was negative; he said nobody had brought a writ.

43,181. (Sir George White.) On those grounds the party you represent conclude that there are no reasonable facilities for the poorer classes obtaining relief under our Act?—Yes. I have been told that it costs something like 50*l.* or 60*l.* in an undefended case for a person in Cardiff or Swansea to obtain a divorce. I have never verified that, but I could if the Commission would like it.

43,182. I think we may judge, from the distance of Wales from London, that that would be so. Would you have any check whatever in regard to giving county courts jurisdiction in these cases? Would you give every county court in Wales jurisdiction?—No, that would not be convenient for the working of the Courts. The limitation does not mean any reflection on the county court judges. I think from a practical point of view I would suggest that wherever there is a district registry, there should be also a county court jurisdiction in divorce, if that should be the method adopted. They are the large courts like Swansea, Cardiff and Camarthen. In taking the principal South Wales Courts, there they have what is called full county court jurisdiction; each of those has Admiralty, Bankruptcy, Liquidation of Companies, and so on.

43,183. Do you know how many there would be of those courts in Wales?—There is, I think, at least one in every county, except that the Admiralty jurisdiction exists only in maritime counties.

43,184. Are they geographically well distributed for the people to get to them?—Yes. That would be as to trial. The question of the concentration of county court business to one court has been raised a good many times. When I was a county court judge I remember in one case the jurisdiction under the Agricultural Holdings Act arose technically in quite a small country court, and the parties had valuers and solicitors from a distance, and everybody asked me to try it at Cheltenham. That kind of thing is continually taking place, I believe, but Judge Tindal Atkinson will know all that.

43,185. I was not quite clear whether you condemned or approved the present powers of summary jurisdiction for separation. You suggested it produced immorality. Are you for the continuance of that power?—Most assuredly. It is necessary for the protection of the women to whom the Act was intended to apply.

43,186. You suggest in certain cases the justices should have power to remit these cases to the Divorce Court which might be established in the district?—Quite.

43,187. (Sir William Anson.) Is your view that long imprisonment should be a ground of divorce based on the observation of individual cases?—Yes.

48,188. Have you known cases of long imprisonment?—Yes. I am not prepared to give the exact wording of a proposed amendment of the Statute, but I can tell you the case I have in mind. Where a man is sentenced to seven years' penal servitude he is generally a thoroughly bad fellow, and when you sit as judge, you know as well as I do, and look over the record of his convictions, you find a man who gets that sentence is a pretty bad fellow. If his wife wants—I daresay some would be misguided enough not to want it—but if a woman says, "I want a divorce," I think she should get it. I do not limit myself to seven years.

43,189. We have had evidence to the effect that the prospect of a home to return to has a useful effect on his character and gives him a better chance when he comes out?—I think that would be so in the case of some men, like a clerk who on one occasion has been guilty of the crime of embezzlement yielding to temptation and gets a long sentence. Five years is a very common sentence in that class of case. I think in his case the prospect of getting back to his home might tend towards the reforming of his character, but that is quite an exceptional case. One does one's best to talk to other recorders and to judges when one gets the opportunity, about the principle on which they give sentences, and there has been a general tendency lately not to give these very severe sentences except in cases where the man is practically an habitual criminal.

43,190. Might it not be an embarrassment to the judge in pronouncing sentence to feel if it was of a certain duration that it carried the liability to divorce with it, that he was doing two things and not one?—I do not think that it would be an embarrassment. I think that is too strong a term. I think it is something which the judge would take into account in apportioning his sentence. In regard to young people now, one thinks in sentencing them how best to reform their lives a great deal, and even in some cases it is expedient to give, strange as it may appear, a rather long sentence because it gives a greater chance for the good influences that are brought to bear upon prisoners by modern discipline. Supposing I say yes in answer to your question, it is an additional embarrassment to a judge in sentencing, still I do not think it is a consideration which ought to weigh as against the question of the wife who is bitterly wronged under the circumstances.

43,191. Have you come across cases of women who desire a divorce from their husbands? We have had evidence of another sort, that they do not?—I appeared for the petitioner in two or three cases long ago, and in those cases the wives certainly desired a divorce. If you ask me my experience in Society——

43,192. No, I was asking whether you had heard of cases of women who were subject to that hardship who did not desire it?—I do not think so. The woman is never heard by the court, or practically never heard.

43,193. (Mr. Burt.) You would give jurisdiction to the county courts in divorce cases?—Yes.

43,194. Mainly, I understand, on the ground of making the court easier of access and cheaper to the poor?—Yes.

43,195. I think you said, in answer to Sir George White, that you would not give power to all the county courts in Wales. You would be in favour of making a selection?—Yes. There is ambiguity there, if I may point it out. Each county court is a distinct court which has jurisdiction over a definite area called a district. These county courts are grouped together and placed under one judge. In my suggestion that only some of the courts should have jurisdiction there is no kind of reflection on the judge of the court, because it is the same judge who will be trying the case at the court which has county court jurisdiction, and who goes to the other courts on his circuit. The point is simply one of convenience. Nor is it simply a question of trial. You have to consider the issue of the process and the interlocutory proceedings incident to the exercise of the jurisdiction. In my view this is a matter of machinery pure and simple, I may observe. It is more convenient that these less ordinary cases should be dealt with in one place in each county, or in two counties, than at the small courts to which a judge goes once only in two months and has only a limited number of hours at his disposal, and may have a number of small cases to deal with. Then, again, you have the question of the Bar and solicitors, which is not an unimportant matter. In order to get a barrister to go to a remote county court naturally you have to pay a higher honorarium, and, again, about the attendance of a competent solicitor. Where there is a large county court business, where the court has the full county court jurisdiction, like Swansea and Cardiff, you have your local Bar. We have a large local Bar at Cardiff now, and several gentlemen practise at Swansea also. Others practise at Chester.

43,196. There would not be any invidious distinction between one judge and another?—Not in the least.

43,197. We have had suggestions of a similar kind with regard to England. I suppose the same principle would apply?—In my individual opinion, yes. When I was talking about Wales I was doing it as the delegate of my honourable colleagues.

43,198. You had some experience as a county court judge?—Yes, for seven years.

43,199. (Mrs. Tennant.) Would it be fair to assume that the wife of the hardened criminal was probably aware of her husband's mode of life before she married him?—I should not assume anything. If I understand the question aright, I should not assume any such thing.

43,200. Is it not probable he has begun his career of crime early? I am excluding the case of the clerk who has committed what we may call an accidental crime; but take the man who gets seven years' sentence, has he not probably begun his career early in life?—I think that is a very common case. I was very much impressed, as Chairman of the Metropolitan Police Commission, with the existence of a very undesirable class of young men, more particularly boys, who had had all the advantages of the public elementary schools, and yet seemed to get off the rails and commence a bad career at a very early point, young men from 17, 18, 19, or 20 years of age. They form gangs among themselves. We had a very large body of evidence which I will not trouble the Commission with, as to the existence of gangs of hooligans, as they are commonly called, and these young men commit, as you are suggesting, petty crimes from a very early time. They often marry, and sometimes the girls they marry do not know anything about it.

43,201. Do you think it likely the girl may marry knowing nothing of the mode of life of her future husband?—She may, but I should think that in most cases she pretty well knows whether the young man is an honest workman or not—I should think so.

43,202. If she pretty well knows, is not his imprisonment almost one of those possibilities she may bear in mind when she promises to take him for better or worse?—Certainly. I frankly admit that, but the mere fact that a girl at 19 looks upon that as a possibility hardly justifies refusing her what is fair redress to her when she is 28 or 29.

43,203. It does modify your opinion of the hardship to her?—The case you are putting is really the case of a woman who does not care whether the man she marries is or is not a criminal. The case you put seems to me to be that of a girl who is willing to marry a criminal and aid and abet him in his criminal career.

43,204. At any rate, who has a low standard of that form of morality?—I should say that unfortunately there is a class of young women as well as a class of young men whose standard of morality is extremely low.

43,205. You spoke of the bitter hardship, which one can understand, to the girl who is married and believes her husband to be an honest workman and finds him to be a criminal. I wanted to know whether you held the same opinion about a girl who married with a full knowledge of the man's mode of life?—As far as the principle of right is concerned, yes, but I think you did not observe in that class of case I did not suggest that the wife should have an absolute right to divorce, but that it should be left to the discretion of the court. If it were brought to the knowledge of the court that the wife, even before marriage, knew the character of her husband, I should think the court would say:—"This "is not a case in which we propose to give you "relief."

43,206 I had not realised that. Do you distinguish between the cases in which the women had known beforehand, or would you include all cases of prolonged imprisonment?—In regard to the new grounds of divorce I suggested both in regard to incurable insanity and convictions followed by long sentences, that the right of the petitioner should not be an absolute right, but a right to petition the court for the exercise of divorce power in the discretion of the court.

43,207. You do not include in that list the cases of malicious desertion even though for four or five years?—I explained, in answer to Sir George White, that I do not think that mere desertion ought to be a ground. I think that case is covered adequately by providing that where a separation order has been made under the Act of 1895, and the parties have not for, say, four years, come together, there might be divorce in that case.

43,208. Where there has been no separation order, what do you say?—I think I must answer the question as to simple desertion in the same way I answered Sir George White. I believe that would be practically tantamount to giving a right to dissolve the marriage by consent, in practice.

43,209. We have had evidence of cases of desertion that sounded very hard. Would you refuse relief to them and give it in the case I have been putting before you of the girl who knows what she is doing, and may well be said to take the man for better or worse, realising the worse as a probability?—I was careful to guard myself by reference to postulates or presuppositions. The words "for better or worse" do not affect me with regard to this matter. That is a part of the ceremony.

43,210. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) You fix the district registry as a centre for divorce. I suppose that is only a matter of detail?—A mere matter of detail.

43,211. The course adopted under the Extended Jurisdiction Act might be applied of the Lord Chancellor fixing centres?—Whatever convenience dictates ought to be done in reference to a mere matter of machinery of that kind.

43,212. Do you see any advantages in the county court judge having jurisdiction with regard to the accessibility for poor people over the assizes?—They are held more frequently, for one thing, and, again, as a matter of fact, the business in the county court is done with greater punctuality than the business at the assizes, that is to say, taking a typical county court action, by the process a man is summoned to appear at a given hour and place. He goes there, and, in the great majority of cases, in the course of the day the cause is determined. Again, if it is a very big case, a remitted action, and you are going to have counsel, the registrar is informed and he communicates with the judge, and there is an arrangement made that the case will be taken at 12 o'clock, if a jury case, on such and such a day. The parties come at 12 o'clock, and the jury is summoned, and the case is decided at the hour at which it is arranged. At the assizes, where you sometimes have a long list, as we have in Glamorganshire, sometimes 40 and sometimes as many as 50 causes, although that is rather rare, you may be kept several days waiting for the case to come on. That ill at the Assizes has been remedied to a large extent by new arrangements. There is a Cause List at Cardiff and Swansea; we have a Cause List put up every day.

43,213. With regard to criminal trials at Assizes, it is impossible to know when they will come to an end?—In criminal cases, barring exceptional criminal matters, you appear before the Grand Jury, and after the first or second day the cases are put in lists, as the civil cases are.

43,214. The parties never know when they will come to an end. The parties in divorce cases would not know the exact day the cases would be taken?—No; they would be entered in order in the Cause List.

43,215. Having had experience as a county court judge, you know in the county court you can fix your days for the cases so as to make certain they will be reached?—Certainly. On both the circuits of which I was judge, as to the ordinary small courts there was no occasion, except very rarely, to make special arrangements; but with regard to the bigger places, where there were remitted actions and bankruptcy jurisdiction, the cases out of the ordinary course were usually fixed for a special day and counsel attended.

43,216. With reference to the registrar for the purpose of doing interlocutory work, do you think that there is any difference between the registrar in one court or another? Are they all practically the same competent kind of men?—It would be a bold thing to say that registrars of all the county courts are equally competent. While in my experience the registrars of the county court are thoroughly competent men, yet there can be no doubt I think that the registrars in the bigger courts who devote their whole time to their work, who are in many cases bound not to take private practice, do get a facility in dealing with summonses, and so on, from experience that other registrars do not possess.

43,217. There are many registrars in a circuit equally competent in a particular district registry who are combined high court and county court registrars?—Yes, they generally are.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much for your evidence and the great thought you have bestowed upon it.

Dr. Willem Roosegaarde Bisschop called and examined.

43,218. (Chairman.) You are a barrister of Lincoln's Inn?—Yes.

43,219, You are also a LL.D. Of what University?—Leiden.

43,220. You are Doctor of Laws at that University, and you were admitted as a member of the Amsterdam Bar in 1896, and you have remained a member since that time?—Yes.

43,221. You have practised as an advocate in the Dutch Courts?—I have.

43,222. And you still could do so?—I could do so, but I am not practising.

43,223. You were called to the English Bar in 1901, and you are now practising as an English barrister in England?—Yes.

43,224. I take it that you are familiar with the Dutch laws as the result of your studies and your experience?—Yes.

43,225. Would you continue your proof?—"My attention has been drawn towards the fear expressed by a number of persons that, if the granting of divorce were no longer centred in one court but decrees nisi could be pronounced by different courts all over the country, this would lead to the adoption of as many standards for divorce decree as there would be courts pronouncing them. On that point it might interest the Commission to know something about the practice of divorce courts and the dissolution of marriages in the kingdom of the Netherlands, where 23 local courts have the right to pronounce such decrees. The High Court of the Netherlands consists of 23 local courts of first instance, which have, each of them, exclusive jurisdiction in their districts. Each of them has the full powers of a high court, that is to say, each of them can hear all suits from claims of 50 guilders (about 4*l.*) upwards. Each of them has, in fact, the full powers of the English High Court of Justice. From them appeal lies, in all causes, to a court of appeal. There are five courts of appeal. In matters of divorce the petitioner has to bring his or her action before the court of the district where the husband is domiciled. This prevents the petitioner from choosing any particular court. The fact that the petitioner cannot choose his or her own court and that there is always a possibility of appeal are two reasons why the standard for divorce decrees in the Netherlands is everywhere pretty well the same. It is impossible to reduce this to figures, nor is it possible to give minute details, but the general standard is considered by the lawyers of Holland as pretty well the same in all courts.

43,226. How many judges sit together to hear a divorce case?—Three judges.

43,227. And no jury?—No. I enclose statistics of the number of divorce proceedings which have been taken in each of the years 1904–9 before each of the 23 courts. I have since then been able to collect better and more ample statistics, but unfortunately not for all the courts. I have not had answers from one of the courts, but I will place those which I have before you directly in order to explain them. I think that the new statistics will give you the results of the different proceedings before the different courts, and especially on a point with which I will deal later on, the difference between in formâ pauperis proceedings and ordinary proceedings.

(The witness handed a table to the Chairman which will be found in Appendix XIX., page 148.)

43,228. May we substitute that for what you have sent?—I should like to elaborate my statement before I deal with it.

43,229. Will you continue your statement?—From these statistics it will be seen that the dissolutions of marriages in groups C. and D. were proportionally the most numerous, but these groups contain (C.) the districts of the Hague and Rotterdam, and (D.) of Amsterdam. I have divided them into five groups.

43,230. C. and D. have vanished off the new statistics?—Yes.

43,231. The statement does not identify them?—The statement refers to the old statistics.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) We have not got either the new or the old statement. Would the witness explain what A., B. and C. refer to?

43,232. (Chairman.) I think if you come and look at this you will follow it. On the old one you have put the letters A., B., C., and D. If you will give your evidence by marking the new statistics with those letters at once it will be clear?—I have divided these statistics of the 23 courts into five groups, grouping them together as much as possible according to the similar circumstances in which they are situated.

43,233. It shows on the face of it that there are five groups?—I want to explain the different groups.

43,234. The new statistics which you have prepared more fully are divided into five groups?—Yes, the first consists of four courts situated in the southern part of the Netherlands. I have grouped those together because they are entirely situated in the provinces where the Roman Catholic faith is predominant. The result is that the number of divorces there is extremely small. Although all the citizens are under the same civil laws the Church has a greater influence in those provinces and prevents the people suing for divorce, because the Church will not allow them to do so.

43,235. Taking the year 1904, what does "Ord." mean?—I have grouped them in two different groups. "Ord." means ordinary—that means where parties are able to pay the Court fees; and I.F.P. means in formâ pauperis.

43,236. (Sir William Anson.) What about A., B., C., D., and E. What do they mean?—A. is the first group, B. the second, and C. the third.

43,237. What is the second group?—I am coming to that.

43,238. (Chairman.) I think if you follow this, Sir William, you will understand it?—The second group are courts which I might call situated in the different Provinces. They are provincial courts. They would be more of the nature of county courts in England.

43,239. There is a larger number of divorces there?—Yes, about the same as in the last group, the fifth. One is in the northern part of the country and the other in the eastern. Those are more or less county courts. I want to direct your attention to the third and fourth groups which contain the big towns. One is Rotterdam. Unfortunately, I have not been able to obtain statistics for Rotterdam with the division between ordinary and in formâ pauperis cases, but you will find Amsterdam there. I do not remember what number it is.

43,240. Amsterdam is number 15?—You will see a great difference between Amsterdam and the Provincial courts. There is the difference between the people living in the country and the people living in the big towns. In the latter there is an immediate rise in the number of divorces.

43,241. There are a very large number of pauper cases?—Yes. From Rotterdam the Registrar informed me that he had no time, owing to the special work which he had to do, to collect all the cases, but he stated that the proportion between the in formâ pauperis cases and the ordinary cases was this. If the ordinary cases were 10 to 15 in 100 the in formâ pauperis cases were 90 to 85.

43,242. Take 1909. In Amsterdam there were 56 ordinary cases and 230 in formâ pauperis cases?—Yes.

43,243. To return to your proof, you proceed to deal with the grounds for the dissolution of marriages in the Netherlands?—Yes, the grounds are (1) adultery, (2) malicious desertion, (3) imprisonment for four years or more, (4) criminal assaults whereby the life of the assailed is endangered, (5) a lapse of five years after a judicial separation (separatio a mensâ et thoro) has been granted between the same parties, without reconciliation having taken place.

43,244. Is adultery the same for both sides?—Yes, all these grounds are the same for both sides. Before I proceed may I give you a little historical explanation as to how these grounds became to be the law of Holland.

43,245. If you please?—Some of these grounds are based upon the Roman Dutch law, which is still the common law of certain British Colonies, and they remain the grounds upon which dissolution of marriage can be obtained in those Colonies. Divorce has always been known in Holland. I will not take you further back than the time when the Roman Catholic Church, as in England, obtained great influence in the various Dutch provinces, which were afterwards combined as the provinces of the Netherlands, and the Church had in fact the whole of the divorce proceedings in hand. In those days, before the Reformation, there was practically no divorce allowed by the courts, although the common law did allow it. It was only then that separatio a mensâ et thoro was introduced into and became popular in Holland. With the Reformation divorce proceedings revived, or rather proceedings for the dissolution of marriage revived, on two grounds. The first one was adultery, and the second was malicious desertion, founded, as your Lordship very well knows, on the passage in Scripture in Chapter 1 of the Book of Corinthians.

43,246. On the same grounds as the Scotch did?—On the grounds of the interpretation given by the Calvinists to those particular parts of the Scripture. Those two grounds are grounds which have been recognised by the Roman Dutch law till the present day, and they have remained the law of Holland. In the beginning of the 19th century, after the French occupation of Holland, there was a third ground allowed for the dissolution of marriage. Separatio a mensâ et thoro was retained, as it is retained at the present day, but in order to render divorce proceedings easier it was provided in the Civil Code of Holland in 1838 that if separatio a mensâ et thoro had been pronounced and remained in existence for five years without reconciliation having taken place, the parties could ask the court to grant them a dissolution of their marriage. Separatio a mensâ et thoro may also be asked for by common consent. That also was introduced in the beginning of the 19th century, and is similar to an English deed of separation. The sanction of the court may be asked upon that deed of separation. In that case the deed constitutes a valid separatio a mensâ et thoro which also allows parties, after five years without reconciliation, to go to the court and sue for a dissolution of their marriage.

43,247. That comes to divorce by mutual agreement after a five years' interval?—That is practically the case. I wanted specially to point this out to you, because although theoretically it amounts to divorce by mutual agreement, in practice—as you will see from these statistics—it hardly ever takes place.

43,248. You have given in your table a column headed Dissolution of marriage after separatio a mensâ et thoro?—The second column is dissolution of marriage after separatio a mensâ et thoro, and there is only one case in a year, as you will notice.

43,249. There are very few?—Yes.

43,250. In Amsterdam, with a big population, there are none in 1904, one in 1905, one in 1906, one in 1907, one in 1908, and eight in 1909?—Yes.

43,251. Do you mean there is no social danger in introducing that?—I think so, but I have to qualify my answer, because I have to point out that although the law is so, the jurisdiction since 1883 is somewhat otherwise. In 1883 the Supreme Court of the Netherlands, which takes the place of the Cour de Cassation of France, and is equivalent to the House of Lords here, decided that in undefended divorce proceedings the petitioner would not be obliged to prove his or her case. That decision has been gradually adopted by all 23 courts of first instance in the Netherlands, and at the present moment it is the standing practice that in any divorce proceedings, if the respondent does not appear, the petitioner has not to prove his or her case, and obtains divorce by default. The result is that if husband and wife want a divorce by mutual consent one party has only not to appear and allow judgment to go by default, so that it is questionable whether dissolution of marriage after separatio a mensâ et thoro would not be more practised if that had not been the case since 1883.

43,252. The petitioner can allege adultery on the part of the respondent, and that does not require any proof, and therefore they naturally use that instead of waiting five years?—That is so, but if you look at the figures of the ordinary proceedings where the proceedings are not in formâ pauperis, even then you will see that the number of divorce proceedings is not extraordinarily great.

43,253. Where it is undefended, does not the petitioner who files a petition require to verify that by affidavit?—The petitioner has not to call witnesses. The facts are not gone into.

43,254. Have they to file an affidavit?—They have to make out a primâ facie case.

43,255. That is not quite the same thing?—Affidavits are not known in Dutch proceedings.

43,256. Has the petitioner to be called as a witness?—No, the petitioner is not called.

43,257. How do you make out a primâ facie case—by simply launching a petition?—The statement which is made, the petition rather, must have on the face of it the probability of being true.

43,258. Supposing the petition simply says that the respondent has committed adultery with somebody else?—Generally the petition does say that.

43,259. It must, of course, in the case of adultery. If there is no verification of that of any kind do you mean that then the court will pronounce a decree?—Yes, it may do so.

43,260. That shortens the five years very quickly?—Yes.

43,261. Will you return to your proof?—It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the Netherlands that a petitioner, in an undefended action for divorce on account of adultery, is not obliged to prove the adultery. This is only with regard to adultery. "Curiously enough this rule has apparently not led to an increase in the number of divorces, although it might seem to open the door to collusion. The reason is, I think, the possibility to obtain a divorce on the fifth of the above-mentioned grounds. A judicial separation is obtainable on each of the first four grounds enumerated above, and also on the ground of offensive conduct or assault committed by either of the spouses against the other. Either spouse who finds it unbearable to live together with the other, but is unable to institute divorce proceedings on any of the first four grounds above enumerated, may obtain a judicial separation, and after five years (if no reconciliation has taken place in the meantime) a dissolution of the marriage. The principal effect of the decision of the Supreme Court has been to shorten this period. This fact was pointed out, as recently as April 1910, in a resolution passed by the Amsterdam Bar in view of a Bill which has been introduced in the States General to reverse the decision of the Supreme Court and to make it compulsory in undefended suits" for divorce on the ground of adultery, to prove the adultery. I enclose a copy of that resolution.

43,262. You have substantially stated it in what you have said?—Yes. The feeling of the Bar not only in Amsterdam, but also in The Hague and Rotterdam, is that a reversion of the Supreme Court decisions would simply mean that persons would have to wait five years, and therefore they are not in favour of it. My impression is that the Bill will pass.

43,263. Is that being introduced by the Government?—It has been introduced by the Government. It was introduced by the Minister of Justice, but since its introduction the then Minister of Justice has resigned, and I do not know whether his successor has taken it over.

43,264. The resolution was against altering the judgment?—Yes. Not only is that the feeling in Amsterdam, but also in The Hague.

43,265. Then you say that the grounds for divorce and judicial separation are the same for both spouses?—Yes. "I am sorry that I cannot give more detailed statistics regarding divorce decrees in the Netherlands. I regret this especially, as it prevents me from giving the number of divorce proceedings in formâ pauperis as compared with those where the parties can pay for the legal expenses of such proceedings." That I wrote before the Registrars of the different courts had been kind enough to supply me with new statistics. With regard to in formâ pauperis proceedings, I think there is hardly any country where the in formâ pauperis proceedings are better regulated than they are in Holland. Every person who has a claim, or considers that he has a claim, for which he wants the assistance of the court, can one day a week appeal to the President of any of the 23 courts and ask him for a solicitor and barrister. The profession of solicitor and barrister is combined in Holland, and the petitioner generally needs only one person to help him in his difficulty. On taking the oath as an advocate in one of these courts the barrister promises to help any poor person whom the President sends to him gratuitously. "Every solicitor, on his admission, undertakes to deal gratuitously with all cases which are forwarded to him for that purpose by the President of the court where he practises, and every barrister, on his being called, undertakes to appear gratuitously—in civil as well as in criminal proceedings—for such clients for whom the President of the court where he is domiciled asks his services. Every poor person, whose incapacity to pay for legal proceedings is properly proved by the Commissioners for the Poor in the town or district where he or she is domiciled, can request the President of the court of the district for a solicitor and barrister to assist him or her with his or her case. The President has to satisfy himself that the applicant has primâ facie a good cause of action or ground of dfeence, and—as I said—the lawyers who are requested by the President to undertake the task for these poor clients have to do so without being able to charge for their services. No legal charges whatever are payable in these cases. The preponderance of in formâ pauperis cases in matters of divorce over others, is not due to the fact that the law is stretched on behalf of the poor or that it is easier for the poor to obtain a divorce, but simply to the fact that poor people greatly preponderate over those who can pay for legal proceedings. Divorce suits in formâ pauperis cost, at the utmost, two guineas, mostly for fees payable to witnesses. These fees are fixed by the judge for each witness after the hearing of his or her evidence in court. Proceedings between persons who can pay for their legal expenses cost, on an average, from 25*l.* upwards."

43,266. Then the next point is with regard to divorce proceedings being held in camera?—Divorce proceedings are dealt with in camera and never revealed in the newspapers. Neither during my practice as counsel at Amsterdam, nor afterwards, have I ever seen any disclosure of divorce proceedings in Dutch newspapers. The law renders it compulsory that the decrees are published, but this is done in as simple a manner as possible. I enclose some examples.

43,267. I have one here?—May I point out what they contain. They contain nothing else but the decree.

43,268. Would you translate the first one?—Yes. At the top is put "second publication." They have to be published three times with a month's interval. "In formâ pauperis. By decree of the Divorce Court " of Rotterdam of the 13th June 1910, on the ground " of misconduct a separation a mensâ et thoro has been " pronounced between H.B. and H.A.V.D.F., both " without a profession, living at Rotterdam, with all " the consequences attached thereto by law." Then it gives the name of the solicitor.

43,269. That is an instance of the style of thing?—Yes.

43,270. Who has to do that? Is it compulsory upon someone to put it in the paper?—Yes, it is the petitioner who has been successful who has to do that.

43,271. How do you insist upon his doing it?—If he does not do it the decree cannot be registered.

43,272. The decree cannot be registered?—The decree can only be registered after these three publications with a month's interval have taken place, after the decree has been pronounced.

43,273. You have sent in examples, but I do not think they need all be put in?—They are different. Some are divorce and some are separation.

43,274. Perhaps we might select one which is divorce and have that put in. Will you take one and read it in English?—"First publication. In formâ pauperis."—I may tell you that if the words "in formâ pauperis" are inserted the newspapers also publish it gratuitously—"By decree of the District Court of Rotterdam of the " 13th July 1910, given in the case of J.D.V. without " profession, living at Rotterdam, as plaintiff, against " J.J., living at Rotterdam, as defendant, the marriage " existing between the parties has been dissolved by " divorce."

43,275. That does not say for what fault or whose fault it is?—No.

43,276. Does it never do that?—It does sometimes, but it is not necessary. I have here five cases in which the ground of divorce has not been given. I have also three more cases where the ground of divorce has not been named. It is not necessary.

43,277. You say in your proof they only contain the names of the parties, the ground on which the divorce was pronounced, in as little words as necessary. That does not seem to me to mean anything?—No, the facts depend on the practice of the town very often. In Amsterdam I have seen it sometimes published, whether the case was in formâ pauperis or not, the name of the court, dates of the decree and name of the lawyer who appeared on behalf of the petitioner. A co-respondent is never found in divorce proceedings in the Netherlands.

43,278. Do you mean that he is not made a party?—Never. In cases of adultery the name of the guilty party is generally not revealed. There are two reasons for this practice. In the first place, in Dutch proceedings the parties can never be called as witnesses. If a co-respondent were made a party he could not be called as a witness. Therefore, as a rule, in cases of adultery the petition only contains the fact that the defendant has committed adultery with some person, and then when the witnesses are called the co-respondent may be called as a witness, because he has not been named in the petition. He has not been made a party. Another thing is that damages would not be granted against a co-respondent in Holland. The usual allegation is: adultery committed by having had carnal connection with some person other than (the wife or husband). In the second place, this mode of proceeding gives the guilty persons an opportunity to marry each other afterwards, which, otherwise, the law would prevent.

43,279. Do you mean if they were named in the decree there would be no right to marry?—That is so.

43,280. That is very much like it is in Scotland?—Yes. This also is an old rule of Roman-Dutch law which is still in force in the above-mentioned British Colonies.

43,281. What is the next part of your memorandum?—That is a translation of the petition of the Order of Advocates at Amsterdam.

43,282. I think you had better read it?—

"The Order of Advocates at Amsterdam

"having taken cognisance of the Bill for the prevention of a divorce decree being pronounced by the court unless the court is convinced by legal evidence of the existence of the grounds mentioned in the petition of divorce;

"considering itself justified on account of the daily experience obtained by the members of the Order with regard to the working of the law of divorce to bring the following to the notice of the Legislature;

"Express as their opinion:

"That the practice which the Bill attempts to bring to an end finds its origin in the wish of both spouses to see their marriage dissolved within a much shorter time than the legal provisions allow with regard to separatio a mensâ et thoro followed by dissolution of the marriage and without either of the spouses, in order to obtain this result, committing an act which according to our legislation gives the other spouse the right to petition for divorce;

"That if the Bill becomes law two means will be "used to obtain dissolution of the marriage within "not too long a period, if such dissolution is desired "by both parties, viz., the real committal of adultery "so that it can be proved, or the obtaining of evidence "to prove an act of adultery which in reality is not "committed; That the fear is justified that either "of these means shall so much the easier be used "as the spouse against whom the divorce has been "pronounced—as far as his or her relation to the "children is concerned—is legally on exactly the same "footing as the spouse who petitions for the divorce." This refers to the Children's Acts which were recently introduced in the Netherlands in favour of children and their relation towards their parents. "That it "is certainly not the intention of the legislators to "encourage the use of either of these means. That "the adoption of those means may be the cause "of considerably shortening the period of five years "named in Article 255 of the Civil Code." This refers to the period of five years which had to elapse in order to obtain dissolution of the marriage after judicial separation without reconciliation having taken place. "That in this respect it may be observed that—if that "period were fixed at one year—yet a considerable "time would have to elapse between the date of the "petition for a judicial separation until the time when "the dissolution of the marriage is pronounced; invites "the Council of Supervision and Discipline"—this Council is elected from amongst the advocates themselves—"To bring this resolution to the notice of the "Second Chamber of the States-General."

43,283. (Mr. Brierley.) With regard to the in formâ pauperis procedure, I understand in the Netherlands that the pauper petitioner has to pay his witnesses?—Yes.

43,284. The lawyer makes no charge, and then you say that no legal charges are payable in these cases. I suppose that refers to the fees of the court?—Yes.

43,285. The expenses of witnesses have to be defrayed?—By the petitioner. As a rule these are not very heavy, because there are so many courts. The witnesses have not to travel very far. I have made inquiries in Holland and asked what the utmost costs were of an in formâ pauperis proceeding, and I have been informed that it is a very rare case which exceeds 2*l.* for all expenses.

43,286. You might get an exceptional case where the witnesses may have to be brought from a distance?—I was informed that 2*l.* was the highest.

43,287. Whatever they cost, the petitioner has to provide?—Yes.

(Mr. Brierley.) I do not know that the system in the Netherlands is as favourable to the poor man as in Germany, because in that respect he has to find that.

43,288. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) The Dutch Bar are unanimous against a change of the law which would make it necessary in an undefended action for divorce on the ground of adultery, to prove the adultery?—I will not say that they are unanimous in favour of the retention of the present practice. It has so much become a common practice that they do not like at the present moment to change the practice, because they say it would only mean that the other method would be followed.

43,289. With regard to the Order of the Advocates of Amsterdam, what is the point you make upon it, that they do not want the law changed so as to make it necessary to prove adultery in an undefended suit on the ground of adultery?—You used the words "the Dutch Bar."

43,290. I beg your pardon. It is my ignorance. I meant the Order of the Advocates of Amsterdam?—Yes, that is so.

43,291. Is that opinion shared by the Dutch Bar generally?—No, not generally. I am certain that there are towns where they would not adopt it, but I think it is shared by the Hague and Rotterdam.

43,292. The ground of that is that it would make it harder than it is now to get a divorce if you had to prove the adultery?—The ground of it is that it would not change the system. It would make the obtaining of divorce longer. Instead of using the one method the parties would use the other method.

(Chairman.) Would you look at the bottom of page 6, where they say that if the Bill becomes law two means will be used to obtain dissolution of the marriage.

43,293. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I was referring to this: "That if the Bill becomes law, two means will be used "to obtain dissolution of the marriage within not too "long a period if such dissolution is desired by both "parties, namely, the real committal of adultery so "that it can be proved, or the obtaining of evidence to "prove an act of adultery which in reality is not "committed." Does not that suggest an extraordinarily low state of morality in Holland?—I agree that, if so read, it might induce the reader to think that the state of morality is a low one; yet, I am personally of opinion that, with regard to Holland, the state of morality is pretty high. The Dutch people are very homely. They are not given to suing for divorce, and the easier method of proceeding is mostly taken, not because there is not sufficient ground for divorce, but to make the proceedings as little repulsive as possible.

43,294. As a means of getting divorce easily?—Yes, but not that there is not sufficient proof. The parties do not want to reveal too much of the unhappy circumstances in which they are living, and it is simply agreed between them that one party will bring the proceedings and the other party will not defend them.

43,295. What is at the back of this is that the gentlemen who give this opinion think that divorce ought to be granted in the easiest way possible when people want it?—I will not say that, although it may be so.

43,296. Is not that what they say?—I think that they want to leave this to the court to decide. They think that they should have the least trouble to bring the matter before the court.

43,297. Apart from that, you can get, generally speaking, in Holland, I understand, at the option of the parties, if they find their life intolerable, a judicial separation?—Yes, but it is rarely done.

43,298. If that goes on for five years they can get a divorce?—Yes.

43,299. The foundation for divorce being the judicial separation which has begun simply on incompatibility?—Yes.

43,300. That takes five years?—Yes.

43,301. This is a shorter way of doing the same thing. Is not that it?—Yes.

43,302. That is the argument. The method is that you allege an offence without proving it, and the drawback of making you prove it is that it might be necessary to commit the offence or commit perjury and say you had committed it when you had not?—Yes, but not to commit perjury, because it remains only an allegation without any proof and without an affidavit, as affidavits are not known in the Dutch courts. At the same time I want to point out that these cases of separation by mutual consent rarely turn into a dissolution of the marriage. Otherwise it might be alleged that I had committed a slander in saying that the Dutch people are given to immorality. In the column of separations by mutual consent you will find very few cases.

43,303. Is that after five years?—No, not ordinary separation, a deed of separation.

43,304. That is not divorce at all?—One can obtain separation a mensâ et thoro by mutual consent. After five years it can be turned into divorce, but I want to point out that that separation by mutual consent is very rarely resorted to.

43,305. (Chairman.) You have another column of separation by mutual consent?—That is what I refer to.

43,306. Is that where it is turned into divorce?—Afterwards it can be turned into a divorce, after the parties have obtained separation a mensâ et thoro, either on the grounds mentioned in the law or by mutual consent. After that has lasted five years it can be turned into a divorce.

43,307. You have a column for the dissolution of marriage after separation a mensâ et thoro. That is the class Sir Lewis Dibdin has been asking you about. Those are the ones that are in fact turned into dissolution. Then you have a column on separatio a mensâ et thoro: that is where there has been a judicial separation and nothing more, and then you have a column, separation by mutual consent, where there is nothing but separation?—Yes, but the second column covers these two, the third and the fourth.

43,308. They gradually may get into that other column?—Yes, from the third and fourth they might come into the second column. I want to point this out, otherwise from my evidence it might be taken that dissolution of marriage by common consent was very easy and often resorted to in Holland. I want to point out that it is very seldom done, because the separation by mutual consent is very rarely resorted to.

43,309. Is this column of separation a mensâ et thoro on grounds which are not mutual consent?—Yes. Those are on legal grounds.

43,310. (Mrs. Tennant.) Are your criminal laws in the Netherlands similar to ours?—Yes.

43,311. The terms of imprisonment would be for similar offences?—Yes.

43,312. Is there any feeling that imprisonment for four years is rather a short term to justify a ground of divorce?—No, I do not think so.

43,313. Has that always been the law?—Yes. That was introduced also at the beginning of the 19th century.

43,314. What do you hope for from your prison system?—It was changed into four years in 1884. It was formerly under the Code Penal. It is really taken from the French law.

43,315. Do you hope for any curative result from your present system, or is it only punitive?—That part of the present system to which this refers is punitive.

43,316. Is any effort made in prisons to reform the prisoners?—Yes.

43,317. Is there no feeling that it is rather hard on a prisoner committed for four years, who has reformed, that he should find his wife has taken divorce proceedings against him?—It is really an extension of the grounds of malicious desertion. In the case of a person who has been away for a long time and has not been heard of, the person who remains behind can ask the court to pronounce that this person of whom nothing has been heard of for so long is dead, and then the person who remains behind can marry again and that marriage dissolves the former marriage. That is the same reason as the reason why a person can get a dissolution of marriage by malicious desertion. It is an extension of that reason that, if a person has been in prison for four years, the other spouse can ask for a dissolution of the marriage on that ground.

43,318. Surely there is a confusion of ideas in that. What is the definition of absent for a long time, or deserted for a long time?—About seven years. It depends on circumstances. It is for ten years, three years, and one year. Supposing a ship has been wrecked on which people knew that the particular person had embarked, then three years is enough. Sometimes it is ten years, sometimes three years, and sometimes one year.

43,319. In ten years there is an assumption that the person is dead?—Yes.

43,320. There cannot be an assumption in the case of a person committed to prison?—That comes under the malicious desertion. If a person is sent to prison for four years, or longer, that comes into the same category as a person who has maliciously deserted the other spouse.

43,321. Unless you assume he has committed the crime for the purpose of being committed to prison and deserting his wife, it seems hardly malicious desertion?—That may be one view. I am in favour of that ground myself from the experience I have had as a barrister. I am speaking of the in formâ pauperis cases, which are the most numerous as far as Holland is concerned. In those cases imprisonment often leads to immorality. If a man has gone to prison, I am speaking here of the lower classes, where the wife is dependent on the earnings of her husband, the wife is often left behind without any resources. I remember one case which came before me, which was sent to me, where the husband came home and found a child which was not his child. He asked me to institute divorce proceedings against his wife, and I put to him the question: "Whose fault is it; is this the fault of your "wife, or is it your fault because you were sent to "prison?" My experience is that in such cases if imprisonment is no ground for divorce and the wife has to help herself it often leads to immorality.

43,322. Have you any societies for helping the wives in those circumstances?—Yes.

43,323. With regard to publication, if proceedings have been taken and have failed, is there any compulsory notice of the failure?—No, there is no notice of the failure.

43,324. Is it possible in the case of famous people for it to be known that proceedings were contemplated?—No, it is impossible. All these cases are heard in camera.

43,325. We have only reached the stage of gossip. We have not got to the case?—That would come under the ordinary law against libel, I should think, if anything of that kind was published.

43,326. Would it, if it is well known that a petition has been filed?—How could they know?

43,327. People may talk?—Not the registrar of the court; he is not allowed to talk.

43,328. I mean people's friends. I am speaking of famous people?—It may be. That may occur. I will not say it is impossible, but I have never heard of it. I know as common talk if the persons are very well known and they have been divorced, nearly the whole town will know it, but I have never seen a statement in the papers beyond the publication above referred to.

(Sir George White.) Following up the question Sir Lewis Dibdin put to you, one can understand your desire not to say anything that might be held as libelling your countrymen, but I do not quite understand when you say that the result of divorce after five years' separation is proved by statistics to be extremely rare. Is not this new law contemplated because those cases are so very rare and are felt to be a hardship to wait the five years? Does not the law contemplate removing what is felt to be a hardship?

(Chairman.) No, it is the other way round. That is the law at present as laid down by the Court of Appeal, that they need not prove anything, and the motion by the present Minister of Justice is to alter that and to require them to prove matters, so as to force either the proof or the five years' duration. At present they need not wait five years.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) The Bar object to the alteration.

(Sir George White.) I took it the other way round.

(Witness.) But only as a matter of procedure.

43,329. (Chairman.) Although the number of cases where a dissolution after separation has taken place is very small, I see there are a good many cases of separation a mensâ et thoro?—Yes.

43,330. Those cases remain so?—As a rule they remain so or lead to reconciliation. I may tell you at the same time that the manner of proceeding in Holland is the following:—Before a petition can be lodged the parties have to come before the President of the court, and it is the duty of the President of the court to attempt to reconcile the persons if he can. A deed of separation a mensâ et thoro is to give time for consideration. The reason why so few end in dissolution of marriage is that a separation a mensâ et thoro often, I will not say always, leads to a reconciliation.

43,331. Those are all cases where the ground is not consent?—Yes. Those consents are very rare.

43,332. Then the next column, separation by mutual consent, are extremely rare?—Yes.

43,333. You said cases of divorce are taken before three judges?—Yes.

43,334. What sort of income has a judge of that position?—The income of all civil servants in Holland is small. The highest judge, the President of the Supreme Court in the Hague, only receives a salary which amounts to not yet £700, and these ordinary judges in the district courts receive, I believe, from £200 to £250 or £300. Before I conclude may I make an appeal to you?

43,335. Yes?—It is this. If you are laying down new rules or recommending that new rules shall be laid down, I want to direct your attention to the rights of the wife towards her children. The first case which I had in England made a great impression upon me. It was a case where the two parents quarrelled and the mother, according to my opinion, was in the right, but the husband was, on account of being the husband, absolutely in power with regard to the children. It was impossible for the mother to obtain any rights over her children either in this country or in Holland, to which the father departed with the children.

43,336. Are you speaking of a case where a divorce had taken place?—No; but as a general rule in divorce proceedings the petitioner obtains the children, has a right to the children, and I wanted to express my view that that is not always the most equitable way of dealing with the children or dealing with the right of the mother to the children.

43,337. If the mother has been guilty of adultery, as a general rule she will be deprived of the custody of the children?—Yes, but it is not always the rule which is best for the children or which is the most equitable to the mother.

43,338. You mean there are cases in which a wife might be guilty and yet she still ought to be left with the custody of the children. That is the point?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I ought to thank you very much for your evidence, which has been very interesting, and which you have given with very great care.

Adjourned.

FIFTY-FIFTH DAY.

Wednesday, 21st December 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The Right Hon. the EARL OF DERBY, G.C.V.O., C.B.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
Sir WILLIAM R. ANSON, Bart., M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORGE WHITE, M.P.
His Honour Judge TINDAL ATKINSON.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).

Mr. SIDNEY LOW called and examined.

43,339. (Chairman.) I am not sure, Mr. Low, at the moment, whether you are editing any paper or only engaged in general literary work?—No, I am not editing any paper, I am engaged in literary work. I have been concerned with editorial work for many years.

43,340. You were at one time editor of the "St. James's Gazette"?—Yes.

43,341. You have noticed the expressions of views of witnesses before us as to the possibility, or desirability, of suppressing reports of cases in the Law Courts which deal with subjects and details which it is not desirable to publish?—Yes.

43,342. The point you want to make is to show that an attempt was actually made by the "St. James's Gazette" with that object in view?—It was, years ago. The attempt was made to suppress——

43,343. You were good enough to communicate with the Secretary, and as the result of your communication you were invited to come and give evidence?—Yes.

43,344. Would you kindly tell us about the attempt that was made in May 1895, while you were the editor of the "St. James's Gazette"?—It was on the occasion of the criminal trial of Oscar Wilde at the Old Bailey.

43,345. If you have got it exactly as you wish to say it, you can read your proof on it?—Shall I read the passage?

43,346. Yes; I think that gives it?—

"In May 1895 I was the editor of a London evening newspaper, the 'St. James's Gazette.' At the time mentioned Oscar Wilde was tried at the Central Criminal Court. The trial was reported at great length, and in excessive detail in most of the newspapers. Much indignation was expressed at this publication of extremely repulsive matter; but the popular interest in the trial was intense, and the papers, especially the evening papers, some of which gave a dozen columns daily of the evidence, made it as prominent as possible.

"After the first few days I decided that the 'St. James's Gazette' should have no part in this public scandal; we issued a 'contents bill' announcing that no report of the evidence would appear in our journal; and thenceforward we printed nothing but the brief statement that the trial was proceeding. When it concluded we gave a short abstract of the judge's summing up, and announced the verdict and sentence." I notice, on referring to the paper, we give the judge's summing up, and also a short statement made by the judge, and short statements made by counsel which bore upon the matter, and then we give the verdict and sentence. "Our experiment was so far successful that we did not lose circulation by it; that is to say, we sold about our normal number of copies for that period of the year. Our action was generally approved, and it had some effect on our contemporaries; for one or two of them, though they continued to print the evidence, did so in less detail. An unexpected result was a certain increase in our advertisements, several advertisers showing their approval of our conduct by giving us new or enlarged orders.

"I note that Mr. St. Loe Strachey has suggested to the Commission that a judge should have the power to forbid the publication of any part of the proceedings in a suit, and that disobedience in this direction should be treated as contempt of court. The suggestion is not new. It was made by me at the time mentioned. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Halsbury) consulted me as to the best method of preventing such scandals in the future."—I ought to say Lord Halsbury was not actually Lord Chancellor at the time; he became Lord Chancellor a little later in the year. This trial ended in May 1895, and Lord Halsbury became Lord Chancellor in July—"and drafted a Bill which would have conferred on the judges of the Divorce Court, and other divisions, the powers which Mr. Strachey wishes to bestow on them. (I believe some lawyers held that their Lordships already possessed this power.) The Bill was introdced into the House of Lords, but it was not regarded favourably by some of the newspaper proprietors, and was abandoned, I believe, after a short second reading debate; but I am writing without access to any references, and it is possible that I may be mistaken on this latter point."

43,347. You may take it I have procured a copy of that Bill, and that will be before the Commissioners in due course?—I am glad to hear that. I did not know whether it would be accessible, so I had copies made; but you have a copy?

43,348. Yes?—And what happened, as your Lordship will remember, was that the Bill was introduced, not in 1895, but it was introduced in 1896, by the Lord Chancellor, and it was read a second time, after a debate, in which Lord Russell of Killowen, and Lord James, and the late Lord Salisbury, and Lord Rosebery and Lord Glenesk took part, and it received a certain amount of support; but it was very strongly condemned by Lord Russell of Killowen, and what proved fatal to it, perhaps, was the attack made upon it by Lord Glenesk, representing particularly, as it was supposed, the newspaper interest; and also Lord Halsbury told me that he received representations from some of the people specially concerned with the newspaper interest, and I believe the Newspaper Society at the time made very strong representations to some noble lords, and so the Bill, after being read a second time, was abandoned.

43,349. I daresay you will recollect, though, that that Bill was not confined to the Divorce Court, but was a general Bill?—Yes, my Lord, that is so. Really the whole point with which I was dealing at the time was not concerned specially with the Divorce Court. On that point I should like to say a word or two. Shall I conclude reading this?

43,350. Well, would you finish the subject about that Bill?—That is rather the point I wanted to bring before the Commission. It appears to me——

43,351. If it is dealt with further on we need not trouble at the moment, but if it is not, would you kindly deal with it now?—I am not dealing specially with the Bill, but with the whole question.

43,352. Well, perhaps that might come afterwards. I am going to circulate the Bill?—I have some copies.

43,353. I dare say you know some other Bill was introduced before that, backed by Sir Robert Finlay and several others?—Yes, it was introduced some years before. I am not acquainted with that Bill, but it was referred to.

43,354. I have a copy of that too?—I go on to say: "I venture to express the opinion, based on a very long and intimate connection with the London daily press, that it is futile to expect any limitation of objectionable reports from the voluntary action of the newspapers. Most editors and journalists would prefer to conduct their papers with dignity and decorum. But a newspaper is usually a business concern run for profit, and an editor will not often be in a position to sacrifice the pecuniary interests of his employers in order to safeguard the morals and manners of the public. A sensational or painful divorce suit or criminal trial will send up the circulation of some newspapers by tens of thousands of copies daily, and the newspaper proprietor will not often be willing to forego his share of the harvest while it can be gathered in by his competitors.

"In my own case in 1895 the proprietor of the 'St. James's Gazette' pointed out to me that such credit as I myself and my associates derived from our reticence was gained at his expense, for though, as I have said, we did not lose circulation, we had no share in the substantial increase which some other evening papers obtained during the trial." During that trial some of the evening papers very nearly doubled their circulation. "Our paper, however, had a limited and 'high-class' public; it appealed particularly to an educated clientèle like that of the 'Spectator,' so that our experiment was not so venturesome as it seemed. Had we depended on a great body of readers drawn from all classes I should not perhaps have felt justified, with due regard to the interests of the proprietors, in taking the course I did.

"I think, therefore, that if it is deemed advisable to prevent or curtail the publication of scandalous or objectionable matter it can only be done by making such publication a penal offence, or by giving such discretion as is suggested above to the courts, or by hearing divorce suits and certain criminal trials in camera. To throw the responsibility upon the conductors of newspapers would be unfair and, I think, impracticable.

"Many journalists, and I suppose other persons, would hold that any suppression or limitation of the reports of Divorce Court proceedings would be contrary to the public interest, since the real punishment for matrimonial offences is the exposure in the newspapers. In any case the Divorce Court scandal is not the worst evil of the kind. The elaborate and detailed reports of criminal trials, especially in some of the Sunday and weekly papers, are far more mischievous." Then I have added: "I do not now think it would be desirable for the judges to have or to exercise the power of ordering specified portions of the evidence in public trials to be suppressed."

43,355. You do not explain why?—Well, no. At the time I thought that that method might possibly be adopted with advantage; but since then, on considering the matter further, I see many objections to it. I think, besides giving the judge an exceptional power, which perhaps is objectionable on public grounds, it enables him to try a person according to his own opinion. Apart from that, I think there would be a great difficulty with regard to the newspapers, because in the case of these trials, what attracts the public is not, I believe, so much depraved or improper details, but the interest of the story. I think some injustice has been done to the public in this matter, when it is suggested that the public buys these reports to such an enormous degree because of its prurient or improper delight in some of the offensive matter. Well, I think that is not so; but the public find that great many of these cases have all the interest—the kind of romantic and dramatic interest—which they get from fiction or on the stage, and they naturally like to read the story. Any person who has been concerned with the actual conduct of newspapers will know that the real difficulty is not to give as much objectionable detail as possible, but to tell the story with as little of that detail as may be necessary. It will constantly happen that a subordinate will come to his chief when the report of a trial of that sort is coming in, and he will say, "Look at this passage; I suppose we cannot possibly put that in." And then a consultation will take place as to whether it is possible to leave out the objectionable matter and yet continue to keep the continuity of the story. I have often heard anxious discussion on this point. The editor and the sub-editor, and everybody concerned, while anxious to maintain the decorum of the paper, will still have to consider whether there is not something in a particular passage of evidence which might advantageously be suppressed, but which carries on the story, and would be given in other papers; so that the impression would be conveyed that other people are telling the story better than the particular publication concerned. Now, if you arm the judge with power to suppress portions of the evidence, then the judge occupies a kind of external editorial position; it is he who is editing this story, and he naturally looks at the evidence mainly from the point of view of public morals. He would have no particular interest in the way the story was told and in the stress of carrying on the case he naturally would not consider whether the report was being given in such a way that it would be intelligible to the public; and he might direct a particular piece of evidence to be suppressed which would make the whole case unintelligible as given to the newspapers, and so would sometimes throw them into almost intolerable embarrassment. That is one difficulty I see. Then another difficulty that had not occurred to me so strongly in 1895 is the objection to enforcing it in practice; because the judge must either direct the evidence to be suppressed as the case proceeds, or he must do so at the close of the day's proceedings, or at the conclusion of the whole trial. Now I hardly see how he could exercise this kind of censorship as the case was going on under the conditions of modern journalism. Almost before his Lordship would have time to consider the effect of the evidence it is out in print in Fleet Street; the reports go so fast. If the judge were to direct a sort of stay of proceedings while he was considering the point, that would be almost tantamount to suppressing the report altogether. And, again, if he is to wait till the day's proceedings are over, or until the trial is concluded, that is equivalent to suppression. So I think the practical difficulty in working the system would be very great indeed.

43,356. There is this suggestion too, is there not, that the judge's mind ought to be entirely on the question of trying the case?—That is so.

43,357. If he has to keep his mind open as a sort of censor all the time, he would have a very great difficulty?—I am afraid so; and I am afraid his duty as censor might be peformed sometimes in a perfunctory manner.

43,358. Then there is another paragraph of your paper, and then I will ask you some questions?—

"I should not object to a general rule forbidding the publication of proceedings in divorce causes, breach of promise actions, and certain classes of criminal trials; provided that a brief report of every such case were drawn up by official reporters with legal knowledge, and placed at the disposal of the newspapers and press agencies. The report should give the names of the parties, ground of action, nature of the defence, verdict and judgment, and other material particulars together with any observations from the bench which the presiding judge may order to be included in this record. In divorce proceedings the judge will sometimes comment unfavourably upon the conduct of one or more of the parties concerned. Such judicial censure may be the only punishment which can be inflicted upon guilty persons. In such cases there seems no reason why the offender should escape the penalty of publicity. This penalty would not, as at present, be visited upon the innocent and the guilty alike but only upon those who, in the opinion of the judge, deserve to suffer for their misconduct by being held up to public opprobrium." I suggest that as an alternative.

43,359. Now I would like to ask you, broadly: do you think there is in fact an existing evil with regard to publication?—Of reports in divorce cases?

43,360. Yes?—Yes, my Lord, I think there is an evil with regard to the excessive publication in certain newspapers, and the unnecessary publication in certain other newspapers. I think that, as a general rule, the great majority of papers treat these reports as matters of news interesting to the public, and are desirous of making them as little objectionable or offensive as the circumstances permit. There are, however, certain newspapers which deliberately report them in greater detail than is necessary; and there is a great and very scandalous evil in the case of certain weekly papers with very large popular circulations, which make it their business to report divorce cases and criminal cases in as great detail as possible, undoubtedly catering to certain baser instincts, and obtaining a profit by so doing. These reports are frequently not matters of news at all, because they deal with cases that have been tried days, and sometimes weeks, previously; and they sometimes publish cases that have not been tried in England at all, but are reproduced for the sake of the sensational or the interesting matter from foreign newspapers.

43,361. Then you regard that as bad for the readers, I take it?—I think undoubtedly those are demoralising reports; reports of matters of that sort are demoralising

43,362. Then the question really is exactly the right form of remedy?—I think so.

43,363. You have suggested various alternatives as you have already noticed in your paper?—I should like to say, if I may, my Lord, that I think the question of suppression has to be approached from two different points of view. I think it ought to be determined by the consideration of whether these reports are to be suppressed or curtailed simply in the interests of public morality, or whether divorce court proceedings are to be treated differently from other proceedings in the Law Courts. Because in the former case, if proceedings in the Divorce Court are simply on the same footing as other legal proceedings with regard to reports, and the only object is to secure that the public shall not be demoralised by an excessive amount of offensive detail or a gross presentation of it, then it appears to me that the existing law, or a very trivial amendment of the existing law, would meet the difficulty; since the Newspaper Press Act explicitly declares that reports of legal proceedings are privileged so long as they deal—I have the words here—the Act lays down: that a fair and accurate report in any newspaper of proceedings publicly heard before any court exercising judicial authority should, if published contemporaneously with such proceedings, be privileged, provided that nothing in the section should authorise the publication of any blasphemous or indecent matter

43,364. But you have been pointing out that they are not indecent, in the sense that they would come within that section. They are harping on one subject, but not in a form in many cases such as might be called indecent. What is the trifling amendment you suggest?—I was under the impression that the matter really complained of might be regarded as indecent; and the particular evil I have alluded to, the excessive reproduction of such cases in weekly newspapers, I should have thought could certainly be punishable under that Act, because it cannot be called a reproduction of news matter. The expression in the Act, that the privilege only exists when the reports are published contemporaneously, clearly means, I should have thought, that they must be treated as news.

43,365. That is rather a difficult point, whether a case published at the end of the week is contemporaneous with a trial at the beginning of the week. That would be difficult. But with regard to the indecency; if that is left as it is, is it not difficult to say that the reports are indecent, but is it not rather the continual harping on matrimonial troubles and so generally degrading the notion of marriage by repeating the way in which people regard marriage sometimes; that is the trouble?—Yes, I think that is so. Still I do think the excessive detail in which these reports are sometimes given is demoralising. I do not think it specially applies to divorce courts but to criminal courts also; and that is why I think the existing law might meet the case.

(Chairman.) Well, it has been in force a long time and it has never been put in motion.

43,366. (Sir George White.) Do you think it is possible to prevent the publication of objectionable evidence as long as the cases are taken in open court?—No, I do not. That is, I think the cases should be taken in open court but only on the condition that a full report is published. I think the only method of preventing the publication of what may be called objectionable matter, if it is desirable to do so, is to prohibit open publication altogether, and to substitute for it a brief official report.

43,367. That is the question I asked you, whether you think it is possible to prevent this being published so long as the court is open. In following your evidence I do not see that you give us any real way out of the difficulty?—I suggest that the way out of the difficulty is to prohibit full publication by the newspapers and to substitute a brief official report. I think that is the way out.

43,368. By whom?—By an officer of the court or official reporter appointed for the purpose.

43,369. Not really giving the evidence at all?—I see no reason why the public should have the evidence.

The public is concerned only in knowing the result. It is desirable, I think, when a marriage is dissolved that the public should be informed; that is to say, that there should be a public record of the names of the parties and cause of action, and any remarks which may be made from the bench, because they may often have a penal or semi-penal effect. The evidence, it appears to me, is not a matter with which it is desirable the public should be made acquainted.

43,370. Then if any attempt was made to report any of the evidence you would treat it as contempt of court and punishable as such?—Yes, if contempt of court is the only convenient method of dealing with it I should punish it as such; but I suppose a statutory penalty might also be provided.

43,371. That would also have to apply to police court cases, which are often quite as objectionable, or more so, than divorce cases?—I think not, because so far as they are objectionable there I maintain they could be met by the enforcement of the present statute law or the present common law, or possibly some amendment of it. But in the case of divorce proceedings I hold that they should not be published, not only because they are objectionable but because they are undesirable. It seems to me it is not a matter with which the public are especially concerned to know the specific reasons for which a certain private and intimate contract is dissolved.

43,372. (Sir William Anson.) I suppose you would admit there is this difference between proceedings in the Divorce Court and proceedings in other courts; that the proceedings in the Divorce Court are uniformly concerned with sexual questions and the breach of the marriage obligation?—That is so, yes.

43,373. And that the continuous publication of those matters, indecent or otherwise, might tend to weaken the sense of the marriage obligation in the public mind; I mean apart from the question of actual indecency?—I certainly object to the publication of proceedings in the Divorce Courts for promiscuous circulation. I think the point you mention is of some validity; but the important point in my mind would be that the public has no special concern with the precise details, and that great injury and great hardship may be inflicted on some of the parties by such publication. An innocent party in a case, who in the result is vindicated from blame, has nevertheless, perhaps for days, been compelled to see very painful and offensive charges circulated about him or her through all the papers in the kingdom.

43,374. What the public is concerned with is to know the fact that a divorce has or has not been granted?—That is my point of view certainly.

43,375. And anything which would exonerate innocent parties—the fact that innocent persons, whether parties or witnesses, had been brought into the matter and that they were exonerated; that would be important to publish, would it not?—I should go so far as to say that in the official report the names of innocent parties, exonerated in the course of the proceedings, should not be mentioned. I see no reason why they should even be published.

43,376. But might not it be a matter of fairly general knowledge that A or B had been concerned in a divorce case; and if that was so, would not it be fair that their exoneration from all concern in the matter should be published?—Well, I suppose if A and B were petitioners or respondents or co-respondents, I take it their names would be published in the official report, and the exoneration, if there were such, would also be published; and if the judge felt that the names of certain persons ought to be commented on or censured, then that would also be included. But the evidence on which all this was based I think should not be published.

43,377. I am asking whether the bare fact of the result and the exoneration of innocent parties should not be made public?—Yes, I think so. I think the results should be made public; and, as I say, such other matter as the Judge desires to be recorded.

43,378. And any matter of law which the judge considers to be of permanent interest?—Undoubtedly.

43,379. Then you would meet that by saying that the publication of anything except what was authorised by the judge should be penalised?—I would go so far, I think, as to exclude unofficial reporters.

43,380. That is a different matter. Would you have all divorce proceedings dealt with in camera then?—Well, I do not know how far the technical expression "in camera" would carry you. I am not aware whether that means——

43,381. (Chairman.) That technical expression excludes everybody except the parties and the solicitors and counsel, and the officials of the court?—In that case, I should not wish the trial to be in camera, not in that technical sense; because I think the public might well be admitted; not merely the parties and their friends but the public in general. I do not quite like the idea of excluding everybody except the persons connected with the case. But I should like some method to be devised by which reports in the newspapers should not be permitted; I think that could be done by excluding reporters, and by treating unauthorised reports as contempt of court, or by an Act of Parliament imposing a penalty on such unauthorised reports.

43,382. (Sir William Anson.) You would allow the courts to be open to the public, but you would forbid reporting except the authorised report which the judge had sanctioned?—I think so. I do not believe any practical difficulty would arise, because if the unofficial reporter is not allowed to come, it would be very difficult to get any sort of report.

43,383. Then do you draw any distinction between the moral effect on the reader and the moral effect upon the hearer; the casual public who stray in to hear a divorce case dealt with and the person who reads the weekly paper, mainly with a view to the exciting details?—No, I should not draw that distinction; but I do not think the casual public would stray in very much, and it would not be encouraged to come; but I do not quite like the idea that persons who are interested—though not legally and technically interested but who might be friends of different parties and might take an interest in their affairs—I do not like the idea that they should be excluded I am not very much opposed to the hearing in camera, but on the whole I do not approve of the idea that these cases should be taken in absolute privacy and secrecy.

43,384. But you would prefer to limit the audience, if I may so call it, to persons who had a reasonable right to be present?—That is my view.

43,385. That might be done with the sanction of the judge. Permission to be present might be a matter for the exercise of judicial discretion?—Yes. I lay no great stress on it; I have no great objection to taking the cases in camera, because my view is that divorce proceedings ought, as far as possible, to be private; they are mainly the concern of the parties; always provided there is proper judicial control.

43,386. Then, whether by contempt of court or otherwise, you would make unauthorised publication penal?—I should, certainly. That is my view.

43,387. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Just one question only. In the case of an official report such as you have described, would it get into the newspapers at all. What is in my mind is, would there be any—what is called—news value in your authorised report? If there was not, of course a newspaper does not exist for public purposes but for business, and would not put it in?—I think there would be a certain news value in the case of certain trials where the parties are people well known and considered of public importance and standing; and that is the only legitimate news value that exists at present.

43,388. No; what I mean is, you attach weight to the fact of a divorce having been decreed appearing. That I follow, and I will not worry you with questions on that. But taking that as an axiom, starting from that, I do not see how you would get it with your authorised reports; because in an ordinary case it seems to me it would have no news value, and then I do not see how the newspaper is going to put it in; and if you do not get it in you do not get the publicity that you think is necessary?—You mean the official report would be so dull that no newspaper would put it in.

43,389. Well every inch of a newspaper has some value (the space and the putting up and so on), and unless a matter has some news value they would not put it in, and you cannot make them?—But that is only an extension of what happens now. Newspapers do not report all divorce cases, or many of them, but those few that are interesting, either because of the position of the parties or the sensational nature of the evidence; so you only get a partial publication at present.

43,390. That is quite true, but you get a very considerable amount of publication, say in all opposed cases. They generally appear somewhere. I may be wrong, but what I suggest to you is that by the plan you are putting forward probably a large proportion of the cases that are now reported would not be reported at all; the official paragraph would not appear?—No doubt that would happen in many cases; but where those cases are only reported at present, not because of the position of the parties but because of the horrible nature of the evidence, then I do not think there would be any public disadvantage in their not being reported.

43,391. I am not referring to exceptional cases where there are horrible details, but only cases that are reported in every great London paper every day. If you have simply the bare fact of the result, the parties, and so on, it seems to me it probably would not be worth the newspaper's while to print that?—But at the present moment you are only getting a small fraction. This remedy or sanction of publicity is very imperfect, because no newspaper reports anything like a large proportion of the suits that are tried. Most are unimportant and are not reported. Where a case is concerned with persons holding a high social position or well known in the world, then it is reported. When a case, though concerned with other persons has some specially interesting dramatic or sensational or painful features, then also it may be reported. But the great majority of cases are not reported at all at present.

43,392. (Chairman.) I am not quite sure whether it is realised sufficiently by everybody what a public hearing means. Have you ever watched the queue of people standing to get into the Court, as a rule long before the doors open?—I have even taken part in that myself in early days.

43,393. But have you seen what the gallery generally consists of. There may be exceptions, but it is generally the loafers, is it not?—Yes, I think it is sometimes.

(Chairman). Thank you very much, Mr. Low. We are much obliged to you for coming and giving us your evidence.

Mr. William Thomas Stead called and examined.

43,394. (Chairman.) You have had a large experience in the journalistic world?—40 years.

43,395. And you have been asked to give evidence here in connection with the subject which we have under consideration, but really on the point of publication of reports of cases?—I was asked by the Secretary to state any matters on which I wished to express an opinion, and I sent in my opinions; but of course primarily I was called on the other matter.

43,396. Have you got your memorandum before you?—Yes.

43,397. It is a considered paper, is it not?—Yes.

43,398. Then might I ask you to read it?—Read it from the beginning?

43,399. Yes, I think so.—Will it not bore you?

43,400. I do not think so. I find in asking questions where anybody has prepared a careful paper, one wastes more time than if one has it read and asks a question here and there?—Yes, quite so. "The old Nonconformist idea repudiates right of Church to ask State to enforce law of Kingdom of Heaven on Kingdom of this world. Christ's law is for Christ's people, to be voluntarily obeyed by them out of loyalty and love to Him. The State should no more enforce indissoluble marriage in this world than it should enforce attendance at church or the taking of Holy Communion.

"With the domain of conscience and the law of Christ the so-called Christian State has nothing to do. A Royal Commission is of the world worldly, with no spiritual jurisdiction. The only question before you is how far, like Moses, for the hardness of our hearts, divorce, like war, may be permitted by the law-givers of our time as a necessary evil.

"But here at the outset I wish to record my emphatic protest against the assumption that any recommendations you may arrive at should be passed into law until the legislature is representative of both sexes. No subject so vitally concerns women as the law of marriage, and it would be an outrage upon the fundamental ideas of justice and of right, if this law should be remodelled by any legislature which women had no share in electing, and over which women have no control."

43,401. Would that be quite sound if the recommendations were such that women approved of them?—How would you know if women approve of them or not? You ask your wife and I ask mine, but that does not amount to much.

43,402. I was asking you whether you would agree that it is not absolutely necessary to wait for such a legislative change to produce that which might be produced?—I think it is necessary.

"The question of divorce assumes that in some cases marriage is a failure. This is not surprising. The closer the contact the greater the friction. The surprising thing is that so many marriages are not failures, for the Church and the State have so confused their functions and neglected their duties that marriage has hardly had a fair chance.

"The Church, while attempting to compel the State to enforce on the world Christ's law of marriage which was only given to His own disciples, has in this department of life practically abdicated, with few exceptions, its duties as teacher and moral director of the nation. On matters pertaining to marriage the Churches neither instruct the young, exhort their congregations, nor rebuke the evil-doers. They neither glorify the ideal nor explain the responsibilities of conjugal union.

"The State, if possible, offends even more shamelessly. For the State marriage is only a civil contract. But whilst insisting that the contract shall be life-long, it takes no steps, before sanctioning that contract, to ascertain that both the parties entering into so binding an engagement are fully aware of the conditions they are accepting. Marriage hands over the person of one of the contracting parties to be used or abused for ever for the satisfaction of the passion of the other without regard to the wishes of the first, even although it should become physically and morally loathsome. No attempt is made to ascertain whether the woman realises what is meant by the perpetual surrender of her person, or the acceptance of unlimited and involuntary motherhood.

"A good deal has been said about the equality of the law between the sexes. I go much further than to demand equality. The physical disabilities of woman, combined with her lack of economic independence, place her so completely at the mercy of the man that the law instead of, as at present, increasing the handicap against her, should be not so much equalised as made much more stringent against the man. You need much stronger bars to restrain a man-eating tiger than to confine a mild gazelle. The greater the temptation to passionate excess on the part of the man the more severe the penalties that should be imposed for purposes of restraint. I would give much greater liberty of divorce to woman than to man, for her economic position and physical disabilities would operate as a more effective restraint on the woman than the utmost the law could enforce on man.

"When woman attains full citizenship, and realises the corollaries of the doctrine that she has an immortal soul, she will refuse to marry unless assured of a legal right to impose some check upon unlimited cohabitation and an absolute veto at any time during her married life, upon being made a mother against her free and full consent. I admit that no legal right can secure woman, the only female mammal not endowed by nature with an absolute veto on all unwanted intercourse or maternity, against being starved into surrender. But it would be a distinct gain if her legal right to her own person, even though married, were established, and if, as the first article in the Magna Charta of womanhood, it were enacted that unlimited liability to compulsory motherhood were no longer exacted from the wife.

"I cannot understand women who wish to increase facilities of divorce for men. For themselves it is another matter. The marriage law in effect declares that the person of a woman is so sacred and so valuable that no man can lawfully enter into a contract for acquiring conjugal rights unless he stands up before all men, and publicly swears to give her his name and to provide for her till death, and all children which she may bear to him. That is what may be described as the legal trades union fair price of a woman's person. Any woman who consents to intimacy on terms less advantageous to herself undercuts the market. It is this instinctive, half-unconscious sentiment which makes women so much harder on erring sisters than on erring brothers. They are both equally sinners, but one is a blackleg and the other is not. Hence the difference of the censure passed.

"If there were no children and women were economically independent, the State might allow the relation of the sexes to be governed like the relations between any other partners, by free bargaining and mutual consent. But as women are not economically independent, and as there are children, the State ought to protect the weaker partner and to secure the interests of the children. It can best do this by frankly abandoning the attempt to preserve the family upon the old basis of male domination. It can only be saved by re-establishing it on the basis of equality of the rights and liberties of both parties. The wife, apart from the question of status, ought not to be worse off than the mistress. At present she is worse off except in the one particular of a permanent engagement.

"Every additional liberty of divorce conceded to man tends to deprive the wife of the one advantage she has over the mistress, without at the same time extending to her any of the mistress's privileges.

"Briefly, I think that for real, as opposed to merely nominal Christians, marriage should be indissoluble. It is so practically regarded by Catholics and Nonconformists. But the State has no right to enforce this ideal standard upon those who do not voluntarily accept it.

"For the ordinary nominally Christian but really heathen man, the State can only adopt a standard which may be regarded as the common denominator of the ethical conceptions of the community at large.

"With marriage as a sacrament the State has nothing to do. Marriage as a civil contract might be dissolved for (1) adultery; (2) desertion for a term of years; (3) failure or refusal to maintain wife and children; (4) incurable insanity; (5) penal servitude.

"The State would be within its rights in discouraging divorce, in providing opportunity for the intervention of an official peacemaker or reconciler, in postponing the decree absolute for one year or two, in imposing adequate penalties for breach of contract, and in disqualifying guilty parties from holding offices of public trust. A fraudulent breach of the marriage contract might properly be treated like fraudulent breaches of other contracts, and all divorce cases should be tried by mixed juries of men and women. The insufferable arrogance of the male who constitutes himself not only the sole law-giver, but the sole judge both of the law and the facts, is slowly becoming intolerable when the question at issue is one between the two sexes.

"Where, as is usually the case, the wife and children are economically dependent upon the guilty husband, the dissolution of the marriage should in no way diminish the liability of the divorced husband to provide adequately according to his means for the maintenance of the woman and her children. The fact that he has violated one article of the contract is no reason why he should be released from fulfiling other articles in the contract which can be enforced by law, even if the contract has been annulled, when the other party is saddled with obligations or disabilities incurred on the strength of the contract. This would, of course, be applied equally to the guilty wife in those rare cases in which the man and his children are dependent upon her for their livelihood."

43,403. Regarding the guilty man, the State makes provision for the guilty husband to provide for the wife and children?—Yes, I know. I was only laying down general principles without raising the question of altering the law. "I now come to the question of the publication of divorce proceedings. If the State desires to encourage divorce by all means let all divorce cases be heard in camera. If on the other hand the true policy is to discourage divorce, there should be no interference with the liberty of the press to report, at its discretion, the proceedings of the Divorce Court. Whatever evils result from the publication of filthy evidence, they are as dust in the balance compared with the evils which would result from any attempt to restrict, by law, the reporting of the proceedings of the court. As an old journalist—I have been editing papers and magazines for 40 years—I give it as my deliberate judgment that far more harm has been done to public morals by suppressing unpleasant news than by printing it. I am a puritan and am proud to bear the name. I have worked all my life against vendors of obscene books, pictures, and prints; but the deadliest enemies of public morality are those who persistently ignore the existence of vice, who suppress the evidence as to its prevalence, and who prefer that innocent victims should go down into the pit in silence rather than that their refined ears should be shocked by even so much as one despairing cry.

"We are face to face with the fact that the Church has practically ceased to exist as a living force in combating the corruption of morals. Her old weapons, excommunication, refusal of the Sacrament, denunciation from the Altar, and in more recent days the Cutty Stool and the Scarlet Letter, have rusted from disuse. The simple faith of our forefathers in the All-seeing Eye of God has departed from the man in the street. Our only modern substitute for Him is the press. Gag the press under whatever glozing pretexts of prudish propriety you please, and you destroy the last remaining pillory by which it is still possible to impose some restraint upon the lawless lust of man.

"Let in the light! A good arc lamp does more for morality than two policemen. The eye of man is still a potent deterrent to those who love the darkness rather than the light, because their deeds are evil. The Divorce Court is the modern substitute for the Day of Judgment, not because of the decrees which it pronounces, but because of the publicity which it secures. Close its doors, curtail the possible fulness of its reports, and you will give a far more enormous impetus to the corruption of morals than results from the combined efforts of all the proprietors, editors, and reporters of the 'News of the World,' the 'Umpire,' the 'Globe,' and their fellows.

"I have no objection to the prosecution before a jury of any book, magazine, or newspaper which publishes obscenity, even in a privileged law report, unless it can be proved that without such obscenity the case could not be intelligibly reported. But instances of downright obscenity in law reports are very rare. Even the 'News of the World' is said to have somewhat bowdlerised its reports, and obscene reporting in the daily press is practically unknown. Even if it were more frequent, it would be better to run the risk of such occasional outrages than to gag and fetter the press of the whole country.

"I have always found that it is the man who does a woman cruel wrong who dreads publicity for himself, and whenever I have had a chance I have pillorised them as pests of society.

"Let no one think that because I insist upon the use of publicity, I would not do my uttermost to prevent its abuses. But no mistake is more common than to assume that unless you can use the policeman and the gaol you can do nothing. To repress crime by the pains and penalties of the law is necessary. To use the same weapons for dealing with ordinary vice usually aggravates the evil. The force of public opinion could be brought to bear, and ought to be brought to bear, upon those evil-doers who, in order to earn a dirty penny, rake the sewers of our courts in order to minister to the salacious appetite of their Sunday public. If, for instance, a man were proved to be guilty of such an offence, and was treated as if he were caught cheating at cards, the evil would soon be abated. Titles of honour might be forfeited by newspaper proprietors who publish such papers. The purveyor of filth should not be received at court, or elected to any office of public trust. The boycott applied by advertisers is a potent weapon, and if the Church still aspires to be a director of the moral forces of the nation, what an opportunity is afforded it of rallying the conscience of the community to cleanse the journalism of the land from the mercenary vendors of putrid garbage. But since Cardinal Manning died, I have never met a bishop or parson who ever seemed to think that even editors had souls.

"Some previous witnesses have referred to the practice of the American postal laws in relation to this subject. I do not think that anyone who has any regard for liberty or justice, would ever advocate the introduction of the American laws into this country. An unknown clerk is told off by the postal authorities to decide what is and what is not obscene. On his ipse dixit any book, pamphlet, or newspaper can be declared unfit for transmission through the mails. A friend of mine interviewed him some time ago and found him a well-meaning officer, whose fundamental idea seemed to be that any work which mentioned the organs or the act of generation was ipso facto obscene, a principle which, if strictly applied, would cause the Bible to be declared unmailable matter. When this unknown censor has given his decision there is no appeal to any jury, and persons who send such a condemned book through the mails are liable to be sent to prison for three months under the State Law, and after serving that term, to be condemned to five years penal servitude under the Federal Law for the same offence. As this subject is of some importance, I should be glad to give an illustration as to how the system actually works in practice."

43,404. Might I just ask you this. In a paragraph on page 7, you deal with what you consider to be an abuse of publication; the paragraph beginning, "Let no one think," down to the word "souls." You have that before you?—Yes.

43,405. You are referring then to what I may call excessive publication of details in certain classes of papers?—Yes. Not only in divorce cases, but in all cases. What I call "smut."

43,406. That I understand you disapprove of?—And I think, according to what Mr. Low read from the Newspaper Press Act as it stands at present, it would be sufficient to suppress that.

43,407. Has it ever been attempted to put it into force?—That may be the fault of the administrators of the law; it is not the fault of the law.

43,408. I daresay in reading these cases through you have been able to notice that indecency is not necessarily the right word, but rather a harping upon a subject which is not one it is desirable to be perpetually bringing before the public?—I think it is desirable to bring it before the public. I think it is a great pity, as long as adultery, fornication, and other sins go on around us, that we should put our heads in a bandbox, as it were, to hide ourselves from the facts, and I think the daily papers go wrong in not reporting them enough.

43,409. Would you be in favour of doing away with the Incest Act, which enables those cases to be tried in private?—I do not know that Act.

43,410. It is the Act of 1908 which makes incest—that is intercourse between persons of certain prohibited relations—a criminal offence; and one section says that all those cases should be heard in camera?—Well, I disapprove of that Act; that is straight. It is one of those instances in which an insidious encroachment upon——

43,411. Do you mean you disapprove of making it a criminal offence?—No; as to the publication—hearing it in camera.

43,412. You would think all these cases should be heard in public?—I consider the publicity of the courts is the greatest security we have for justice. I feel as if I were in a den of conspirators who are contemplating curtailing the liberty of the country. You might as well attack trial by jury. When I heard Mr. Low's evidence I was appalled to think of a man of my own profession coming in here and discussing how best to relieve editors of their responsibility and putting it on judges. Now I have no faith in judges, though there are good judges.

43,413. Now assume, as you do in the paragraph on page 7 to which I have referred, that there are cases in which there is what you may call an excess of the journalistic privilege, how do you propose to deal with that?—By moral suasion only, but you have not got any machinery for its application; the Church has practically abdicated its function. Nobody thinks it is their duty to do anything, and they throw everything on the policeman. Now I am against relying on the policeman as the only custodian of morals. He is all right for order, but morals is another question.

43,414. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) On page 3 of your proof, Mr. Stead, you say you think there ought to be some causes of divorce open to women and not open to men. What are those particular causes? What are the particular causes that should be open to women and you think ought not to be open to men?—I think desertion by a husband is a much more serious offence than desertion by a wife. I mean desertion by a husband which usually entails starvation of the family——

43,415. You would make that a cause for divorce?—More severe as against the man.

43,416. But if a wife runs away from the husband you would not make that a cause of divorce?—If the wife ran away for three years, or the man ran away for one year; that is what I mean.

43,417. Are there any other differences you make?—I would generally apply the principle——

43,418. No, I do not want "generally"?—No, I cannot give you a definition. I have not framed it.

43,419. I gather you would not be in favour of what Mr. Low has brought before us, namely, that only an official statement of the result of a divorce case be allowed to appear?—You might as well suppress reports altogether. The point you put to Mr. Low was perfectly well taken. The official report would be absolutely worthless as copy for the papers.

43,420. May I ask you just to deal with my question?—I agree.

43,421. I gather your view is that a mere official report is inadequate?—Absolutely useless unless you want to suppress reports altogether.

43,422. And the present system you approve of, except that you think particulars ought to be given in greater detail than they are?—I would leave it absolutely to the discretion of the editors. That is the responsibility of the newspaper.

43,423. I think I heard you say that you thought the details were not given really fully enough?—By the daily papers, very frequently not sufficiently fully.

43,424. Would you explain how you think public morals are advantaged by the details—take a case where the issue is adultery—of where the parties went to, what they did at a particular hotel, and so on. How are public morals served by that kind of publication over and above the publication of the mere result that the woman or the man, as the case may be, is found guilty of adultery and divorced?—All the difference there is between the seeing of a play on the stage and merely stating the result.

43,425. Then you think it is of advantage to public morals that the public should see, as in a play, adultery enacted before them?—Occasionally, when it is adultery on the pillory.

43,426. What do you mean when you say the Church has abdicated its functions as affecting public morals; what is it you are really thinking of, apart from rhetoric?—Apart from rhetoric I am thinking of the action which was taken in Ireland about 100 years ago, which led to a very great improvement in the morality of the Irish people, which is remarkable; that is, any evil-doer was publicly denounced from the altar as an offender against the laws of God and man. That was the primary thing I was thinking of. I do not ask for that now.

43,427. You are thinking of the time when the Church of England had powers of discipline over the laity?—Yes.

43,428. Do you think those powers ought to be revived? I suppose you would agree that they are not enforceable now?—You know I am a Nonconformist, and I do not wish to express an opinion about the Church of England, because I do not think it is a Church in which discipline exists, or which is a Church, from a Nonconformist point of view, at all.

43,429. But you have expressed an opinion, because you say the Church has abdicated its functions as affecting public morals?—Yes.

43,430. Well, I want to know, apart from the general statement, what you are thinking of?—I was really thinking of this, and I am speaking now of Nonconformist churches as well as the Church of England. You may go to a thousand churches and hear a thousand sermons, and never hear one reference in any way whatever to the sin of adultery. Father Vaughan is about the only person who has preached upon the subject.

43,431. I think you have been unfortunate in your selection of churches, if I may venture to suggest it?—I am very glad if your experience has been better than mine.

43,432. You, yourself, are a Nonconformist?—Yes.

43,433. Have you a very large experience of sermons in the Church of England?—It has been my duty, professionally, to attend many such services.

43,434. But you spoke of thousands?—Well, I do not suppose I can remember a thousand of the sermons I have heard; but I think I have heard most of the prominent preachers.

43,435. But you think the clergy do not rebuke the sins of the flesh?—In my experience, never, and it is the greatest difficulty in the world to get them to do anything when you have a great social movement on—the greatest difficulty.

43,436. What occurs to me with regard to your view of the law of indecency is this: it covers what you admit is objectionable in some reports. There is a great difference, is there not, between what is indecent and what may lead to undesirable results by suggestiveness?—Yes.

43,437. Now, is it not the fact that the reports which I think you yourself deplore in some of the Sunday newspapers—you have mentioned them here—are not indecent, but they are suggestive in an evil sense. Those cannot be dealt with, can they, under the existing law?—No, and I would not deal with them; but I think the bishops and clergy and ministers and mayors who live where the proprietors of papers and editors live might bring their moral influence to bear upon them. But moral influence is so much——

43,438. That is a fine phrase, "moral influence;" but what do you want to do?—May I mention a name?

(Chairman.) I think it is better not.

(Witness.) You asked me for a concrete case.

43,439. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) No, I did not ask for a concrete case. I asked what action you think should be taken to bring moral pressure to bear. What is the moral pressure you are thinking of?—I will give you an instance that comes home to you all. You are sitting in judgment on this question; therefore I presume you represent some moral authority. I think the first way in which moral pressure is to be exercised is for you, in your report, to express a deliberate and considered opinion as to whether the publication of those things is contrary to morals and ought to be abated. That is the thing you ought to do. The second thing I think you ought to do is to call upon all persons who care for the morals of the country, whether newspaper men, bishops, mayors, clergy, and ministers of all denominations, to use their influence to abate what you think is a crying moral evil by the use of all moral means in their power. If you would do that you could do it.

43,440. What do you mean by moral influence?—Well, when I speak in generalities you say you do not want rhetoric, and when I say I will give a concrete case, you say I am not to mention names: what the mischief am I to do?

43,441. I quite follow your suggestion that it is a matter where this Commission can exercise some moral influence, but beyond that what I want to suggest to you is that what you are telling us, as if it were a sort of revelation or new matter, is not only admitted, but every avenue of public opinion that is open to men of influence, speaking generally, is used in the very direction that you desire. The clergy, the ministers, the bishops, the magistrates, and all public authorities, taken as a whole, are desirous to produce the result which you desire to produce; but what I want to draw your attention to, and what I want to ask you is this, that this thing has been going on for years with, at any rate, a very great amount of moral reprobation, by a very very large number of people, of the kind you desire, but it has not been successfully stopped. Can you suggest any means of stopping it which has not yet been tried?—Well, I think that the Free Church Council, the bishops of the Church of England, and any other religious bodies—the Catholic Church too—if their attention was drawn to the question of bringing to bear moral pressure——

43,442. Do you think their attention has not been brought to it?—My dear sir, I have been fighting for 30 years about it, and it is a precious difficult thing.

43,443. Do you suggest that the bishops and the Free Church Council are not as anxious to put a stop to it as you are?—They may be, but they do nothing. Take the people who are accused—the "News of the World" and the "Umpire" which have been mentioned—do you think the Bishop of London has ever been round and said, "I think you are doing a great harm." Cardinal Manning would have done it like a shot.

43,444. I think you are probably in error in assuming that no such action has been taken. But that is not the question. Here is the evil which you admit, when we get to the bottom of your evidence, exists. One way of dealing with it, it has been suggested, is the limiting of publication which would leave out all objectionable details. That does not meet with your approval. What do you suggest?—Nothing; absolutely nothing. You cannot do anything by law that is not——

43,445. You have no remedies to suggest at all?—Only moral suasion. Any legal action you may take will aggravate the evil.

43,446. (The Earl of Derby.) To use your words—absolute veto. You say a woman should have the right of absolute veto at any time during her married life against being made a mother against her free and full consent. If she exercised that right would you give the husband a right of divorce?—No, certainly not.

43,447. Then you mean to say if a man would like to have a large family, and he marries a wife who says "I will have none," that that man should be in the position of not having a family?—Certainly. I say they should arrange that beforehand. I say you ought to discuss the terms of contract before you marry them and bind them for ever.

43,448. Do you say that a man marrying a girl is to discuss beforehand how many children he is to have?—If I were a girl I should make it very clear to any man who wanted to marry me, that I would never marry without an absolute gaurantee that "that "marriage did not entail upon me an endless liability, "to have an indefinite multitude children. I am not "going to have more children than my health will "stand and than I can bring up reasonably."

43,449. You leave it to her entirely?—Absolutely, she has all the pain and all the misery.

43,450. Then you are very strong in your denunciation of Sunday newspapers?—I say they publish an excessive proportion of this stuff; but I would let them do it rather than interfere with them by law.

43,451. You agree it is a mistake, that they go to an excess?—From my point of view, yes.

43,452. And you add at the same time that the daily papers do not publish enough?—There is a golden mean. I will give you an instance. Take the international white slave traffic. There was a most important conference in Madrid, and it was practically boycotted by all our newspapers; only about three lines were published; yet it was most important. Murders pays the best of all things for newspapers but obscenity does not. The dramatic story, as Mr. Low said, tells.

43,453. But surely the reason why the Sunday newspapers publish these things is because it sells its papers?—Yes I know, the dramatic thing, as Mr. Low says; but, as has been already said, there is not much indecency in these reports.

43,454. But you say it does not pay the newspaper to publish these reports, and in the same breath you say the Sunday newspapers publish them because it helps to sell?—No, I say the public get their drama as they get it on the stage, mixed up with adultery. You cannot take it out because it is there. But it is a mistake to say that the ordinary daily newspapers find profit in publishing indecent matters. I should mention the case of "Le Petit Journal" which has a circulation of a million. The wife of the proprietor used to go through every serial novel and cut out anything that in the least degree would be calculated to be offensive to la jeune femme. It is not a pleasant or profitable thing to publish anything relating to the social evil when you have to deal with it seriously. But when you can deal with it as part of a drama or story it can be done.

43,455. I quite agree it probably does not pay the newspaper to publish these details, but does it not show that the general public does not want these details, but that there is a certain class of public to whom the Sunday newspapers pander who do want it?—Well, you had better let him have it than stop it by the policeman.

43,456. You think the class of persons who do clamour for it are to be encouraged by giving fuller details?—No, they would be surfeited in time. The persons that I refer to are not the persons that ought to have longer reports in the daily papers. The daily paper report is a great pillory. Constantly proprietors are approached by persons begging them not to publish things.

43,457. Do not you think this Sunday class of paper panders to this taste?—I should prefer they were not pandered to, but I am sure you would do more mischief than good if you tried to interfere with them by law.

43,458. (Mr. Burt.) Just one point on which I want to be clear. On the first page, the third paragraph, I understand you to suggest that there should be no new legislation on this subject until women have votes?—Yes.

43,459. Now, as you are aware, a Royal Commission does not legislate but simply recommends. You do not suggest that we should make no recommendation until women have votes?—On the contrary I should say: "We recommend the following changes should be adopted by the legislature as soon as it is clearly represented by both sexes." That is the form of recommendation I should adopt if I were in your place.

43,460. But we may recommend before women get votes?—Certainly, but it was the assumption that your recommendations were to be passed into law that I objected to.

43,461. (Sir William Anson.) You do not suggest that our recommendations should all be conditional?—Yes.

43,462. Then we should, though it is not in the terms of Commission, say that everything we suggest or recommend must be treated as subject to this great change in the franchise?—In relation to law but not in relation to moral suasion which I suggest you should exercise, because that is not a question of votes.

43,463. (Sir George White.) In the last paragraph on the first page, Mr. Stead, you say, "The Church, while attempting to compel the State to enforce on the world Christ's law of marriage which was only given to His own disciples." You do not refer there to His immediate disciples, but all disciples of the Church in subsequent ages, I presume?—Certainly.

43,464. Then with regard to the charges you levy against the Church as not dealing with these questions. Do you think it possible, or is it in your desire, that in promiscuous assemblies such sins as adultery and fornication and those things should be dealt with more specifically than the general sins and errors of mankind?—I think they can be dealt with much more profitably in mixed assemblies, and quite as judicially and forcibly as in separate assemblies. I dislike separate assemblies. I would have faithful admonitions from the pulpit on all questions of the sexes; and I would have also preparation classes for matrimony as they have for Confirmation. Matrimony is much more important than Confirmation.
